spired, in order to be a good interpreter or a good divine—in order to appreciate a given passage or to build up from the whole a system symmetrical and secure—indispensable requisite is to be made one spirit with the speaker. More especially, the immediate words of the Lord Jesus, which are the surest key to all besides—it is only to a kindred spirit that they give out their total meaning; and sayings which to cold logic or dry philology are dark enough, become diaphanous when suffused with love's excellent oil. The vocables which to the unlearned seemed poor and hard, grow rich and melodious when accented and rightly read by the skilful Masorite; and the letter which killeth captiousness or self-conceit is life and peace when spiritually discerned.

We do not forget that Christianity is founded on fact, nor do we advocate a mystical interpretation of Scripture rather than the effort to ascertain its plain and obvious meaning; but to us it is plain and obvious that Gospel sayings will fail to give out their full significance, and will fail to exert their legitimate, their strengthening and sanctifying influence, when dissociated from the adorable Speaker. They are not the utterance of an automaton, on the one hand, nor a mere voice from the excellent glory on the other: they are "lively oracles"—the counsels of Eternal Wisdom animating a human heart and speaking through human lips. They are not statutes on stone nor tables of brass that we read, nor is it a trump angelic to which we listen from the over-arching heaven, but the grace and truth which came together and came out in Jesus Christ—faithful sayings set to something better than the music of the spheres—Truth fitted to our feeble frame—Truth spoken in our own vernacular, yet spoken by our God—immortal Truth married to immortal Love, and which now that they are joined together, let no man put asunder.

This is the reason why so much that is hid from the wise and prudent is revealed to babes. In the cottages of England, in the forest homes of Wurtemberg, the Bible will be read this day by numbers who do not know a word of the original, but who have got more good from it than those who claim the original as pre-eminently their own. A scholar might be sorry for their ignorance, a disputant might smile at their logic; yet it turns out that, taught of God, they are wise unto salvation, and have discovered much which these sages have yet to learn. They are only "sheep," and can neither sound the Shepherd's harp, nor construe the Shepherd's song, but they know the Shepherd's voice, and they know that He is good, and they go out and in and follow Him, and He leads them to good pastures, and gives them eternal life. They are only babes, and much of the apparatus with which their Father is surrounded and with which He is carrying on His great experiments, is not so much as a marvel to their vacant minds; but although they are babes, they are not orphans or outcasts; they have found a home, they know a Father's love, there is a smile which He keeps for them, and there are tones of affectionate tenderness which none but the little children hear. The styles of Mark and Matthew they hardly can discriminate, but the voice of Christ they know; the words of learned expositors are lost on their untutored intellect, but the words which Jesus speaks have proved spirit and life to their souls, the inspiration of their happiness, the dawn of immortality.

Of course, it would be a double benefit if the two things met and grew together, the scholarlike accomplishment and the spiritual discernment. Nor is there any reason why they should not; except it be that, like other idols, literary taste or the love of system or the lust of speculation is apt to increase, and with its great usurping growth fill all the temple, leaving no room for devotional feeling.

The Bible is the book of Life. If the words whereby we can be saved are anywhere, they are here: but many treat the Bible as if it were a mere book of beauty—a mere repertory of picturesque incidents and poetic metaphors and grand archaic phrases. Well, it contains all these; and the trencher on which your daily bread is brought in may be curiously carved—the goblet in which you quaff the cooling spring may have on it the picture of a palace—but if all your attention is taken up with the skill of the artist, and you rise from table without tasting a morsel; if you go away from the fountain without putting the water to your lips, it is not likely that the fountain—even although it should be the well of salvation—will heal your diseases, it is not likely that the bread, even although it should be the bread from heaven, will strengthen your heart.

To others the Bible is a book of dogmas. Rich in theology, because the only titillating revelation of God; rich in doctrine, because so instructive, so practical, and unflinching for every good work so fully; there is not much in Scripture of what is commonly called dogmatic divinity; but for the scientific arrangement of truth some minds have such invincible propensity, that to them the Bible is mainly a collection of texts or proof passages, and they at once set to work and rear up from those texts a whole temple of truth—a great system of universal theology. It hardly occurs to them that there are many secret things on which the Bible throws no light, and instead of clearing up the whole mystery of the universe, it only undertakes to guide our fallen race from sin to holiness, and from earth to heaven. In other words, instead of forcing triangular texts into circular cavities, or rearing up square lintels in lieu of round columns, it would be far wiser to admit that there are questions which Scripture does not answer, and thoughts of God which it does not reveal. Here are bricks which our box does not contain. It is not that they are lost, for they were never there: when our box was made up, they were not put in; and instead of trying to model in its vast and symmetrical proportions the house not made with hands—God's mighty scheme of the universe—let us be content with our beautiful fragment—with that vestibule or ante-chapel, which, athwart the smoke of the great sacrifice, gives a glimpse of the Holy of Holies, and where, surmounting the din of the noisy exterior, are caught bursts of the chorus, "Blessing and honour and glory and power to Him that sitteth on the throne and to the Lamb for ever."

The words of Jesus are spirit and life; but to some these words have lost their vitality by reason of the sceptic doubts or secularising influences they allow to come between. Few know the prodigious power of fungous vegetation. Not long ago a certain man had stored up in a cellar a cask of very valuable wine. After many months he went to look at it, but could scarcely force open the door—there was behind it something so stiff and stubborn; and, as it turned out, nearly the whole cask was filled with a huge inflated growth—a mighty trailing mushroom whose subterranean roots had found entrance to his precious store and spunged it up till it was well-nigh spent, and what remained was utterly worthless. And so at present the air is full of these impalpable, invisible spores, which, if they get into any one's religion, may turn it all to rationalism. If you do not look to it—if the door is too long shut—if prayer is restrained, or the house of God forsaken—by the time that you return you may find the blessed hope all vanished. The pencilium pantheisticum, or something of the sort, has got into your faith. The miracles are myths, and though the Book remains, the Gospel is gone—gone to feed this fat and spongy parasite, which vaunts its origin, but retains small likeness to the decomposed and ruined wood, and which you do not thank for the few vapid drops, the lifeless dregs it has left behind.

A turn of mind too critical, too disputatious, too vaguely speculative, may destroy or lessen devotional feeling; and therefore we cannot too anxiously urge a continual return to the Lord Jesus himself, and His spirit-stirring, life-giving words.

And those to whom His words are faithful and true, will not scorn us when we say that, in order to find them inspiring and vital, you need not only to read them the Book, but must have them brought heartily home by that Divine Agent who at once the Spirit of Truth and the Revealer of Jesus.

When the Holy Spirit is come He takes the things of Jesus and shows them—He takes up the words of Jesus and makes them spirit and life. Pray for His help. When He opens the eyes, when on eyes already opened He puts an edge of eager wakefulness and wistful desire, it is a total transformation. The face of the Bible is renewed, the Saviour whom it announces is revealed, and, as to a transformed man, all things are made new.

Should any one read these words who is sighing for a life nobler and more satisfactory than he is at present leading, listen to the Saviour. Used up and life-weary, are you saying—

Oh, I approve of nothing in the world,
Not of you, still less of me,
Not even of Romney, though he's worth us both;
We're all gone wrong, the tune in us is lost,
And whistling in back alleys to the moon
Will never catch it.*

So true. "The tune in us is lost," and the self-seeker will never find it. But instead of wandering in back alleys—instead of trying amusement, dissipation, gaiety, or the prescriptions of philosophy—return into your quiet chamber and open the window heaven-ward, and when the night wind wakes, when in the seclusion and the silence the Comforter passes by, a still small voice or a gust of sudden melody through the Eolian cords may say, "Come unto me;" and as borne from the scented hills of Galilee, from the mournful moonlight of Gethsemane, as wafted from the sapphire throne, that pleading music comes and goes and tells of your best but forgotten Friend, your heart-strings may begin to vibrate in unison with His who is "the everlasting lover of our unworthy race," and believing in God and in Jesus, you will find that life has a meaning and even its discords a use in the melody. Or going forth into the fields of Bethlehem, you may listen to the heavenly host saying, "Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace: goodwill towards the children of men;" and if the first bar be too high to begin with, start with the second or the third, and practise it, till you can go back to the first, and so make out the whole anthem. For Christ's sake begin, and do the very best for your present circle and for this very day; and in seeking "peace" and radiating "goodwill" for Christ's sake, you will find that you have already begun to "glorify God." Listening to Jesus, the lost tune is recovered, and you who lately felt all wrong and discordant can take a part in the anthem.

And you who sigh for a nobler style of Christianity, be you yourself the specimen. Fill up with life and spirit any word of Jesus that you choose. The Holy Spirit is a "free" Spirit, and within the limits of the Gospel there is room for personal developments of excellence boundlessly diversified, and all of them beautiful, useful, or noble. And although perfection may awaken despair, still love and devotion will lead on to more or less of likeness; and by a growing loftiness of aim, a deepening humility, a more habitual self-denial, a conscience more tender, a temper more mellow, a faith more active, and a piety more humane, it will be seen that the life of Jesus is in your eye and the spirit of Jesus in your soul.

* Aurora Leigh.

DR. NEWMAN'S APOLOGIA.

ROMANISTS have indulged in no small jubilation over Dr. Newman's book, deeming it a splendid and effective vindication of the Roman Catholic faith against Protestants. Their satisfaction is not likely to endure. The impression made by the work resembles that imputed to the ancient oration on a first, a second, and a third perusal respectively. Fascinated by its glow of emotion, and led swiftly on by its masculine and flexible style, he who reads it for a first time is conscious of a profound influence, which, if it does not convince him that the conclusions of the writer are sound, seems at least to be connected with a formidable array of argument and a real weight of evidence. When he examines it a second time, he perceives, emerging from the vivid haze of rhetoric and feeling, like rippling shallows and sand-banks seen in a channel by the voyager when the glittering mists of morning begin to clear away, certain far-stretching fallacies which suggest more than a doubt whether he can possibly reach the haven of assent. And when, with unimpassioned mind and keen intellectual scrutiny, he for a third time estimates its value, he is startled to find that what he imagined to be a plenum is logically a vacuum, and is ready, like the agent of the classical story, to rush to Dr. Newman and say that his argument is no argument at all. If this is all the ablest of living Romanists can say for Rome, the cause of the Papacy must seek other weapons than those of reason.

What—to try the matter by a crucial instance—was the argument which, as Dr. Newman frankly tells us, first unsettled the key-stone in the arch of his belief, and sent the thought home with force to his soul that Rome was right, and that Protestants were wrong? In the Long Vacation of 1839, he employed himself in studying the history of the Monophysites. These, as some of our readers may require to be reminded, were the followers of Eutyches, an Asiatic bishop of the fifth century, who contended so long and so vehemently against the Nestorian heresy, by which the person of Christ was divided, that his mind, in old age, oscillated to the opposite extreme, and he originated the heresy of confounding the Saviour's Divine and human natures. Nestorius affirmed two persons; Eutyches affirmed one nature. The Latin Church condemned both. "Now here," says Dr. Newman, "in the middle of the fifth century, I found, as it seemed to me, Christendom of the sixteenth and the nineteenth centuries reflected. I saw my face in that mirror, and I was a Monophysite. The Church of the Via Media was in the position of the Oriental communion. Rome was where she now is; and the Protestants were the Eutychians." It had been up to this time, we may observe in elucidation, Dr. Newman's theory, that the Church of England was a safe and orthodox via media between Rome and the Reformation. He now apprehended that her place was more correctly among schismatic communions, like that of the Oriental Church in the fifth century. Let us hear him more fully upon the point. "It was difficult," he proceeds, "to make out how the Eutychians or Monophysites were heretics, unless Protestants and Anglicans were heretics also; difficult to find arguments against the Tridentine Fathers which did not tell against the Fathers of Chalcedon; difficult to condemn the Popes of the sixteenth century without condemning the Popes of the fifth. The drama of religion, and the combat of truth and error, were ever one and the same. The principles and proceedings of the Church now, were those of the Church then; the principles and proceedings of heretics then, were those of Protestants now. I found it so—almost fearfully; there was an awful similitude, more awful, because so silent and unimpassioned, between the dead records of the past and the feverish chronicle of the present. The shadow of the fifth century was on the sixteenth. It was like a spirit rising from the troubled waters of the old world, with the shape and lineaments of the new. The Church then, as now, might be called peremptory and stern, resolute, overbearing, and relentless; and heretics were shifting, able, reserved, and deceitful, ever courting civil power, and never agreeing except by its aid; and the civil power was ever aiming at comprehensions, and put the invisible out of view, and substituting expediency for faith. What use of continuing the controversy, or defending my position, if, after all forging arguments for Arius or Eutyches, and turning devil's advocate against much-enduring Athanasius and the majestic Leo? Be my soul with the Lord, and shall I lift up my hand against them? Sooner may my right hand forswear, and wither outright, as his who once stretched it out against a perjured God! Anathema to a whole tribe of Cranmers, Riddleys, Latimers, and Perish the names of Bramhall, Ussher, Taylor, Stillingfleet, and Barrow, for the face of the earth, ere I should do aught but fall at their feet in love and in awe, whose image was continually before my eyes, and whose musical words were in my ears and on my tongue."

We have let Dr. Newman state his own case, and his pleading, and his pleading, is powerful; but we ask, in all seriousness and courtesy, do we deserve the name of argument? It were a strong thing to say that historical facts are in every instance fallacious; but those who have looked most closely into them will be most ready to warn us against putting trust in them. Not only does nature in her every province testify by her infinite variety that her Creator is infinite, but only has every day which has passed since the granite hills were seething, but has been different from every other day; not only does every wave in the Atlantic differ in its size, its shape, or its wrinkling from every other wave; not only has even on the sea-shore a form geometrically demonstrable to be identical with that of the other sand-grain; but man is pre-eminently a creature of variation, so that the critic has to speak of the difficulty of painting the changeable sky, but nothing stronger than that it is like painting a soul. A wise man derives no exquisite intellectual amusement from tracing the coincidences of historical events, or to base an argument upon the shadowy resemblance discovered is to substitute the filigree of fancy for the chainwork of intellect. As an historical parallel, we are prepared to maintain that Dr. Newman's sixteenth or the nineteenth century will not match with the fifth. The sixteenth century is about as different from the fifth as it could possibly be. The prevailing mood of mind in the nineteenth century is different from that of the sixteenth, still more did the spirit and genius of the sixteenth differ from the fifth. In point of fact, these parallels have almost always a surface resemblance; they depend upon some intellectual habit or moral idiosyncrasy which who detects them; to another eye the lines seem not parallel, but diverge. However, that we granted Dr. Newman all he demands in the way of eternal correspondence between times and persons, would he thereby take a step towards a proof that Romanism, as contrasted with Protestantism, is the true religion? Because Rome was right in condemning Eutyches, and necessity have been right in condemning Luther and Calvin? The Council of Chalcedon was sound, was it inevitable that its mantle fell on the Jewish Church? Because the Jewish Church was the true Church in the days of Nehemiah, shall we conclude that she could not have become the true Church in the days of our Saviour? No Protestant—certainly no Protestant smattering of Church history—hesitates to acknowledge that she performed inestimable services to the human race in the early days of her faithfulness in testifying against the Arian, Nestorian, and Monophysite heresies. In those days the Church of Rome was still zealous.

in the fifth century she was beginning to exhibit traces of that zeal for her own dominance, which, long ere the commencement of the sixteenth century, had in the place of jealousy for the truth and the honour of God. Rome never asked of the early ages to acknowledge her supremacy under penalty of being pronounced heretical; in the sixteenth century, and from the sixteenth century until now, she has been willing enough to wink at heretical deviations from the truth if fidelity to the Papacy continued unshaken.

The passage we have quoted is the key to Dr. Newman's book, and to his life. It brings us face to face with the grand mistake and omission by which he has been landed in Rome. He has failed to give account of the Reforma-

Of this cardinal fact in the religious history of modern times his knowledge is meagre and second-hand. We submit that in passing by the Reformers, in attempting to learn from themselves what they had to say against Rome, in resting satisfied with a faint and far-away echo of their theology, he has put himself out of court as a pleader on either side in the Romish controversy. In the coolest of critical appreciation, and with the utmost anxiety to deal fairly and honestly with Dr. Newman, we affirm that he does not know what he has to do in order to justify him in preferring the Church of Leo X. and Ignatius to the Church of Luther and Calvin. It is difficult to restrain a smile as he informs us of the extent of his acquaintance with the greatest controversialist Rome ever had, John Calvin, and of the conception he has framed of the theological system embodied in Calvin's writings. There is not a hint in his book that he ever read a treatise or a page by Calvin. His boyish reading in his own name, his youthful enthusiasm for Thomas Scott—these were the sources of his knowledge of the Reformation. He imagines that it is a chief tenet of the reformed Church "that the converted and the unconverted can be discriminated by God only." Calvin says expressly that they can be discriminated by God only: "non mur reprobos ab electis discernere (quod Dei est solius non nostrum)."* Dr. Newman talks always of Lutherans and Calvinists, Lutheranism and Calvinism, as if the Reformers, like the ancient heretics, had contended for a few dogmas against the general voice of the Church, and in opposition to the body of Catholic theologians. The position of the Reformers was that they, not the Papists, were Catholic. The enterprise of Calvin was not to rebel against the Church, but to restore her to strength and purity. No two men in history are more strongly contrasted than Eutyches, called as Dr. Newman himself states, a delirus senex, an old man whom much controversy had driven mad, possessed with his own idea until his judgment became bewildered, and John Calvin, in the prime of his years, going round Zion, counting her towers and marking her landmarks, and by the help of God tracing those ancient boundaries which had been reached upon by the aggression of heretics, or were obscured by the rubbish of time. Dr. Newman says that, in his early manhood, he was impressed with the contrast presented by the Church of England, divided, threatened, ignorant of her own strength, to the Church of the first centuries. The triumphant zeal of the early Church, the self-conquest of her ascetics, the patience of her martyrs, the irresistible termination of her bishops, the joyous swing of her advance, exalted and abashed alike. He recognised in her his spiritual mother—incessu patruit dea. This is finely said and finely felt. But how was Luther to discern the gait or lineaments of a daughter of God in that Church which sent Etzel to hawk permission to sin, and which viewed the Christian religion as an available superstitious machinery for making a temple to gratify the taste of a refined atheism? Dr. Newman thinks that when he appeals to Augustine, he appeals against Protestantism, but Cal-appealed to Augustine against Rome. Does he imagine that the Church of the infancy and boyhood, the Church which they and their fathers for many generations regarded as divine, had no attractions for Luther and Calvin? Does he think it likely that, unless the Papacy had become a despotism crushing the spiritual life out of Christendom, and unless she had obstinately refused to relax that despotism, they would have rent those ties of affection which linked them to her breast? He was bound to inquire, with all calmness, distrusting first impressions, surveying the whole subject, and seeking information at the fountain-head, whether, in the great controversy of the sixteenth century, the truth was with Rome or with the Reformers. Had Dr. Newman grappled fairly with this question, he would have become, what he certainly is not, an accomplished theologian. He has never studied theology as a whole, or attained anything like a masterly apprehension of the relation of its parts. He has made excursions into several departments, or, more strictly, into several historical periods, of theology. He is acquainted, more or less, with the Nicene writers, he knows a good deal of the Alexandrians, he has read much in the fathers; but to the systematic study of Christian doctrine he is a stranger. On this point the testimony of his book is conclusive. We maintain, therefore, that he is not competent to decide in a controversy which is essentially theological and which has engaged the greatest theologians the world ever saw. It would be an act of transcendent intellectual honesty on his part, but no more than is required, if he would speak with authority on the differences between Rome and the Reformers, that he should put aside all he has written on the subject, and suspend a decision until he has fairly considered the writings of Luther and Calvin.

* Institutes, Lib IV., cap. I., 3.

Dr. Newman appears to be aware that the process by which he convinced himself that the Church of Rome is the one true Church will not stand logical inspection.
 In the closing sections of his book, when stating finally and elaborately the reasons which induce him to adhere to Rome, he says nothing of Eutyches or Leo. His argument, which occupies many eloquent pages, is substantially this: That an infallible Church is required to prevent mankind from sinking into an abyss of atheism, and that the infallible Church provided for the purpose is the Church of Rome. He must, he says, be either a Catholic—by which he means Roman Catholic—or an atheist. He draws a fearful picture of the sin and wretchedness of the world, "the disappointments of life, the defeat of good, the success of evil, physical pain, mental anguish, the prevalence and intensity of sin, the pervading idolatries, the corruptions, the dreary, hopeless irreligion, that condition of the whole race, so fearfully yet exactly described in the Apostle's words, 'having no hope and without God in the world,'" and takes refuge from the "dizzying and appalling vision" in the arms of the infallible Church. He thinks that outside the Catholic Church things are tending, more rapidly than in the days of classic paganism, to atheism. "What a scene," he exclaims, "what a prospect, does the whole of Europe present at this day! and not only Europe, but every Government and every civilization throughout the world, which is under the influence of the European mind! Especially, for it most concerns us, how sorrowful, in the view of religion, even taken in its most elementary, most attenuated form, is the spectacle presented to us by the educated intellect of England, France, and Germany! Lovers of their country and of their race, religious men, external to the Catholic Church, have attempted various expedients to arrest fierce wilful nature in its onward course, and to bring it into subjection. The necessity of some form of religion for the interests of humanity has been generally acknowledged; but where was the concrete representative of things invisible which would have the force and the toughness necessary to a breakwater against the deluge? Three centuries ago the establishment of religion, material, legal, and social, was generally adopted as the best expedient for the purpose, in those countries which separated from the Catholic Church; and for a long time it was successful; but now the crevices of those establishments are admitting the enemy. Thirty years ago education was relied upon; ten years ago there was a hope that wars would cease for ever, under the influence of commercial enterprise and the reign of the useful and fine arts; but will any one venture to say that there is anything anywhere on this earth which will afford a fulcrum for us, whereby to keep the earth from moving onwards?" To which the obvious reply is in the form of another question, Is it the intention of Providence that the earth should be kept from moving onwards?" And this question suggests a long succession of others, each and all of which Dr. Newman would require to answer before he could apply the syllogism as to the necessity of an infallible Church for the preservation of human society could stand, and to each and all of which he would find it extremely difficult to reply. Is it true that religion is at so low an ebb in the Europe of to-day as compared with the Europe of other times? Dr. Newman's idea of religion may possibly require correction before it can be safely applied to test the religious state of Europe. "I do not shrink," he says in one of his sermons, "from uttering my own conviction that it would be a gain to the country were it vastly more superstitious, more bigoted, more gloomy, more fierce in its religion than at present it seems itself to be." But the sentiment is morbid and exaggerated. Superstition, bigotry, gloom, fierceness, are under no circumstances to be desired, and if, without destroying the essential character of religion, without deadening the vital nerve of reverence for the Almighty, the European intellect has freed itself from the fierceness, bigotry, and superstition of the mediæval centuries, the change is an advance. It is a characteristic of all times of high civilization that speculative infidelity abounds, and there is unquestionably a great amount of speculative infidelity now in Europe. But there is also a vast deal of religion, and what there is is of excellent quality, at once sincere and enlightened. Even the ablest men, if of glowing and imaginative natures, are apt to suffuse the past with rosy mists, the product of their own fancy, and to pronounce the present a sterile and leafless waste. But sober inquirers, men like Hallam, men, even, like Macaulay, have returned from their researches into the past with a rooted conviction that we are now in a more advanced state, materially, socially, morally, religiously, than our ancestors. Mankind has given no sign of paralysis in this nineteenth century; and if the Most High is pleased that the germs of energy, capacity, achievement He has implanted in man should be developed to the utmost—if conquest over nature in the desert, the mine, the laboratory, is a proof of human vigour—if there is any truth whatever in the saying that work is worship—the age cannot be said to be devoid of religion. The fruits in God's garden of humanity ripen slowly; strange blasts and chills and fogs will come, retarding civilization, it may be, by a thousand years, and causing men of little faith to call for some mechanical apparatus to exclude the influence of sky and clime, some glass case—shall it be an infallible Church or what you will—beneath which the winds cannot blow, and in the brooding sunshine of which the clusters will purple quickly and without danger. But Providence has not furnished the glass case; and in the long run we are better without it. Providence, we repeat, has not furnished the glass case. There is no infallible Church. That settles the matter. We know that Rome errs in all conceivable senses; the thing is palpable to every understanding; and if we deem her infallible, we either attach some new meaning to the term, or accept a dream for a reality. Will Dr. Newman, surveying Roman Catholic countries and Protestant countries, candidly affirm that, on the whole, the former are more prosperous, more enlightened, more religious than the latter? Are they not, generally speaking, inferior in all respects, and is not their inferiority marked and startling in exact proportion to the completeness with which Rome has worked her will upon their institutions? What, then, is the psychological phenomenon presented by Dr. Newman? With the bodily eye he sees one thing—Rome a failure; with the mind's eye he sees another thing—Rome saving the world: he deliberately prefers the subjective impression to the objective reality, the theory of his mind to the fact of observation. If an infallible Church is necessary to the well-being of mankind, we must have a different Church from that of Rome; what she can do we know, and it does not encourage us; the perfection of the species must be given up altogether if we have nothing better to look for than that of the two thousand whom Ugarte offered up as a fiery sacrifice to Mary, or than that of the Papal conclave which makes the seat of the Romish power a centre whence darkness, spiritual, moral, and political, is rayed forth upon Europe. In these days we must all, Roman Catholics and Protestants, whether we like it or not, submit to the ordinances of the inductive philosophy. Men, nations, institutions, must be tried by their fruits. It is not what might be effected by the infallible Church of Dr. Newman's imagination that we are concerned to know; it is what Rome actually has made of Spain, of Naples, of South America. That Canaan flows with something very different from milk and honey, and we shall not be tempted by Dr. Newman to drink of its bitter streams.

THE REV. DR. MARSH.

THREE years ago we lost a venerable friend who had been baptized by Whitefield before he sailed on his last voyage to America, and who made a public profession of religion by becoming a communicant at seventeen years of age. This last event she survived for seventy-eight years, and they were all years of exemplary and ardent piety. During that interval she had changed her mind on many subjects, but there was no change in her feeling towards her Saviour—

I'm a poor sinner, and nothing at all,
But Jesus Christ is my all in all.

And a good many changes had come over her outward circumstances, but the unsearchable riches of Christ continued to grow in her esteem, and they more than made up for every loss. It was comforting to visit her and listen to her words of faith and hope. In a world of so much vicissitude, it was cheering to find an affection which nothing could impair, and which was capable of making its possessor happy through unending ages. There was one Friend of whom she thought it very wonderful that for nearly a century He had never tired her, and in a still better acquaintance with whom she hoped to find her heaven.

On the last day of his life, and at the close of a sixty-six years' ministry, Dr. Marsh, when no longer able to speak, wrote, with trembling hand, "Tell the clergy to preach Christ, to live Christ, to serve Christ, and they will joy and praise in eternity." This was the theme which he had proclaimed to two generations of hearers, and which he had found more than enough for every sermon. This was the joy which had filled up his long and happy existence, and which had given the charm to his bright and attractive career. And as the charge was timely, so the testimony involved in it should be especially encouraging to those who remember how truly and habitually "the end of his conversation was Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever."

William Marsh, D.D., was born July 20, 1775. A graduate of Oxford, he was ordained in 1799, and was successively vicar of Basildon, Berks; vicar of St. Peter's, Colchester; rector of St. Thomas's, Birmingham; incumbent of St. Mary's, Leamington; and finally, after a period of retirement from the active ministry, rector of Beddington, Surrey. There he died, August 24, 1864, in the ninetyeth year of his age.

Of Dr. Marsh's acquirements or intellectual powers we have no personal knowledge; for he was already well-stricken in years before we became acquainted with his outward appearance, and a few simple utterances or a brief exposition in a drawing-room could supply no adequate criterion. However, we are disposed to think that his greatness consisted mainly in his goodness. The unfeigned love and homage which gathered round him are such as men give to long-tried worth and endearing kindness; and if there was nothing remarkable in what he said, the respect with which it was received showed all the more plainly that there must have been something remarkable in the speaker. It was not his sermon, but himself which was the oracle. To use his own expression, he was trying to "live Christ," and he had so far succeeded, that when men saw the servant they inevitably thought of the Master. He was a warm friend of Christian union, and few were better fitted to promote it. Were all lives as lovely, ecclesiastical demarcations would not necessarily involve personal estrangements; and were all hearts as large, there would be small need for the Evangelical Alliance.

Foreign Intelligence.

FRANCE.

—, France, September, 1864.

RENEWED DISCUSSIONS ON THE ROMAN QUESTION.

There are subjects which reappear perpetually, and cannot be set aside, notwithstanding the efforts of the most powerful men; such, for example, is the Roman question. Napoleon III. has commanded the Governmental press to maintain complete silence in regard to this matter. He himself displays great caution as to what concerns the military occupation of Rome, and his desire is to adjourn as long as possible the settlement of so delicate a business. But he cannot obtain this end, and the old controversy survives, at one time under one form, and at another time under another, because the very nature of things makes it a duty to get out of this abnormal situation.

I made an allusion in my last letter to the discussions provoked by the abduction of Edmond Cohen. Since then it appears that the question of Rome has originated differences in the domestic circle of Napoleon III. The Empress Eugénie, who is very bigoted, and quite under the influence of the Popish party, as you are aware, had expressed the warmest desire to pay a visit to Pio Nono, and to offer him her most humble homage. The Emperor opposed this project with inflexible resistance. It is evident, indeed, that the arrival of the Empress in the city of the Vatican would have raised the hopes of the Jesuit faction, and caused great agitation among the liberals. Who knows even whether the ignorant and impetuous princess of Spanish race would not have made extravagant promises to the Pope? This journey, therefore, was on her part an altogether imprudent project.

But what has been the result? The Empress has been excessively irritated by the refusal; and to display her dissatisfaction, has abruptly quitted the Imperial palace, under the pretext that her bad health imposed upon her the necessity of taking the mineral waters of Schwalbach, in Germany. This is a fiction which deceives nobody. The true reason of this departure, which has occupied public opinion, is a complete disagreement between the august couple on the subject of Roman affairs.

The Italians, on their side, cannot consent to an indefinite renunciation of the natural and historical capital of their new kingdom. They besiege Napoleon III. with continual complaints and applications. They say with much reason that tranquillity and order cannot be established in Italy so long as this question continues in suspense. Napoleon III. replies that it is proper to wait for the death of the Pope. But can Victor-Emmanuel and his councillors treat the possession of Rome as subordinate to such an eventuality? And will they always have power enough to restrain the irritation of Garibaldi and his adherents? *

BISHOP DUPANLOUP AT THE MECHLIN CONGRESS.

You have heard from the journals of France and Belgium that the city of Mechlin has once more had the honour of entertaining a great congress of bishops, priests, monks, and laymen. The high dignitaries of the Roman Court have not looked with satisfaction upon the convoking of such an assembly, for they have a sort of instinctive fear of everything which subjects religious discussions to the publicity of a political press. Besides, it is contrary to their old maxim to allow to laymen any portion of influence in such matters. But the impulse was too strong, and the Mechlin Congress has taken place.

Among the ecclesiastical orators who occupied a prominent place during the sittings, I may mention M. Dupanloup, Bishop of Orleans. This reverend prelate is already advanced in age, but he displays indefatigable activity. After having been suspected for a long time by the Jesuits, because he held opinions in some small degree liberal, he now strives to live in perfect harmony with his old antagonists, and neglects no occasion of attacking the ideas and the men pertaining to modern society.

The theme which M. Dupanloup selected was the panegyric of clerical schools, accompanied by a vehement philippic against the scholastic establishments of the Government. He spoke for three hours upon this subject, and won by his eloquence the enthusiastic applause of his hearers.

Assuredly, M. Dupanloup is an able speaker, but the cause which he has maintained is bad, and all the artifices of human language will never succeed in making it better. It is an incontestible fact that the schools placed under the direction of the priests, and the minor [theological] seminaries at the head of which the bishops are placed, do not turn out well-educated pupils. Everything is subordinated in them to the exercise of ignorant and a rigid devotion. They are afraid to develop the understanding of the young people, and willingly sacrifice to philosophical or scientific studies for the Virgin Mary. Is this the way to acquire the confidence of the parents?

It is true that the public schools and Government colleges may also furnish for some objections. Religious education there too much neglected, and the people who leave these establishments fall into unbelief. But the remedy for evil is not in the clerical schools. France is in want of is a pure religion founded on the basis of truth, and if M. Dupanloup sincerely wishes that piety should lift up its head again in this country, he should begin by extirpating the abuses of Romish ceremonies and superstitions. It is not Popery which will remedy the sceptical tendencies of our age; rather serve to fortify them. The Gospel is alone able, under God's blessing, to bring back France into a better way.

A BOOK UPON ENGLISH LITERATURE.

Inasmuch as I mention the spiritual belief which prevails among us, I may say a few words concerning a curious work which has lately been discussed in the papers of Paris.

The French Academy—our highest institution—awards prizes every year for the best works in philosophy, history, scholarship, and the like. Authorship is exceedingly ambitious of these distinctions, and the solemn suffrage of the French Academy is a great honour and a means of becoming famous.

Very well: a writer of our time, M. Taine, has published, very recently, a book upon English literature. No one disputes the talents of M. Taine, his opinions are earnest, his style is animated, and he has the art of interesting his readers. Unfortunately, M. Taine is a materialist in the most complete sense of the word. A disciple of Comte, the leader of the positive school, and yet more unbelieving than his master, he does not even admit the existence of the soul. In his eyes, man is an ape made perfect, an animal whose natural instincts have, little by little, developed into the principles and arts of civilization.

* The state of things has somewhat changed since the above was written, and certain arrangements have been made: whether final or not time will reveal.

of M. Taine on the subject of nature reveals on every page this idealism. The genius of all the philosophers of Great Britain, from and Bacon down to modern explained, or rather tortured and y our author in such a way, that a demonstration in favour of

has found many readers, and roud by his success, he has for one of the prizes of the demy. The judges have been rrasped. On the one hand, they ny the talents of the author; but hand, was it permitted them to lic honour to a book which over-undations of religion, and even of the most elementary mo-discussions, the majority of the the French Academy decided that ould not receive the prize which l for, because this mark of respect scandal and a disgrace before the ublic opinion.

, all the newspapers of the radical arty, the Siècle, the Temps, the ionale, and others, have raised the t clamour against the French "What!" say they, "is the demy charged with the duty of er the purity of the faith? Is it ion of bishops? Has doctrine, orthodox, anything to look at question of literary merit? And ne is an eminent writer, did he to receive the prize?"

rious secretary of the Academy, ne, has replied to these attacks, r talent is, beyond all doubt, a public rewards of the academic at men entrusted with the award listinction, would fail of their duty nmented to families, and to the the country, a book so openly . M. Villemaine has, I believe, and reason on his side in this troversary. Authors are perfectly fess atheism; but the French ould ought to be free to refuse them and its honours.

LIST PASTOR INTERDICTED THE AT GENEVA AND AT PARIS.

communicate to you other news ns more particularly our Pro-ches, and our internal differences. your readers probably know the name of M. Réville. He is a pastor, a native of France, and discharging the duties of the holy ministry at Rotterdam, where there are living descendants of the Huguenots, banished by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. M. Réville is an industrious theologian, and he has published numerous books and pamphlets upon questions of sacred criticism.

He belongs to the most advanced or the most negative rationalist school. M. Réville does not admit any supernatural intervention in the origin of Christianity; he denies all miracles, not even excepting the resurrection of Jesus Christ. In one word, he is simply a philosopher in the gown of a minister. All the doctrines which were regarded by our fathers as fundamental, are to him either human inventions or worn-out traditions. It would seem that after having publicly set forth such negations, M. Réville ought to refrain from getting up in a Christian pulpit, or at least to content himself with preaching before his flock at Rotterdam, which tolerates a pastor like him. Not at all: he professes to be still a preacher of the Gospel, and having gone to Geneva, he asked to preach in one of the churches in that city.

There exists at Geneva a Confession of Faith, which lays down that the Bible is the only and infallible rule of religious teaching. Having been questioned upon this Confession of Faith, M. Réville answered that he would subscribe to it! How he reconciles in his mind the acceptance of the Bible as an infallible rule, with the denial of the resurrection of Christ, is a problem which I do not take upon myself to solve. The rationalists have strange ways of altering the meaning of the most transparent formulas.

However that may be, the Company of the Pastors of Geneva, after this act of acceptance, decided that M. Réville could preach. But the Consistory, composed for the most part of laymen, was not so accommodating. It compared the books of this pastor with the official Confession of Faith, and decided that the same man could not conscientiously reject the miracles of the Gospel and admit the infallibility of Scripture. The pulpit was therefore refused him.

Having lost his cause at Geneva, M. Réville betook himself to Paris, and one of the pastors proposed to let him preach in his place. But the Presbyterial Council followed the example of the Consistory at Geneva, and decided that M. Réville should not preach. Upon this a titular pastor of Paris publicly attacked the decision of the Presbyterial Council from the pulpit, saying that it was an act of intolerance, a piece of meanness, &c.

I place these facts before the eyes of your readers, who will estimate for themselves the actual extent of this disorder and of this scandal; a pastor who in his sermon abuses the legitimate directors of the Church! and the sacred pulpit used for expressing sentiments of passion and of revolt!

This situation is unbearable. If the ecclesiastical councils are not more respected by the ministers whom they have invited and appointed, and if every pastor arrogates to himself the rights to insult the elders, or even his own colleagues, in public discourses, it is chaos—an anarchy which menaces the overthrow of everything.

AGITATION RESPECTING THE FORTHCOMING ECCLESIASTICAL ELECTIONS.

I may add that the agitation to which I called your attention in my preceding letter is still the same—nay more—it increases and becomes more inflamed. All eyes and all efforts are directed to the ecclesiastical elections which will take place in the month of January next. The rationalist party, under the guidance of Messrs. Coquerel and Son, neglect no means of securing the majority. The orthodox are also at work; they speak, and they try to enlighten the electors, and to prepare a triumph for sound doctrine.

It is very difficult to say on which side the majority will be. Respectable men, pastors, and elders, who are at the head of the Consistory of Paris, exercise a proper authority over the flocks. But how many there are who are indifferent or unbelievers among this mass of individuals which constitute the Protestant parishes of Paris! What a crowd of people who scarcely ever go to public worship, who feel no true religious wants, and who will be seduced by the sounding words, “toleration,” “support,” “charity,” “liberty,” &c. Is it not distressing to see the most sacred interests of the Church subordinated to the vote of a multitude of persons who have neither piety nor understanding in religious things, nor zeal for the salvation of souls?

Let us await the result of the elections, in a spirit of confidence and of prayer. The Lord has upheld for more than three centuries the French Reform in circumstances the most difficult and critical; He defended it against the inquisitors of Popery, and the soldiers of Louis XIV. Let us hope that He will protect it again, against its internal enemies, and not permit the foes of the faith to triumph. In any case, the friends of the Gospel will hold their banner with grasp. They know that God reigns, the truth cannot perish.

NUMEROUS PROTESTANT CONTROVERSIAL WRITINGS.

Amid these great struggles, the French press does not remain inactive. Our religious journals, especially L'Union and the Lien, discuss every week the principal points in our controversy, but our able writers take part in the MM. Poulain, Boissonnas, and several others have solidly refuted the captious arguments of the negative pastors.

There is one cheering fact to be mentioned in the presence of so many sad regrets; it is that attention is more turned to the investigation of doctrinal and ecclesiastical questions. Many candid and impartial persons begin to open their eyes to the excesses of rationalism. This is a good sign. The orthodox do not fear to be known; the better they are known, the more they can reckon upon the victory.

X.

Paris, September 19,

PROTESTANT BATHING ESTABLISHMENT AT Trouville-NORTH.

Even as in troublous times of old, the Lord's servants, part have to hold fast to their weapons of war, while part build, quelling the stones to the unfinished Zion. I would write this time as a builder, or rather the work of two of the most unknown, as they stand many more, in places generally little known, behind the brilliant harness and clank of their more exposed brethren.

If your readers will, in imagination, accompany me to the coast of Normandy, a few miles from Trouville, and within a few miles of Havre, they will find a beautiful valley, sheltered between two hills, and lush and wooded. A few farmhouses and a few fishermen's huts composed, a few years ago, the whole of Beuzeral, when a Christian gentleman, who had left the ranks of the army, became proprietor of some land at the foot of the hill on which stands the monument to William the Conqueror. He built a house in full sea view, and a few years ago he joined him. He opened a room for service, and pastors came now and then to the country around. After a while, the friends made it their place of quiet resort for sea bathing, and became a famous resort, that chalets and other houses in all directions, and last year an elegant new stone Protestant church was opened. This year, a still more animating festival was held, the opening of an establishment for the cheap reception of those whose means would deprive them of sea bathing, when attended by a physician. On the 7th of August, being the anniversary of the opening of the church, the house was solemnly inaugurated. Twenty-three bathers were enjoying its privileges, and with other friends, had decorated it, with all the zest of love and gratitude, for the occasion. Pastor G. Monod read the 84th Psalm, and offered up a simple fervent dedicatory prayer. At eleven doors of the refectory were thrown open, Pastors Melon, of Caen, G. Monod, of Paris, Cook, of Lisieux, offered prayer in presence of a numerous auditory. They then walked to the church, which was surrounded by persons from the surrounding parishes. In the afternoon, five of the ten preachers of various denominations present exhorted the assembly. Pastor Cook insisted on the necessity of bearing fruit, not being contented with foliage. Pastor Monod, taking for his subject the cure of the pool of Bethesda, spoke of that other pool where all could find healing, even the pool of God's rich mercies. The service finished by an edifying evening service in the house, where God's Word, without note or comment, was read, and prayer was offered. As a memento of the occasion, M. Toupet presented with an elegant album, containing the portraits of those who had taken part in the arrangements of the house. Amid the decorations of the refectory was a transparency, with the words, "God is not ungrateful, to forget your work and labour of love." At the sight of it, the promoter was deeply touched, and said "he that day gave work to the Lord." The simple, earnest words of those to whom the superintendence of the bathing-house is committed promise peace and happiness to the invalid inmates shall successively enjoy its benefits.

AN OUTCAST RECLAIMED.

And now let me tell you of a modest-looking house in a distant garrison town of France, whose humble inmates have for more than twenty years been carrying on a work among soldiers, somewhat akin to Mrs. Burdett's noble work at Aldershot. Open to all, it is kept for self-improvement in reading, singing, and other studies, and Bible-classes, and exhortation, and public services carried on. Hundreds of men have left that house better soldiers and better patriots, and many have carried back to the barrack-room, the camp, and ultimately their own village home, the saving knowledge of a living Saviour. Take one instance: The lady to whom I refer and her husband had asked their Heavenly Father to direct them in their choice of a man servant. During the day following, a miserable-looking creature brought a letter from a pastor, who wrote, "I cannot recommend him; he has just been discharged from the military prison, and is under surveillance, but do what you can for him!" Said the lady, "This is the man our Heavenly Father intends for us. My friend," she added aloud, "where did you sleep last night?" "In a lodging, for four sous. I have little left; no other clothes than these tattered ones; I know not where to go, or what to do, and no one will care for me, for I am watched by the police." "We will care for you," said the lady, "you shall stay here." "Just as I am?" "Just as you are!" "But I am ill!" "We will nurse you!" "But I am weakened by want of food." "We will feed you!" "I have no other clothing." "We will clothe you!" "But of what use can I be to you?" "Of much use; you shall begin by helping the soldiers to read and write. Your past life must be a secret; no one shall ever know of it here." The man trembled, and burst into tears; "So much love, so much kindness!" was all he could say. The Christian firmness, love and confidence shown to him by husband and wife melted his heart, and his conduct wholly responded to it. After a time he sought forgiving and converting grace, and obtained it. He has lately left the Continent for America with a missionary, to be his assistant in the work of the Gospel.

INTERESTING WORK AMONG THE PARIS RAG-GATHERERS.

Let me turn now to Paris; it is three years and a-half ago. Some Christian women have met to consider how they can carry out the exhortations to holy activity they have lately heard from the foreign evangelist who so unexpectedly had stirred up all their hearts.* "Be holy, be very holy; let no one sit down in idle contemplation; work for Christ joyfully; let each choose some sphere in which to manifest love to Christ." Among many other suggestions, one was made to think of the chiffonniers, rag-gatherers, men and women who, with basket on shoulder, and lantern and sharp hooked stick in hand, ply their work at dark, picking rags and paper and similar treasures from the thousand heaps of refuse which bestrew the streets every night, until carried away by the sweepers in the morning. The suggestion fell like a command from God into the heart of a woman in humble life, whose days were free from other than household toil, and she resolved to act. After inquiry, she went to the nearest enclosure of huts devoted to this class; but the sights, sounds, and smells she encountered, forced her to effect a hasty retreat. A few days later, better knowing what to expect, she returned. This time her appearance put to flight a host of dirty, tattered children, whom, however, she tempted from their hiding place by exhibiting a sou; she found that the inner was in as bad a condition as the outer man; and, at length discovering a mother, obtained from her a hard-wrung consent that her children should learn to read. Difficult were the first steps, and when, on the second attempt at teaching, her husband proposed to commence by asking God's blessing, every one knelt in mock reverence amid shouts of laughter! Now, three years later, if the reader will accompany me to the same enclosure of huts, we shall meet children who will cry, "Bonjour, Monsieur!" and point out a centre door, saying, "There it is!" It is a large room, formed of three cabins thrown into one, flagged and whitewashed, and hung with well-worn spelling boards; in a corner is a shelf of books, and in the centre is a table. Chairs and benches fill the space, and on them sit forty or more women of all ages, decently clothed, some nursing infants, but the greater part knitting or sewing. A large chest of materials for clothing stands by the table, and all is presided over by the simple Christian woman. Prayer is offered, a hymn is sung—a joyous hymn about Canaan, and happiness, to a cheerful tune—and then a chapter from an interesting book is read by a friendly visitor, amid great attention and sometimes pertinent remarks. Next, all the names are called over, and some look up joyously, and pay in their copper or silver pieces (rescued perhaps from drink) towards the purchase of the article of clothing themselves are sewing, or the price of a Bible, which two shed tears on receiving. Others shake their heads mournfully, and hope better for next time. The Word of God is then read by another friend, and a few remarks made, during which breathless attention signs of deep emotion are shown, to with much annoyance at the interruption of a babe. Another hymn, another prayer, and the work is folded up, and kindly words are exchanged and hopes expressed for the morrow, and the assembly disperses. On the morrow is the prayer-meeting held in a Bible-woman's house, the husband of the Christian woman whose name also yearns over the chiffonniers and devotes his Sabbaths, and all the time from his labour, to their good. At eight o'clock, from fifty to sixty men and women press into the three small rooms. The first is singing, reading, exhortation—earnest, and to the point; the prayers that follow show that every word has been understood. One after another, men and women, reverently and with confidence, and yet awe, make known their requests unto God. After eight prayers, interspersed with hymns, the meeting disperses, with renewed strength to bear the burdens of mighty toil, and temptation and difficulty, and to comfort the fore men the Saviour who has saved them from the very depths. You might shake hands with a woman, now a sister in Christ, who was the vilest of the vile in the most violent of the wretched neighbourhood: "God has worked in my heart what grace!" she will, perhaps, exclaim. "We are so happy now," will the inmates of one cabin say, "the Lord has put peace and love into our hearts!" On Sundays, sixty to eighty children attend the Sunday school in the whitewashed room, and fifty to sixty parents assemble for divine service afterwards. Among those who have found peace through believing in Jesus, expressed the wish to partake of the bread and the holy wine," as they express it; and after careful conversation with a minister of the Reformed Church received the Supper last Whitsunday.

* Reginald Radcliffe.

These are examples sufficient to substantiate the assertion made in my last letter, viz., all who act with personal experience of the Lord's presence, love, and living power, are impelled to raise the song of praise, in Paris as well as elsewhere. May the ranks of the redeemed be more and more numerous, and our places shall be rebuilt, to the honour and glory of our Almighty Saviour!

SWITZERLAND.

RECENT EVENTS IN GENEVA.

Geneva, September 17, 1864.

With regard to the late events in Geneva, most state that, far from having a religious coloring, they were entirely political, and originated with men whose character, in a religious point of view, is more negative than active. But it is not impossible that they may prove important with regard to our religious affairs, as irreligion was a main cause of that deplorable position out of which may please God now to relieve us.

It is well known that for eighteen years the Radical party in Geneva has exercised a power which they only gained by violent means. James Fazy, their head, and the most talented man amongst them, has been not only a dictator, perpetuating his reign by the aid of forced majorities, and exhausting the finances of the State to that degree, that whereas twenty years ago there was absolutely no debt, Geneva has now a debt of 800,000*l.*, 10*l.* a-head for the population, and the debt increases at the rate of 40,000*l.* annually. The eyes of many have been gradually blinded by such reckless conduct; the people seem to perceive that they have been deceived and despoiled, and now turn to the Government from which alone they can expect safety and prudence in the management of public affairs. The Radical party would not hear of any less obnoxious candidate, although James Fazy had been beaten in the successive elections, and they had been told that his name would call forth united, as it proved, efficient resistance. He was defeated, but they would not submit to the result, and hence all the evils that followed. The directing committee of the election, the majority of which was Radical, in the most arbitrary way presumed to annul the election, which had gone against them. The majority of the electors, thus robbed of their victory, insisted that the Council of the State (the Executive), composed entirely of Radical members, should publish the result of the poll in the usual manner. The Government consented to this, and it was while accompanying the officers who were making the publication that the inoffensive and peace-loving citizens of the Conservative party, styling themselves Independents, were surrounded by an armed band, who were firing for them. The firing was maintained some time. Four dead and sixteen wounded are officially reported. Cannon balls and grape were placed at the head of the Rue du Mont Blanc, up which the crowd was advancing, and it was owing to Providential circumstances that they were not fired—the havoc might have been frightful. The Radical party have done their utmost to mislead public opinion by the name of civil war. But it must be clearly branded with its proper word, assassination. The fact is decisive that all the victims are on one side. The Radicals cannot show a wounded man of their party.

The Federal authority has been appealed to. Geneva is occupied by a garrison of 2,000 men of the Federal troops. The election is declared valid by the Federal Council at Berne, and a judicial investigation is set on foot by the same power.

In all this there is nothing religious: the only point of connexion is the fact, that having divided the Protestant population by exciting the passions and jealousy of the poorer class against the rich, the leaders of the Radical party, sacrificing everything to their own advantage, raised themselves chiefly by the aid of the Roman Catholics, whose votes they paid by giving them every possible help. As far as we can judge, it is under the auspices of that Government that Rome has lately planned the introduction of a Roman Catholic bishop in Geneva. The bishop of the Catholic canton of Fribourg formerly held the united title of Bishop of Lausanne and Geneva. But it seems that Geneva is now on the eve of being endowed with a bishop of its own. I suppose they think their progress sufficient to justify the measure, or they hope the new institution will add to their influence—perhaps both.

While politics occupy public attention, religious men are above all interested in the possible change in the direction of affairs. Looking upwards, they try to read the signs of the times. The downfall of the Radical party may considerably alter the position of the Roman Catholics; not by depriving them of any lawful rights, but by putting an end to that exceptional favour they systematically claim as simple justice. It is true that in the course of twenty years they have grown more powerful. But on the other side, the progress of Evangelical principles has been great, and the Protestants are now unquestionably better prepared to resist the Roman Catholic aggression, because the light of the Gospel is increasing amongst them.

A recent example proved this last assertion,

illustrating once more a fact already observed, that the revival of faith and life is often more earnest with the laity than with the clergy. M. Réville, a French pastor in Holland, is a man whose unbelieving tendencies, to use a mild expression, are universally known. He wished to preach in Geneva, and with that view applied to the Venerable Company of the National Church, who, after some very vague inquiry as to his doctrine, decided on giving him this opportunity. But the disposal of the pulpits belongs to the Consistory, a body composed chiefly of lay members. These were more stringent in their investigation; they judged his answers unsatisfactory, and they closed the churches of the National Establishment against him.

M. Réville, of course, smarted under this proceeding, although his unchristian views certainly deserved no better treatment. In his wrath he has published a sermon called "The Salt of the Earth," with the invidious note on the title page, that this sermon had been preached in Paris and elsewhere, but could not be preached in Geneva. His aim appears to have been to bring reproach upon those who had marked him as a foe. He was mistaken—all who value the truth as it is in Jesus must honour the Consistory, whose reproof was aimed, not at that particular piece of pulpit oratory, nor even at the man, but at those principles subversive of all faith which M. Réville maintains, and which they most justly reprove.

ITALY.

Florence, September 15, 1864.

AN ATTEMPTED PERVERSION.

English society here is greatly excited by a case of attempted perversion, which has happily been frustrated. Mrs. C——, widow of an English clergyman, came to reside in Florence eighteen months ago with her three daughters. A distant relative, in the person of Marchesa B——, a pervert to Rome, made their acquaintance last winter, and showed the young ladies kindness. Entirely ignorant that the Marchesa's name was deservedly in bad odour in Tuscany, the eldest daughter, twenty-two years of age, went on a visit to her at Lucca for two months this summer.

Ten days ago, a letter came from the young lady, stating that she was about to enter the Church of Rome, begging her mother's consent and blessing, and promising in a few days to send a description of the ceremony and the dress she wore on the occasion. The mother was stunned by the intelligence, which no previous whisper or suggestion had prepared her for. The British Consul and other friends could render no help beyond counselling the parent to write, recalling her child home, and, failing instant obedience, to go in search of her daughter, who was said to be already hidden in some unknown convent. After several days of dreadful anxiety, the young lady made her appearance, and after an hour or two's earnest conversation over the open Bible, renounced every idea of Romanism, which she had been led to accept under peculiar circumstances. It appears that from the time of her arrival at Lucca she has been surrounded with perverts, priests, nuns, and members of the bigoted aristocracy of the neighbourhood. She was never left alone, and never free from questionings and reasonings on the one subject of Catholicism. The Jesuit influence was skilfully instilled. Mild remonstrances against her objections to Rome and to marrying a Catholic husband who might offer himself, were succeeded by positive assertions of a dogmatic kind, supported by Scripture quotations, and climaxed by frenzied denunciation of all who were out of the pale of the Church, as children of the devil and irremediably doomed to perdition. The young lady wished to leave, or at least to inform her mother, but the slightest reference to the subject, in her letters, was prohibited. At last victory seemed certain. The priest certified her entire fitness to be received into communion, but the bishop, retrograde and ultramontane though he is, required the mother's consent, or a further delay of three months. This alarmed and irritated the Marchesa and her assistants, and the Cardinal Archbishop of Pisa was written to, and offered to perform the rite. A happier thought, however, occurred to the mind of this active pervert, and as it was applauded by the busy priest, it was immediately put in action. The victim of their united cajolery seemed so docile to their instructions, and so well grounded in her new faith, that she was sent home to convert her mother and sisters, that with great delight the whole family might be welcomed at once into the true fold of Christ. And thus she escaped as a bird from the snare of the fowler. The crucifix and other trappings of Rome are so long kept.

To say that cases of perversion in English are becoming rare in the present age are formerly they were of common occurrence. One of the grounds on which the Grand Duke was deservedly disappointed (may he long remain mayor of the Italian village of Schlachenwerth), is with which he enticed away converts from their faith, through evening receptions and Sabbath sermons. Catholic-born Italians are full of foreign perverts, who, by hypocrisy, seek to cloak over their previous heretical opinions, and it is held up as an action of merit to save the souls of their converts and country-folk. Nothing is so easy as to see the facility with which perverts adopt the maxims and maxims, and scruple not to swerve and deal in pious frauds, so abhorrent to English taste, if only the inalienable religion can be advanced.

POPE AND HIS POLICY.

The Pope still retains the Jew Cohen in his household though the boy's mother is in a state of distress and the father is overwhelmed. The people of Italy are shocked at the proceedings. The counsellors are taking the surest and shortest way of winning sympathy from their cause. The morbid spirit of Rome is not to be accounted for this injudicious policy. The Papacy is blinded by the Pope, and is hurrying fast to her ruin. It says the Italian press. Instead of fresh cases of a similar kind are as if that were not enough to the feelings of society, the Papal has thrown the broad shield of its power over the brigand Crocco, the villain whose deeds of villany, proved in the law-courts of the South, columns of all the Italian newspapers as a monster in human form, instead of being handed over to the Government for his crimes, is kindly treated in prison, his pilfered treasures are being sold. To-day he hears that the tunnel through the Apennines has been successfully bored, and that the steam-horse runs from Florence to Bologna in three hours, bringing Tuscany into closest connexion with the northern provinces. To-morrow he must listen to the joy of Italy when the rail along the whole Adriatic shore is completed, circling round the Papal dominions to unite Naples to Turin, and carrying the Indian mails from Brindisi to England two days sooner than by the present route. Great as the progress of Italy in all departments is, the Pope has sworn to arrest it, cost what it may. He knows whither all this is tending, as well as any English patriot. Freedom in Italy is death to him. Liberty of conscience here must seal his fate in Rome. The vast resources of the Papacy, the wide world over, are deployed to arrest the advance of the nineteenth century. De Merode has carried to Belgium and France 40,000 photographs of Pio Nono, and 3,000 briefs of indulgence, while Monsignor Talbot and Hohenlohe start for Spain and Austria laden with like merchandise, to recruit the treasury of the Holy See, and rouse the devotion of the faithful.

CONFLICT BETWEEN JESUITS AND PEOPLE.

The Mechlin Congress recommends what is being extensively practised in Italy, the establishment of numerous Church newspapers, seven of which have lately been started in Florence alone, to deceive the public. An original portrait of the Saviour is discovered in Rome, and at Chiancino, and in many a country district, Madonnas are shedding tears, and statues of Christ are restless in their niches. And most serious of all, a new Jesuit organization has spread its network over the nations of Europe, and is labouring with all the secrecy and influence of the powers of darkness. The Society of St. Vincent de Paul—the Paolotti, as Italians call them—are to be found everywhere, in the palace and the prison, in the courts of justice and the Cabinet Council, in the camp and the counting-house, the Parliament and the press, the shop and the highest circles of society. Ladies are foremost in the work, and influential so-called liberal laymen join the intrigue, and give standing to the system. Tuscany is more warped and fettered than other provinces of Italy. Discontent is fostered among the people, disloyalty is taught in schools, even-handed justice is tampered with, and ecclesiastical treason is passed over. Anxiety is wide-spread as to the issue of this impending and severe conflict. The Ministry pretend that they know the hidden movements of the foe, while the people proclaim that the Government is not alive to the danger. Can you wonder that a free press speaks out unwelcome truths about Popery? Can you wonder that Parliament pushes on the sale of Church lands, the seizure of monasteries, the legalising of civil marriages? Can you wonder that far and near the conviction is deepening that Rome must be still further shorn of her splendour, by the repeal of the first article of the Constitution, which constitutes the Catholic Church the Church of the State, with ten thousand advantages?

PROGRESS OF EVANGELIZATION IN THE NORTH.

I subjoin a few evangelization notes. From Milan we hear of the happy death, confiding in Christ as his Saviour, of an old soldier of Napoleon I., who had received the truth in England, and joined the Evangelical Church when he came to reside in Italy.

From Turin we learn that an excellent system is in operation, under the direction of Pastors Meille and Jalla, for retaining under Gospel influences the young Waldenses who leave the Valleys for service in the capital. Not only does each emigrant carry a letter from her parish minister to the evangelist of the town she is going to, but that evangelist is also written to by her minister, giving information as to her address, &c. It appears that lately there were between 300 and 400 females from the Valleys in Turinese service, and that only about one-half were known by the evangelists. Such are the temptations of city life, that not a few of these are found, through their Valley names, in the house of maternity or in other national establishments, having foresworn the faith of their ancestors. This plague of the Church, as it was called at last Synod, now enlists the sympathies and prayers of the Valley populations. But for the exigencies of the Italian field, it would be well also that more special provision were made for the 1,000 Waldensians in Marseilles, and the 500 or 600 in Lyons, who presently are left very much to the care of French pastors, with an occasional visit from a deputy of the Church in Valleys.

A good work is going on in the village Peraz di San Martino, in the vicinity of Turin. It was commenced by an humble instrument, an ignorant but well-meaning workman, who embraced the Gospel, and forthwith bestowed all his efforts on the conversion of his immediate relatives. One after another, a wife, brother, a sister, a sister-in-law, were gained in answer to prayer. A little réunion de worship was begun in the family, and neighbours were invited. The thing was largely talked of in the neighbourhood, until the small band of fervent disciples has grown into a large congregation.

One of the most active and loving members of the Turin Waldensian Church is a Neapolitan, who fought in the defence of Venice in 1848, and not only received a severe wound in the arm, which greatly hinders him from working for his family support, but was exiled for his then fruitless patriotism to the North. Brought to Christ through the efforts of other two Neapolitan members of the Turin Church, he has been distinguished for the thoroughness of his conversion and the exhibition of the fruits of the Spirit. He has not received the Gospel partially. He was a fervent Catholic, as now is an equally zealous Evangelical. He was at first tempted to force his bigoted wife to think as he did, but her persistent resistance led him to renounce violence and to show, by the kindness of his spirit and the purity of his life, the true character of the Gospel he had received into his heart. The Christian joy of the husband was soon overflowing, for the wife soon began to leave the religion of the priests, and after many attempts to go to church, which failed, from a more powerful inner voice driving her away, she finally entered the gates of Zion, was caught by sovereign grace, and has joined the number of communicants. Though the parents were now united in the same faith and hope, she resolved to leave their only daughter, aged of fourteen, free to choose for herself. The young woman, however, has lately gone of her own accord to the Evangelical school, stating that as the Catholic religion is idolatry for her parents, it is so for her, and that as they believe it to be error, it is right for her to think so too.

At Bergamo the priests have publicly declared the excommunication to the fourth generation of all who go to hear the evangelist.

PAVIA AND BRESCIA.

At Pavia a new place of worship has been opened, the steady adherents are numerous, and the dissension incident upon the opening of an opposition centre of evangelization of a political nature, has fortunately disappeared by the withdrawal of the disturber, Signor Giovannetti, formerly a Garibaldian chaplain.

A Brescia the priests exhibit for the veneration of the devout the sacred images of the Madonna, and fervently supplicate the people to avoid as they would a pestilence the false religion of the Evangelicals. They appeal to the renowned valour of the Brescians, and warmly urge that the hated doctrines of Protestantism should be cast back to London, from which they say they come. But the same vigorous champions of the Papacy refuse to discuss their points of difference with the evangelist loyally and publicly. After much empty boasting that he would accept the challenge and defeat the followers of Calvin, a well-known professor excuses himself for not entering the lists, now on one ground, now on another—either that the bishop will not permit him, or that the Evangelical place of meeting does not possess a sufficiently good reputation. A fanatical maker of crucifixes in the town, posted up in controversy by the priests, has been often seen discontentedly listening to the Gospel preacher. With other twenty comrades, he recently paid an evening visit to the evangelist's house, expressing their united desire to know the truth. The evangelist had scarcely learned their ostensible purpose, when they plied him with numberless silly objections and arguments, and when hard pressed in the debate, one of the party produced from a marketing basket he carried the folio edition, with notes, of Martini's Bible. As none of the men could do more than point to the Archbishop's Popish commentaries on various texts, the evangelist had an easy victory, and begged them to send a foeman worthy of his steel, in the person of one of their priests, to discuss these topics, but neither priest nor crucifix-maker have returned to the charge.

From a statement of accounts published by Dr. Stewart, who has personally raised all the moneys for this object, we notice that the Leghorn Waldensian Church and schools have cost 2,000*l.*, and that the buildings are now free of debt.

DISSENSIONS IN NAPLES.

Sad things are enacting in Naples. A centre of evangelization, "not destitute of elements of strength and usefulness, is perishing by a suicidal act," as a well-informed friend writes to me. The walls of Naples are covered with placards announcing free discussions on the liturgy and confession of the Waldensian Church, compared with the Word of God, in the Mezzacannone Church. The substance of the speeches is reported in their organ, the Coscienza; but the tenor of them will be guessed by my readers from the samples of the opinions of that journal given in your August number. The aim of such discussions is more vindictive than evangelistic, though a tone of dispassionateness is assumed. Signor Albarella, both preacher and editor, has taken umbrage at the refusal of money on the part of the Naples Evangelization-Aid Society, and so the members of that committee and the Waldensian pastor in Naples, whose hands they chiefly strengthen, and Dr. De Sanctis, who is now co-operating with the Waldenses and the Scotch ministers in Tuscany—who have ever stood their friends—are subjected, one after another, to a series of most defamatory attacks; one of the instruments with which Signor Albarella serves himself for this purpose being a Signor Boryoni, who left Florence three years ago under a very dark cloud. The Wesleyan missionaries in Italy inform me that "after battling as best they could against this unjust and unrighteous war, they have withdrawn from communion with Albarella and his church," whom they have recently aided. We grieve over the ruin of a congregation and the injury inflicted on individual souls, while, on public grounds, we have reason to rejoice that latent false doctrine, which has been one of the chief obstacles to God's cause in Italy, is developing itself, opening the eyes of really Christian converts, and forcing together all who love the Lord Jesus in sincerity. In God's overruling providence, there never was more genuine fraternal intercourse and co-operation among Christians in Italy than at the present time, when the sound of battle and the clash of arms have been so distinctly heard. This is the best augury for a revival of the Lord's work among us, and the more constant exhibition of love among brethren and united effort against the common foe. The basis of an Evangelical Alliance has been laid in conflict and suffering, and you will shortly hear that it is no longer an impossibility, but an accomplished fact, that Christians of various denominations dwell together here in unity.

PASSAGLIA AND HIS JOURNAL.

La Pace, the daily journal of Passaglia, the head of the neo-Catholic movement, has just stopped. The ex-Jesuit editor accounts for the misfortune from the prevailing religious indifferentism and the fostering of reaction through feeble legislation. Probably a truer cause lies in the wide-spread distrust of Passaglia, whose speeches in Parliament have been singularly unfortunate and ill-received both in and out of doors. It is rare to find a priest who has been able to emancipate himself not only from the system of Rome, but from all the evil habits of thought and action generated by the system. It must be much rarer to find a human being, trained from infancy after the precepts of Loyola, and displaying in manhood the ability of a Passaglia in defending the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, escaping from the meshes of dishonesty and cunning.

POSTSCRIPT.

Florence, September 20, 1864.

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT — THE FRENCH TROOPS TO BE WITHDRAWN FROM ROME.

The important news has just arrived that the French Emperor has entered into a convention with the Italian Government, guaranteeing the withdrawal of the French troops from Rome within two years. One of the conditions of the compact is that the capital of the Italian kingdom should in the meantime be transferred from Turin to Florence. The facts are made known through the official organs of the Government, and will give great joy to the people. However distant the prospect, all uncertainty as to the definite solution of the Roman question is now at an end. Next month we shall be better able to explain this mutual understanding of the French and Italian Cabinets, but I cannot refrain from calling the attention of the Christian public to the remarkable coincidence that the evacuation of Rome by French troops, now solemnly agreed upon, will take place in 1866, the year to which all interpreters of prophecy point as the era of signal occurrences in the history of the Man of Sin.

GERMANY.

Frankfort, September 15, 1864.

MANIFESTO OF THE ECCLESIASTICAL COUNCIL OF CARLSRUHE ON DR. SCHENKEL'S BOOK.

Politics are slumbering. The meetings of the Parliamentary Chambers on the approach of winter will awaken them. For the moment we have only the last act of the Dano-German drama which is unfolding at Vienna, where peace will be concluded, perhaps, this very day. The future will show whether this peace can be enduring. Meanwhile, let us occupy ourselves for this once with certain facts which are fitted to characterise the religious and ecclesiastical situation of Germany.

Public opinion was awaiting with impatience, and with very opposite sentiments of hope and fear, the reply of the ecclesiastical authorities of Carlsruhe in the conflict excited by the last book by Dr. Schenkel, of Heidelberg, of which I informed your readers in my previous letter. They will no doubt remember that 117 pastors of the Grand Duchy of Baden had published a protest against the destructive principles of this book, and had addressed a petition to the Ecclesiastical Council of Carlsruhe, asking for the removal of Dr. Schenkel, not as a Professor of the University, but as Principal of the Theological Seminary, where all the young ministers of the country are obliged to spend one year, for the completion of their studies. I have also stated that a meeting, which consisted of more than 600 gentlemen, had been held at Durlach, and had adopted resolutions opposed to the measure of the ministers, and had taken the part of Dr. Schenkel. Since then, a third meeting, composed wholly of laymen of the country, has sustained the application of the pastors, grounding itself upon the Apostles' Creed, the foundation of the faith of the Christian Church, but shaken and destroyed, as they think, by the teaching of Dr. Schenkel. Even the diocesan synods have officially entertained the question, and have decided, some for and others against the Heidelberg professor. You will easily understand how lively was the interest which was felt in the decision of the ecclesiastical authorities of the country.

This decision has now been published. Notwithstanding the moderation, the elevated views, and the ability which characterise this document, it is none the less a very distinct refusal to proceed against the author of the book incriminated, and is even a long apology for the position assumed in the Church by Dr. Schenkel. The principal reasons of the Ecclesiastical Council are the following: The book in question is a scientific work, intended, not for the people, but for the learned, and it would be contrary to the principles of Protestantism to forcibly impose limits to scientific investigations. If this book is found to be in opposition to the Church's confessions of faith, these confessions by themselves, may ought, to be constantly submitted afresh to the examination of natural science. As for Scripture itself less assailed by the negative principles of Dr. Schenkel than are the confessions of the Church, the duty of the theologian is to inquire into its historical facts, in order to understand and appreciate them all the better, and in order to attain even to a conception of the Saviour's person, which may possibly differ from the views of the ancient Church. There are no dangers in the investigations of science among a people altogether imbued with the principles of Christianity; but there would be great danger, even to religion itself, if the elements of Christianity were enabled to resist that free investigation is forcibly stifled by authority. As for the young ministers, summoned to examine everything, it would lead for them to remain in ignorance of the various tendencies of their age upon which they are called to exercise their influence.

It is apparent that there is some truth in the views of the Ecclesiastical Council; but they nevertheless involve a principle which lies immensely far—namely, that the Protestant Church of the Grand Duchy of Baden, which had hitherto rested upon the foundations of the Reformation, is henceforth without any doctrinal basis, and is surrendered to all the variations of unlimited freedom of thinking. This is, at bottom, a denial of the very notion of a Christian Church. But can we expect anything else of a National Church which draws no distinction between the heathen and the Christian, and which depends upon the universal vote of the masses? This will appear in broad daylight when the question is brought before the General Synod. In the meantime, it is asked, what are those who signed the protest and the petition going to do? In a country where the Church was dependent of the State, their way would be marked out; they might separate from a Church which in their eyes denies the foundations of the Christian faith, and might constitute themselves an independent church. In Germany, where all conceive of the Church only in its national form, the case is wholly different, and nothing of this sort will take place for a long time to come. However it may be, these conflicts will eventually be to the advantage of the faith among our people.

MANIFESTATIONS OF RELIGIOUS LIFE.

Thanks be to God, amid these sadly negative tendencies of Germany, manifestations of Christian faith and religious life are also not wanting. At the very time I am writing, the Kirchentag, assembled at Altenburg, is uttering, by the mouth of a large number of the most eminent theologians of our age, a striking testimony to the eternal divinity of the Saviour. This will gladden the Christians of all countries, as much as they had been grieved by the attacks of rationalism in the form of those "Lives of Jesus" which are nothing but caricatures of Him who came to seek and to save that which was lost. Having been myself unable to take part in this great assembly, I shall hasten to obtain accounts of its proceedings, as soon as they make their appearance, in order to acquaint your readers with them.

Another manifestation of religious life, and one which is becoming more and more frequent in Germany, is the various missionary meetings, which prove to the localities where they are held real popular religious festivals. It is more particularly in country parishes that these assemblies assume a character at once picturesque and edifying. I lately attended one of these festivals, which might supply your readers with some idea of what they are. Let them imagine an immense old Benedictine convent, situated in the Grand Duchy of Hesse, amid the fertile lands of Wetteravia, and which is now a great farmhouse. Notice had been given in the surrounding district that a missionary festival would take place there. From early morning there were to be seen, passing within the old walls of the convent, peasants of both sexes, in their picturesque national costume, coming to take their place within an enclosure prepared in the open air, under the magnificent trees of a forest, which formed a noble cathedral. The singing of our beautiful German hymns, accompanied by wind instruments, which pious young men have learned to play expressly to enliven these festivals, sounded far away into the fields. These hymns, followed by prayers for the advancement of the kingdom of Jesus Christ, and various addresses, succeeded one another from ten in the morning to five in the afternoon. The only interruption was for an hour in the middle of the day, when the assembly dispersed to take some refreshment, to return to the meeting after dinner, when it formed a long procession, which advanced, singing a hymn, into the enclosure, where it was eager to hear the news relating to the evangelization of the world. There were to be seen the lords of the place, a prince, a count, and their families, mingled among their peasantry, closing the pious procession. The pastors present at these festivals usually spend the rest of the day in fraternal conferences, or still continue to interest groups of country people who wish to profit till the last moment by the presence of their guests. There are also collections made for the missionary work, and the results are often much superior to what are realised, taking all things into account, in great and wealthy places. When we recollect that this missionary spirit pervades more and more our Protestant population, and that these assemblies annually multiply in every district, we cannot doubt that there is here among unbelieving and indifferent multitudes a people of God who will always be the salt of the earth. I have told you that the general assembly of the Gustavus-Adolphus Society has not been held this year. As a set off to this, the auxiliary societies of this great association in every Protestant country of Germany have their individual annual assemblies, which are often of much interest. Here, as in all causes which have for their object the promotion of the kingdom of God, Wurtemberg occupies a conspicuous position. On the 3rd of August last, the Christians of this province held their Gustavus-Adolphus Society's meeting at Göppingen, a station on the railway between Stuttgart and the Lake of Constance. The labours of the meeting were preceded by a solemn religious service, at which Mr. Blumhardt, one of the most eminent of the pastors of Germany, for his piety, his activity, and his influence, took the chair. He made them feel deeply conscious of the blessings which rest upon this society, as well on those who give as on those who receive. The report showed, by the most cheering facts, that this work is in full prosperity in Wurtemberg. The receipts have surpassed by 6,000 florins (600*l.*) those of last year, so that nearly 24,000 florins (2,400*l.*) have been obtained for distribution among the poor communities which are the objects of this charity. If we consider the smallness of Wurtemberg, which is only half Protestant, and the little wealth there is in the country, we shall find that this amount is a noble offering of benevolence.

CONFLICTS IN CATHOLICISM.

We have often to describe conflicts in our Protestant churches. If we speak more rarely of those which disturb Catholicism, it should not thence be concluded that they do not exist. They are none the less profound for being less noisy. A spirit of scientific investigation and of inquiry has been awakened of late years among the learned Catholics of Bavaria. I have spoken formerly in these letters of a serious conflict which has arisen between a professor of the University of Munich, Dr. Froschammer, and the Holy See. This learned gentleman, who maintains in a periodical which is widely circulated the rights of science which Rome always regards with antipathy, is not the only literary man of this country who pursues this course. There is a society of learned men which has hitherto held its annual meetings at Munich. But the bishops became alarmed at it; the matter was referred to Rome, and the Pope, without interdicting the society, has imposed upon it such conditions, that it becomes impossible for it to exist. Every meeting must be authorised by the bishop of the diocese in which it would assemble; the list of persons invited and of subjects to be treated of must be communicated beforehand; the bishop must have the right to expunge from the programme subjects which it may appear inconvenient to have discussed; and the transactions of the meeting cannot be published until they have received the approbation of the bishop. In the face of these conditions, the society has thought it a duty to abandon the holding of its meeting, which was to have taken place in September, at Würzburg.* Is this a victory for Romanism? We rather believe that it is in this way that the Church of the middle ages will succeed in committing suicide.

Things are not much better in the Grand Duchy of Baden, where, on occasion of a re-organization of schools, the Archbishop of Friburg, armed with a brief from the Pope, has entered upon open war with the Government, and has caused great agitation among the Catholic party in this small country. The Minister for the Home Department has published against the Archbishop a manifesto of so much energy, that the prelate has not much room to promise himself the victory. So, then, the Government of this Grand Duchy is at once in hostility with the Catholics and the Protestants! When will the State and the Church understand that there is but one way for them to live in peace—mutual independence and liberty!

[* A German Catholic Association has met at Würzburg, and adopted five resolutions of a political religious character, and in favour of ultra Roman claims. This cannot be the society referred to by the correspondent?]

THOSE WHO HAVE ENTERED INTO THEIR REST.

The Lutheran Church of Germany has this year very sensibly suffered by the losses which have been inflicted upon it by death. Dr. Auberlen, Professor of Theology at the University of Basle, still quite a young man, and one who gave the fairest hopes by his wisdom and piety, has entered into his eternal rest, after a long and painful illness. He leaves behind valuable works in theological literature; among others, a book upon the prophecies of Daniel and of the apocalypse, and the first volume of a defence of Christianity, which makes us deeply regret that the work is left unfinished. His career has been brief, but well filled up, and he leaves a profound impression of affection and regret.

Another witness for Jesus Christ arrived at a far more advanced age—Pastor Knapp, of Stuttgart, has been removed this year from a Church which loved and prized him.

Eminent as a pastor and a preacher, Mr. Knapp was known and esteemed in all Germany as a poet and a religious writer. He leaves vacant at Stuttgart a place which cannot be filled for a long time to come.

Lastly, I will mention with affectionate remembrance the name of an English brother, who has been settled for long years in Germany, where he has done much good by his zealous activity—I mean Dr. Marriott, who in a modest but very useful sphere of action has left behind the good fruits of his labour. His work consisted in getting printed and circulated, by myriads of copies, tracts and religious books, the selection of which bore the stamp of his strong Evangelical convictions. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord!" May God give to His Church witnesses for the truth, who shall come to fill the places which death makes vacant every day!

TURKEY.

Constantinople, September, 1864.

THE CRUSADE AGAINST PROTESTANT MISSIONS.

It is manifest to every impartial observer of events that there is a deliberate purpose on the part of the Turkish Government, as well as of certain other parties, to weaken, and possibly destroy, the Protestant missions in Turkey—at least, so far as they are directed against Mohammedanism. Never before have these missions had to meet such a combined and desperate attack. Never have they been so much in need of the support of the Christian men of England; and they call upon every one who loves the Lord Jesus to give their case a careful and patient hearing. The English Government has condemned them, unheard, on the testimony of the British Ambassador. They appeal to the English people.

THE CHARGES BROUGHT AGAINST THE MISSIONARIES.

On the 4th of August the Journal de Constantinople, which is the property and the official organ of the Porte, contained an official statement, from which the following extracts are made. After stating that persuasion is the only allowable means of proselytism, it is necessary to prove now that the prosecution of the Protestant missionaries has not been confined to this means? We have not yet forgotten the excitement they have produced among the Christian sects of Turkey. The Government has restrained religious passions, but they have attacked free convictions or sincere conversions—but what protection can be asked from it against the purest religious feeling raised by a proselytism which, in the name of liberty of conscience, comes to insult the religion of the country, and to preach openly in the khans and public places the falsity of that religion? The dignity of the faith which they seek to propagate by such means must be the first to suffer. The Protestant missions, we regret to say, have not always recoiled before such means.

A paper which will not be taxed with exaggeration, the Levant Herald [the organ of the British Embassy in Constantinople], has itself stated that they have given themselves to a persistent aggression, to a veritable war of religion. Their proselytism has taken a violent and passionate character, pushing itself everywhere, without any reserve or any respect for the faith of others. . . . A still more efficacious means which Protestant proselytism has used in Turkey, and upon which we do not wish to insist here, is bribery (seduction), which is condemned at once by policy and morality. Finally, this propaganda, of which the Mussulman religion has been the object, has not even submitted itself to those salutary formalities practised in favour of other religions, and which, in putting the new converts in communication with their relations and the authorities of the religion which they wish to abandon—make it possible to assure the freedom and sincerity of their conversion. Thus have Protestant missionaries understood and practised their profession, and thus has the son often been torn from the religion of his fathers, and discord been sown in the heart of families in the name of eternal morality.

The same paper has reproduced articles from the London Times and the Morning Post, in one of which the preaching of the missionaries is described as having become "nothing more nor less than a perfect hailstorm of abuse directed against the Mohammedan religion—against the Prophet and the Koran, and, consequently, against the Sultan himself." In another, they are charged with having "reviled the Prophet," and with doing the very thing which the Christians had formerly complained of the Turks doing to them. "It now seems," we are told, "that the toleration, equality, liberty, or what not, which these gentlemen demand, is a very one-sided kind of thing. They want full permission to insult Mohammedanism, and full security against insult from all Christians. If these black-coated zealots wish respect and toleration for their own faith, they must respect and tolerate that of others." It is also stated that, by the arrangement of the British Ambassador, "the Bible can no longer be gratuitously distributed in the streets." The Journal also quotes from the Gazette du Midi to the effect that the missionaries lead "their numerous converts to force their new views tyrannically upon their wives and children."

The Rev. Mr. Curtis waited on the manager of the Journal de Constantinople, and requested permission to insert a reply to his article of August 4. He was coolly informed that if his reply was fully in accordance with the article, it could be inserted, but that otherwise it was inadmissible, as the article was official.

We may sum up these charges against the missionaries as follows: These "black-coated zealots" have distributed the Bible gratis in the streets. They have preached and reviled Mahomet in the streets, squares, coffee-houses, and klans of Stamboul. They have bought converts with money when other means failed. They have not confined themselves to quiet persuasion, but have poured out a perfect hailstorm of passionate abuse upon the religion of the Sultan in the streets and public places, disgracing the Christian name, and causing such intense excitement among the people, as to endanger the peace of the city. They have forced their faith on women and children, and torn sons from the bosom of their families and the faith of their fathers. They have claimed a sort of religious freedom which they do not give themselves.

The unofficial papers of Constantinople republish all these charges, and many others like them. The Catholic press of Europe join in the chorus. A reference to the documents published by the Evangelical Alliance will show that these charges are not confined to official and semi-official newspapers, but are in substance made by Aali Pasha and Sir Henry Bulwer in their official communications.

ARE THESE CHARGES TRUE?

It is evident, from the tone of all the articles quoted above, that the action of the Turkish Government can be justified only on the supposition that these charges are true. If they are true, the Turkish Government and the British Ambassador have done well, so far as they have acted lawfully. If they are false, there is no excuse for their action. The whole question, then, should turn upon this point: Are these charges true or false? The following facts, which can be proved any day before the Supreme Consular Court at Constantinople, will enable the Christian public to form an opinion:—

1. No Bibles have been distributed gratuitously in the streets of Constantinople for many years, and it is the policy of both the Bible and Missionary Societies not to give away any books in the streets or in any other place.

2. No missionary or native helper has ever preached in any street, square, or public place in Constantinople—either abusively or otherwise—street preaching never having been adopted by any missionary society in Constantinople.

3. No man, woman, or child in Constantinople has ever been bribed, directly or indirectly, to become a Protestant by any missionary or native helper.

4. No missionary or native helper has ever preached or lectured against Mohammedanism in any place in Constantinople, except as the preaching of Christianity implies the falsity of Mohammedanism.

5. So far as I can learn, no missionary or native helper has ever visited any Mohammedan's private house without special invitation, and religious conversations have almost invariably been carried on in private houses and in two or three quiet retired rooms hired for this purpose. It is not possible for any one to say exactly what the nature of these private conversations has been, but I cannot learn that they have in any single instance led to any unpleasant results.

6. There has never been any great excitement in connexion with any public service for Mohammedans in either of the missionary chapels. The whole number of baptizing Turks connected with all the Protestant missionary societies in Turkey must be under fifty, and I have never heard of any Protestant religious service in Turkey at which more than twenty-five Turks were present at one time. The more common numbers are from one to eight.

7. No missionary in Turkey has ever had either the will or the power to force Protestantism upon any one. The charge is simply unfounded.

8. In reference to the last charge, I cannot bear quoting a private letter which I received yesterday from the venerable Dr. Dell, who has been a missionary of the American Board in Turkey for forty years. He says :—

See the Morning Post, as quoted in the Levant, which accuses the missionaries of doing the very worst to the Mussulmans which we complained of for doing to the native Protestants before the establishment of religious liberty. Does the Morning Post understand what it says? Does it know what the Protestants complained of? It is not that their religion was reviled and their persons cast out as evil. All this they could have borne to life's end, without rendering evil for evil in return for the interference of Government. But it is that the converts were thrown into dungeons or banished to distant parts. It was that they were all cut off from bread and water, and from all employment, their protection papers were taken from them, and they left to die in the streets. Now have the missionaries or the Mussulman converts been guilty of doing anything of the kind? If so, when and where? If not, then the whole reasoning of the Morning Post is singularly out of place. Indeed, it has no pertinency whatever, and will not come to the notice of our English friends, who will point out the great error into which the Morning Post has fallen, and the great injustice it has done us? And at the same time, let them not fail to represent that the Mussulman converts, after forty-five days of imprisonment, without being brought to any trial or being charged with a single crime proved against them—two of them have been exiled, while all the others remain in prison. May the Lord give us patience and grace in this day of rebuke and blasphemy.

It is hardly necessary to add anything to show that the charges brought against the missionaries are altogether without foundation, and were known to be so by every man in Constantinople who cared to inform himself of the facts. With the exception of occasional instances of imprudence in conversation on the part of one or two who have been students of the missionaries, if any indiscretion has been committed by them, it has been in the publication of the book alluded to in my last letter, "The Balance of Truth." Rev. Dr. Ffander accepts the full responsibility of this publication, and if it were by an abusive or violent book, the Turkish Government had only to apply to the English Consular Court for redress—this Court having full authority to suppress any publication, and even to send the author out of the country, if necessary.

As we have said, the American Mission did not approve of the publication of this work at the present time, but it was not because the book contained anything violent or abusive; it was simply because they thought that the time had not yet come for the publication in Turkey of any direct attack upon Mohammedanism, or of any book which was controversial in its nature, it being their general policy to avoid direct controversy as far as possible. In other respects the invidious distinction made by certain parties between the English and American missionaries is not well-founded.

THE SECRET HISTORY OF THIS CRUSADE.

After six weeks of careful and patient examination of all the facts within reach, I am prepared to express a decided opinion as to the origin and design of this movement. I believe that most of those who have entered upon a similar examination have come to the same general conclusion, and, however painful it may be, I believe it should be made known to the Christian world.

It will be remembered that I have spoken in previous letters of certain mysterious movements among the Mohammedans in Constantinople, as well as of the exaggerated reports of the numbers converted to Christianity by the missionaries. It seems to be true that there are at present several large parties among the Turks who are agitating in favour of religious reform. A large party are in favour of abandoning the outward forms and the traditions of Islamism, and of giving to the Koran a purely spiritual interpretation. Another party are in favour of retaining the outward rites and ceremonies with which all the people are so familiar, but of abandoning the Koran for the Bible. It is unnecessary to speak here, in this connexion, of the few baptized Turks and the large class of educated men who have adopted French Rationalism, for neither of these classes are responsible for the agitation caused by the parties mentioned above.

It is impossible to learn the real extent of these parties, or the real motives which have prompted their movements, but it is very probable that they have in view political as well as religious changes. They have naturally excited much opposition among the Ulema and the fanatical party. And the Greeks, Catholics, and Armenians have improved this golden opportunity to represent the Protestant missionaries as at the bottom of all these movements. They have caused the most exaggerated stories to be put in circulation, and it was represented to the Sultan that the present Ministry were implition, and it is very natural that a simple politician should feel that the weakening of Mohammedanism would be followed by the dismemberment of the Turkish Empire, which is essentially and radically religious in its constitution. Missionary operations, then, among the Turks must be obnoxious to the Government and to the British Ambassador just in proportion as they are supposed to be successful. Under these circumstances—feeling that the preservation of the present Ministry was essential to his policy—it was not strange that Sir Henry Bulwer either advised or assented to the plan of operations which was adopted, and the particulars of which are familiar to your readers.

To justify such action on the part of a Government which claims to be liberal, it was necessary to accuse the missionaries of every species of excess. How far such charges are true has been already shown. They have been made by the Turkish Government, by the British Ambassador, and by the English press, without any form of trial or investigation, and in spite of the most positive denials on the part of the persons accused. Every effort has been made to destroy the influence of the Protestant missionaries, and overthrow the work which they have already accomplished, and all the hierarchies of the East are rejoicing that the day has passed when Protestantism can look for protection to the British Embassy.

THE IMPRISONED CONVERTS.

It is said (with how much truth I cannot say) that more than two hundred persons were arrested at the time when the Protestant establishments were closed, but only a very few of these were men known to the missionaries. The others were undoubtedly connected with the parties mentioned above.

All those known to the missionaries were confined in one room, together with three or four others, nine in all. Three of these (all of them unknown), after several weeks, declared themselves Mohammedans, by repeating the usual formula, and were released. Six others remained in prison, without any form of trial or any accusation, until last Wednesday, for their personal safety.

The missionaries have done ever their power to obtain the release of the men. The American and Dutch I have appealed to the Government on their behalf, but all has been in vain. Sir Henry Bulwer has been appealed to over and over again, publicly and privately, but has variably replied by advising that they remain quiet. From necessity, but not choice, they have been left in his hands, and that the fate of two of them has been exiled, and the rest have lain in prison since July. Their fate is still uncertain. It is added here that M. Bore, the Jesuit missionary, has pledged himself to release the prisoners any day when they will themselves Catholics.

COLPORTEURS.

It was agreed between Sir Henry and the Turkish Government that the colporteurs must be abandoned by the Bible Society. This was stated by him, and by the Journal de Constantinople of August 4. The societies decline in their colporteurs unless directly and explicitly ordered to do so by the Ambassador. An interesting correspondence ensued between him and the agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society, which resulted, at last, under the pressure of instructions from England, in the withdrawal of this party. But the colporteurs meet with more success than before. Men say that "You wish to get us into prison, wait until those men are liberated, and then be time enough then to sell Bibles."

WHO OPENED THE BIBLE SOCIETY

I stated in my last letter that the British and Foreign Bible Society was opened, through the influence of the Chargé d'Affaires—they being in the building with those of the Americans. Sir Henry Bulwer has obtained a certificate from Aali Pasha, to the effect that "as the rooms of the Americans were request of the American Embassy, so as of the British Bible Society were the request of the English Ambassadors. On the strength of this he denies the statement which I made. Your Excellency, never having visited these places, must be unaware of the fact that they were common entrance, and the opening of the opening of both. In defence of the statement made in my last letter, I would say the building was closed July 18. The American Chargé appealed to Aali Pasha. July 19 he saw him in person, and order was given at that time to allow the missionaries free access to the building. At the examination of Mr. Brown, the examination of the building was postponed until the 20th. On the 21st the officers withdrew. On the 22nd the following letter from the British Embassy to the British Bible Society. This (the 22nd) was the first time Sir Henry had come up to the islands since the closing of the

Constantinople, July 20, 1864.
I have received your letter of yesterday's date, enclosing a memorial, and I am in communication with the Turkish Government on the subject which it relates. The case you submit will be fully attended to.—Your humble
H. L. BULWER.

I have to say that I was fully justified in the statement which I made in my last letter.

STATEMENTS OF THE TURKISH GOVERNMENT.

Following are the only apologies, if they can be called such, which have been made to the missionaries. The first is an act from the Avedeper, an Armenian newspaper, published by the American Board, which has a very wide circulation throughout the country. As a public official approval of the circulation by the missionaries it is of great value, and answered its purpose.

On the 18th day, July 18, the book magazine of the missionaries in Constantinople was closed by order of the Porte, under the impression that certain prohibited books were in it; but a careful examination of the magazine made by request of the agents of the British and the Bible Societies—satisfied that it contained no books were sold there which had not been regularly approved by the Turkish Government, as will be seen by the following statement, which we are authorised to publish by H. H. Aali Pasha:—

I am authorised to declare that a careful examination having demonstrated the non-existence of prohibited books in the magazine of the American mission, which the police had closed for a moment, the Sublime Porte hastened to cause it to be re-opened and to take off all restrictions from the sale, in the said magazine, of all books except those whose circulation has been and is forbidden.

The other document was communicated to the British Embassy, and a copy sent to the agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society, but not to the other English societies:—

Sublime Porte, August 2, 1864.

Monsieur l'Ambassadeur,—I had the honour of receiving the note which your Excellency addressed to me under date of 20th July, No. 78. The shops of which your Excellency speaks as having been occupied by Messrs. Pfander and Curtis have never been shops. They are rooms hired in a khan or inn* which is held by an Ottoman subject—rooms which these gentlemen have temporarily occupied for distributing gratis Turkish books against the Mussulman religion, and for opening a service and preaching against this religion to whoever will hear them.

Your Excellency will understand that it is impossible to consider as English shops the rooms of an inn kept by an Ottoman subject, or of withdrawing these from the jurisdiction of the local police.

We should have forewarned the consular authority if we had supposed that these chambers were legally hired by Englishmen. It should be remarked that the archives of the police do not show the existence of any such tenure.

As to the shop hired by Mr. Sellar (British and Foreign Bible Society), it served as a place of reunion for the persons who occupied the above-mentioned rooms, and the measures taken in respect to this have been prompted by the desire of preventing all violent action on the part of the people, and of assuring ourselves if controversial works were found there for sale with the Bible, as we had been assured.

We believed that it would be for the interest of all, and for the interest of the free sale of the Bible, to verify this charge.

For the rest, in our haste to act promptly and to prevent all accident, in giving the order to seal up the doors of this building we thought that we were acting against an establishment in the hands of our own subjects, and not against one held by an Englishman.†

We do not hesitate, then, to express to you our lively regrets for this involuntary error, and of assuring you that in similar cases it shall not be repeated. I ought to add also that the shop of which we are speaking was opened as soon as we found that it did not contain controversial books outraging the Mussulman religion.

I am sorry not to be able to say as much for the room of Mr. Pfander, situated in the khan we have mentioned. There the police, assisted by an officer of the Embassy, have found a number of books and manuscripts, all proving the sort of crusade that this gentleman is making against the Mussulman religion in the midst of that part of the population of our capital which professes the religion of the State.—Believe me, &c., (Signed) AALI.

* It ought not to be called an inn, as I have before stated. † This and other statements here can be false.

most distant provinces and in Persia, the results of which remain to be seen. It has broken up all missionary work among the Turks in Constantinople for the present; the services for Turks have been suspended, except that of the American Board, and this is now attended only by Armenians. No Turk can now buy a Bible without being immediately reported to the police. It has given new courage to the Catholics, Greeks, and Armenians, who see now that they can persecute and annoy native Protestants at will, without fear of the Turks or the British Ambassador. It has secured the imprisonment and exile of converted Turks without any form of trial, and made it evident to the Mussulmans that if they wish to become Christians they must adopt Catholicism rather than Protestantism, which can afford them no protection.

These results are not imaginary—they are real; and it may be safely said that Protestant missions in Turkey have never been called to pass through so trying an ordeal as this. Unless the Christian people of Great Britain can make their voices heard at the Foreign-office, and at the British Embassy in Constantinople, religious liberty for Protestants in Turkey may be considered as at an end.

THE FATE OF THE CONVERTS AND THE CONDUCT OF THE BRITISH AMBASSADOR.*

Constantinople, September 13, 1864.

Sir Henry Bulwer has gone to England them. It is a strange proceeding men, "for their own safety," away from Constantinople, where alone they can be such places as Aiden and Magnesia.

The third man is Achmet of Cassa is still detained in prison in Constantinople. He with his family have been kept Christians for years, and have resided in a Christian quarter of Stamboul years. There is no possible reason for detention in prison except the sin that he is a converted Turk. If the cases do not constitute the most unexampled examples of religious persecution is impossible to give any definition in words. No one doubts that Sir Henry have set these men at liberty at any he had chosen to do so.

It is of the highest importance to the missionary work in Turkey that the Turkish Government toward the Christians and against the missionaries should be allowed to rest. The Christian people of England should use their influence to the utmost to have an ambassador at Constantinople who will sympathise with Protestants or at least with perfect religious liberty than with the schemes of Turkish Ministers.

The abolition of religious liberty will do more harm in Turkey than would appear. Neither Russia nor France even the Christian sects in Turkey, will submit to anything like a return to the régime. The strengthening of Mohammedanism must tend to this, and just as it will tend to the destruction rather than the preservation of the Christian community.

ambassador. We desire to avoid things. We allude to him only believe that England considers it his duty to protect the great of religious liberty. If Protestant under his protection, it has no the empire.

see this duty neglected, we feel Protestant missionaries, to appeal of England, and we trust that nor the British Ambassador will have gone beyond our sphere in the facts connected with his tion in relation to this question.

ENCE BETWEEN THE BRITISH ADOR AND THE MISSIONARIES.

sign Secretary of the Evangelical forwarded to us the correspondence has passed between the Com- Alliance at Constantinople and Ambassador, Sir H. L. Bulwer. and American missionaries, and of the Bible Society, laid before sador formal complaints of the heir depôts, and their brief arrests ish police; bringing before him l more serious matter of the im- of several Protestant Christian after communication with the overnment, Sir H. L. Bulwer the missionaries at considerable ie Ottoman Government, he said, antee protection to Protestants in of their own religion, but they "allow any attempts, public or assail the Mussulman religion;" light they regarded the preaching ries in Turkish "inns" [khans] ulman quarters of Constantinople, istribution of books directed against unedan religion. As to the im- mverts, the Porte said that they ted the animosity of the populace g against Mohammedanism. Sir wer added that his own opinion lecturing or distributing books for of showing the absurdity or false- Koran and its Prophet was not r expedient in these times and ries;" and, while he much re- imprisonment of the converts, he s to do more than warn the Go- ot to act fanatically, or in a spirit ion. The missionaries reply that es laid down in Sir H. L. Bulwer's l put an end to all missionary ope- onstantinople, and they vindicate themselves from having in any way overstepped the bounds of prudence. They insist that the only real offence of the imprisoned men is that they have changed their religion, and that the boasted tolerance of the Turkish Government is altogether belied by its treatment of these persons.

In a statement which accompanies the correspondence, the missionaries naturally and justly complain of the decree of "enforced silence" which the new policy of the Ottoman Government imposes upon them, and to which the British Ambassador endeavours to reconcile them. They ask whether this "sealing up of all utterance on religious subjects" is consistent with the liberty which Protestant England and America grant, and which the Sultan was understood to have accorded to all his subjects. The insinuated charge of ingratitude, in offering to Turkey the blessings of Christianity, is, like all others adduced either by the Ambassador, or the Ottoman authorities, met by the missionaries, and answered without disdain, but not without feeling:—

The useful arts are introduced by our countrymen into Turkey, and we are applauded. Every sort of material improvement is fostered by us here, and the empire of the Sultan appreciates the benefit conferred. Science and literature, the fruit and flower of our civilization, exert their influence, and Turkey thanks us. But when as ministers of that form of Christianity which lies at the basis of all our prosperity, which carries with it enlightenment and a free conscience, and sound morality; when, with no possible motive but sincere love for the people to whom we come, and a desire to be faithful to the trust conferred upon us in the Gospel of Jesus, we invite men to a participation of the greatest blessings we ourselves enjoy—the spiritual blessings of the Gospel—desiring to compel no man's conscience or conduct—we are told by Her Britannic Majesty's distinguished representative that we are making to the Ottoman Government not quite a fair return for the hospitality and liberty we enjoy! Let the Christian public of England judge!

The Ambassador, in a note to Dr. Koelle, explains that he did not mean, in his previous communication, "to disapprove generally of missionary work, as such, among the Turks, but of imprudent and indiscreet missionary work;" and he engages to use his influence for the protection of prudent missionaries.

TRANSPORTATION OF CONVERTS TO ACRE— OUTRAGE ON A MISSIONARY.

The subjoined has been received by the Foreign Secretary of the Evangelical Alliance:—

You have heard of the excitement occasioned in Constantinople in consequence of several Mo-his stockings, drawers, and shirt, but taking away his clothes, watch, money, horse, and everything about him. Whilst in the act of plundering Mr. Crawford a Janissary belonging to the Russian Consulate came by. Seeing what was going on, he urged his horse to full speed, and attempted to fly. The Metuali pursued, when the Janissary very thoughtlessly fired upon them; they returned the fire, and not only stripped the poor man, but wounded him, and left him half dead!

THE BRITISH AMBASSADOR AND THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE TURKISH GOVERNMENT.

The following letter, addressed to the Rev. Dr. Blackwood, not only confirms the information we have already given, but shows the strong feeling of indignation which the proceedings of the Turkish Government have awakened among the most enlightened of our countrymen at Constantinople, and adduces incontestible evidence of its infraction of the obligations under which it lies to the British nation:—

Constantinople, August 29, 1864.

My dear Friend,—You have taken, I doubt not, a lively interest in the recent change of policy on the part both of the Turkish and English Governments, by which that celebrated “Hatti-Scheriffe of Gulhane,” issued in November, 1839, and the “Hatti-houmayoun,” of February, 1856, are virtually set aside. It is a result so important, and, so far as it concerns England, so unexpected, that I hope all good men, all who have any regard for liberty of conscience, will give it due consideration.

Innocent, quiet, industrious men are lying in a stifed, filthy Turkish prison, amid intolerable vermin, and more intolerable companions, for the crime of being Christians in Turkey! This insult to Christianity by a Power half of whose subjects regard to religion or race, and one of whom Hatti-houmayoun, more directly asserts the religious liberty as follows: “Art. 6. All religions are and shall be freely practised in my dominions, no subject of my empire shall be molested in the exercise of the religion of his fesses, and shall in no manner be troubled or regarded. In the matter of changing religion one shall be subject to any constraint.” This is undeniably overthrown, and the result, with the approbation of England, is the old Mussulman intolerance and Every moral result of the Crimean war. Worse than this, England, by expending so much blood and treasure, simply earning a reputation which has enabled her to sacrifice other Power could, the priceless into freedom and progress in Turkey.

For some years past it has been plain to Protestant residents in Turkey, who have their attention to the subject, that the Government was pursuing a steadily advancing hostile administration towards Protestants. This has been ably and actively nourished by the French, and there has been no counter to Missionary operations in this empire really under the ban of Turkey and Islam. However much this may be denied in fact, Without the approbation of England obtained beforehand from her Ambassador would have never dared so publicly and shamelessly to trample upon the Hatti-houmayoun.

The false issues that have been raised up this iniquity and deceive the public are worthy of careful and searching attention. It is evidently so much of apprehension in the manner in which these events will be in England, that every deception which skilful diplomacy could call to its aid is effectively used.

If the diplomatic correspondence shall be published, it will be seen that the Government and the Ambassador admits, that these imprisonments for their own benefit and safety is in no sense a punishment for abandonment ently at its own adroitness and the long credulity of its dupes—the public. His Highness Aali Pasha, Minister of Foreign Affairs, declares that the Mussulman is still free to become a Christian. No penalty is imposed for that. Oh no! this Government is too free and enlightened for that. But then the converts must be protected from violence, and good order must be preserved. The public peace was in danger. The excitement might be uncontrollable. The measures taken are merely wise police measures!!

Some twenty missionaries, of different denominations and nationalities, many of them residents of Constantinople for ten, twenty, and thirty years, having constant intercourse with the people, one of them residing in the city itself, all testify that they have neither seen nor heard of the slightest indications of any such Mussulman excitement. All the persons apprehended and imprisoned testify the same. Inquiries have been made of physicians and merchants having extensive relations with the city, and they have met with nothing of the kind. Inquiries have also been made of intelligent Greeks, Armenians, and Turks, of men in a position to know "what is in the wind," and they testify the same.

Until the Government commenced this persecution, by violent and illegal acts, there was no excitement whatever. It is itself the sole author of all that has existed.

In 1843, as reported by M. de Cordoba to Sir Stratford Canning, the Turkish Government clandestinely executed a poor Greek at Belejik for mouning Islam. "The effect"—I quote his exact words—"The effect which this event produced on the Turkish inhabitants of the place has been such, that the Governor has been under the necessity of taking the greatest precautions to prevent the massacre of all the inhabitants."

The Government knows this game perfectly well. It has only to give the hint by some act of legal violence itself, and there will generally be a mob to take the hint. In the present instance has signally failed. Nothing could so demonstrate the peaceable and quiet spirit of the people, or the fact that the Government has openly sampled upon its own Hatti-houmayoun, has fired those whom it calls renegades, and many there accused of a tendency to Christianity, has silenced some, imprisoned others, and yet the people have refused to notice it. On the contrary, many intelligent Mussulmans have recognised the bad men of these measures in their bearing upon the true spirit of the administration of Government.

Another false representation has been persistently made in order to distract attention from the odiousness of the fact that men are lying in stinking prisons for reading the Word of God. It has been represented by the Porte and the English Ambassador that the missionaries have opened rooms in khans and public places—have distributed thence books violently attacking the Mohammedan faith, and have preached and delivered lectures against Islam, the religion of the State, and have called Mahomet an impostor, &c. The missionaries have readily admitted the first—the having rooms in khans for conversation with those who should come to them. He admits having distributed controversial books, denying the character attributed to them; and all unitedly declare that they have never preached nor lectured against Mohammedanism, nor have they called Mahomet in any lecture or sermon an impostor. The missionaries, English and American, have always been agreed in this principle, that it is their work and duty to preach the Gospel, not to rail at Mahomet. They have been true and faithful to this guiding principle.

And yet the charge is reiterated, that the missionaries have caused all this trouble by their intemperate zeal, and that they have admitted themselves the charge. They are therefore self-convicted, and the Government was compelled to interfere for the sake of order! The missionaries concerned have undertaken again to make the most formal and unqualified denial of the charge, and of their having even for a moment in any way admitted its truth; but whether it is possible to stop the repetition of the slander is doubtful.

But where are the poor men in prisons and exile? Where are their suffering families? By raising false issues and reiterating false charges, is the cry of the oppressed to be forgotten or disregarded? If English policy in the East leads to such a result, let her no longer boast of being the protector of the oppressed.

Once when religious persecution was raised in Constantinople, England spoke in a different tone, and the civilised world listened and applauded. The noble despatch of the Earl of Aberdeen to Sir Stratford Canning (Lord de Redcliffe) contained, among other things admirably suited to the occasion, the following:—

"Foreign-office, January 16, 1844.

"Whatever may have been tolerated in former times by the weakness or indifference of Christian powers, those powers will now require from the Porte due consideration for their feelings as members of a religious community, and interested as such in the fate of all who, notwithstanding shades of difference, unite in a common belief in the essential doctrines of Christianity: and they will not endure that the Porte should insult and trample on their faith by treating as a criminal any person who embraces it.

"Her Majesty's Government require the Porte to abandon once for all so revolting a principle. They have no wish to humble the Porte by imposing upon it an unreasonable obligation; but, as a Christian Government, the protection of those who profess a common belief with themselves from persecution and oppression, on that account alone, by their Mohammedan rulers, is a paramount duty with them, and one from which they cannot recede. Your Excellency will therefore press upon the Turkish Government, that if the Porte has any regard for the friendship of England—if it has any hope that in the hour of peril or adversity that protection which has more than once saved it from destruction will be extended to it again—it must renounce absolutely, and without equivocation, the barbarous practice which has called forth the remonstrance now addressed to it."

The whole despatch should be reprinted at the present time, that England may see how she has fallen. No diplomatic communication was ever circulated like this by the pen through the Ottoman Empire. The patriarchs, bishops, and chief men of all the Christian communities obtained it both in the English and with translations. I have seen the whole correspondence at the Greek Patriarch's in manuscript. The affair immortalised the names of Aberdeen and Canning.

The recent crisis was not less worthy of some great name. Now religious liberty in its reality is at stake. Then one or two individuals alone were involved. Now it interests hundreds and thousands. It fills the minds of multitudes with amazement that England should now entirely accord with a Government who treats as criminals persons for embracing her faith. Just as religious liberty begins to be a necessity, England abandons it! She might have safely and honourably carried out the sentiments so nobly expressed by Aberdeen. There is no probability of any very great or sudden change in the Mohammedan mind. Hundreds and thousands read the Scriptures, and question the reliability of the Koran, but this does not make them Christians. The progress of things, with liberty of conscience secured, would be quiet safe and natural. To revert now to the old despotism is to prepare the way for violent revolutions.

Another view of the present powerful state of affairs should receive the attention of English Christians. The whole influence of England in Turkey at the present time is not only against Protestantism, but is in a far greater measure directly for Romanism.

France rejoices to see the Hatti-houmayoun overthrown. She rides rough-shod over Turkish diplomacy, and needs no "Hatt" to protect her interests. Now, there is no power to whom the oppressed and persecuted can look but France. While Protestantism is now exposed to the hatred of Turks, Greeks, Armenians, and Catholics of every race, and is without any protection, all who turn to France are sure of being cared for. It has already been intimated to the prisoners that they have only to say, "I am a Catholic," and they will be free at once.

It is believed, however, that the Government, after giving them a sufficient taste of the sweets of a Turkish prison, will release them under surveillance, to be watched as obnoxious persons, and restored to their prison quarters at pleasure. If you should, therefore, hear of their being at liberty, it will not in the least change the aspects of the case. It will still be true that the iron grasp of despotic power is laid upon Protestantism to crush it.

Another fact is so discreditable to the Turkish Government, that it seems hardly possible it will be finally persisted in. The original Firman acknowledging and organising Protestantism in Turkey, was by accident in the room of the Rev. Dr. Pfander when it was pounced upon by the police. Five or six weeks have passed, and the Government has not yet restored it. It has now only to deny all knowledge of the document, and, after a time, challenge the Protestant community to produce any proof of its pretended rights, and the Protestant "millet" is done for. These things must not be allowed thus to rest. They must upon the attention of the world, and upon English Christians, and unless England at heart abandoned truth, righteousness and dom, these crooked things will be made

Rev. Dr. Blackwood, LL.D.

DR. PFANDER AND THE MOHAMMEDANS

We are requested by Dr. Pfander to publish the following:—

In the valuable article on Turkey, contained in your last number, in the account given by your correspondent of my books for the Mohammedans, there is a statement which requires attention or rather a modification. It is that I regard "the Mèzan-ul-Hakk" as the most important instruments for awakening the Mohammedan mind from its lethargy, and bringing it to the truth." Now this may be taken as a literal statement of views and expressions of my own; but in this sense I must disown it for so high an opinion I have never formed in my book.

In conversation with my missionary friends—when the question has been put, why "Mèzan" were not too strong a book for Turkey, and its circulation here consequently was so small—I brought forward, by way of defence, that the "Mèzan", although more controversial than my other books, has, in India as well as in Turkey, been taken more with the Mussulmans, and asked for and bought by them much more frequently than the "Miftah" and the "Mèzan". Although these—treating the one on the doctrine of Christ and the Trinity, and the other on redemption—are, viewed from the standpoint, of more importance than the "Mèzan". With this modification only I can own the statement, and this fact must also be considered as sufficient justification for its circulation.

The words of "indiscreet preaching of truth in public places," which occur in the paragraph of your correspondent's letter, are understood as meaning nothing more than preaching on religious subjects, and have, I believe, been used by him in this sense, for your correspondent must be well aware of the fact that neither the missionaries nor any of the converts have ever preached here in public places.

Truly,
C. G. Pfander.

Constantinople, Sept. 13, 1864.

THE ARMENIAN CONVERTS AT CONSTANTINOPLE AND EPISCOPAL

The Rev. Dr. Koelle, of the Church Missionary Society's mission at Constantinople, appeals to our sense of justice to insert the following letter. We regret to occupy our pages with matters of controversy between missionary brethren, but we feel bound to print his statement:—

Constantinople, August 8, 1864.

In the July number of your interesting periodical you largely quote from a letter from Dr. Wood, under the head of "Turkey." As I highly esteem the missionaries he represents, and rejoice in the success of their work of spreading the Gospel truth amongst the Oriental churches, without reluctance that I say something may seem opposed to their doings; yet, due deference to them, I feel in conscience to say a few words in behalf of a movement which the said letter represents as undeserving of "foreign aid" which I feel truly glad to see American missionaries enjoy for their own use, but which I would like to see extended to other reformatory movements in question.

Perhaps I may say in a few words what I mean is. A congregation of Protestant Armenians in Constantinople, connected with the taking place in America, and a message t there by American missionaries that ed funds were already collected in Prus- message proceeded from a mistake for American missionaries do not appear to alch), the pastor returned to Constanti- ent having obtained his object, and this ion to the present day is kindly per- hold its services in the Prussian En- ch, and in a schoolroom belonging to the on Society. About the same time they revise their ecclesiastical constitution, tested views respecting church organiza- b differed from those prevailing among onaries of the American Board. It is period that the disagreement between ican missionaries and this new church- aturally the views of these people were ice perfectly clear and matured; but I ted documents before me which prove dy several years ago they decidedly dif- 1 the American missionaries on the sub- urch organization, and inclined towards orms. Last January they invited the t chaplains and episcopal missionaries of nople to a conference, in which they declared, as in the presence of God, that s the doctrine of salvation they still, as e, most sincerely agreed with the Ameri- onaries, putting their trust solely in the l person of the blessed Saviour, and sub- n all things to the authority of the Holy s; but that in matters of form they much from them, being strongly convinced only sound principle for them to act upon form the old Armenian Church, rejecting was opposed to Holy Scripture, and re- f its time-honoured institutions what- d that test (e.g. episcopacy, the festivals mas, Easter, Trinity, &c.), because it was his principle that they could reasonably ee at last their whole beloved nation re-after all these facts, I confess I was not a- azed at Dr. Wood's assertion, that "the of disagreement has not been forms of order or worship, but questions concerning ex-priest Vertanes that he "was for some time a helper on the mission staff," but that he "so conducted himself as to compel his dismissal," the expressions are calculated to convey an idea not in full keeping with the actual facts. For to most people "for some time" would mean a few months, or at the best a few years, whereas Mr. Vertanes was actually in the service of the American Board, with a regular salary, for eighteen years. So likewise many people would understand the expression "he so conducted himself as to compel his dismissal," as having reference to some moral misconduct, whilst in the letter of his dismissal, now before me, the cause is described as twofold—viz., first, want of agreement with the missionaries; and secondly, the failure of funds, in consequence of the American war; and it is added: "We have arranged that your salary should be continued till October 1st, which we would not have done if you had been dismissed on account of immoral conduct."

The pastor of the Pera church, Mr. Simon, is represented as "annoyed by the action" of Vertanes; whereas, on inquiry, I learned that this is not the case, but that Mr. Vertanes officiates in the morning, Pastor Simon generally being present, and the latter in the afternoon, the former likewise attending.

To throw a little more light upon this priest Vertanes, you will allow me to translate to you the conclusion of an account of his life, written in German, for the Prussian chaplain. It runs thus: "From this brief history we learn—first, that Mr. Vertanes became enlightened, while still in the Armenian Church, by the reading of the Bible and of other books, which helped him to understand the former; secondly, that whilst yet a priest in that Church, he laboured for several years with a view of reforming it; thirdly, that he has made important preparations for this purpose both in Nicomedia and here in Constantinople; fourthly, that he has been engaged in this work for about thirty years, for which the Patriarch sent him twice into banishment; fifthly, that during that time he received his salary for twelve years from the Armenian Church, and for eighteen years from the American missionaries; sixthly, cordingly, I said on the occasion referred to that I believed they had as much right to prefer episcopal forms as other people had to prefer the Presbyterian, the Congregational, or any other form. But at the same time, it is true I also suggested the propriety of a conference between themselves and the American missionaries, in order, if possible, to remove the ill feelings which, under such circumstances, generally spring up in both parties, so as to separate with mutual consent and goodwill.

AMERICA.

If I am thus constrained to oppose the statements of an honoured and dear Christian brother, I do not mean in any way to accuse him of intentional misrepresentation; on the contrary, I feel persuaded that he thought he said nothing but what was true, and what he was justified in saying. But I cannot help thinking (and I am not alone in this view) that his desire—a most natural one—to keep the Protestant movement in the Armenian Church under the sole control of the American Board, as in his eyes the most suitable and beneficial, unconsciously led him to regard in too unfavourable a light the body of men who reject the imported American forms, and wish to retain those of their ancient Church, as far as they are found in harmony with the New Testament.

Dr. Wood apparently finds it difficult to understand how this episcopal movement among the converts of the American missionaries could arise from perfectly honest and conscientious motives and regards it best explicable by assuming motives of an opposite character; but I, and many others with me, think that this movement, which we did nothing to produce, and which, for the sake of the prosperity of the evangelistic work of the American Board, we might even wish not to have taken place, is yet as natural as it was spontaneous; so much so, that to every one who takes at the same favourable view of episcopacy, and is at the same time well acquainted with the character and the people of the ancient churches, and the modern missions in the Turkish Empire, it must have appeared much more surprising if the movement in question had not taken place, than that it did.

Now permit me to say that my object in writing this is by no means to cast any slur upon the American missionaries, or to diminish the sympathy with their work, in whose success I rejoice, and which I should gladly see extend still more widely; but what I felt to be a duty of conscience was, to raise my voice against the wrong done to a body of Christian men by the letter in question, and to say that, in my humble opinion, this episcopal movement of reformation in the Armenian Church as well deserves the support of our Christian friends in England, especially of those are themselves members of an episcopal movement carried on by the American Board. should they not both be able to exist and to emulate each other in zealous exertions the evangelization of the entire Armenia. The episcopal movement is still in its infancy there is now only one congregation he another in the east, for which the Ang' of Jerusalem has already some years a pastor. But these people assert many other reformed Armenians con- these with their movement, as one and organization they think more, circumstances of Turkey than the American Board, and that likewise remain in the old Armenian Chr with favour, and are likely to once on a firm footing. These support of the Christian publi able them, poor in worldly mea- lightened, but also to provide edifices of their own, and ever tenance (at least for a short- pastor, inasmuch as since the ability to maintain him, a n- members have failed in br of certain changes taking; the original subscriptions that it would have been ir- tinue at his post if the I copal missionaries, and here, had not ministered.

Having said so much, I feel no call to ment, I feel no call to is of God, we all know it. But instead of ar simply state that a Bishop of Gibraltar Armenian Patriarch been requested to o the Patriarch very and added: "If y, of our people." of the Armenian Pa ment. There a once there were Church of the important sim Church. Yours resp bonds of the

AMERICA.

New York, September 9, 1864.

THE LATE REV. RUSSELL COOK.

We have to lament the recent death of one of the most energetic and successful Christian workers of this generation. Rev. Russell S. Cook died, near New York, on Sabbath morning, September 4. In 1841, at the age of thirty, as Secretary of the American Tract Society, he organised and developed the work of that society, which has carried, hundred Two y out th sheet The for t in it circ Ab sir

last seven years of his life were chiefly to the work of the "Sabbath School," as it is called. This is an institution quite unique in its constitution and action, but remarkable chiefly for its great success which has attended its labors. A number of gentlemen in New York of different denominations, being aware of the inroads which were made upon the Sabbath, especially in their own city, resolved in the year 1857 to offer some effective resistance to the growing evil. They were responsible to no ecclesiastical authority or to any society. They were their constituents, and in great part their neighbors. Their number was less than fifty; they were all laymen; and their influence as men of business, their high social position, and consequent hold upon the community, and the means of the best part of the city, and their access to all the sources of social influence, promised great success to the cause which they espoused. Mr. McKim became the secretary of this association; and the indefatigable activity of his mind, his fertility in plans and resources, his indomitable courage and energy of purpose, his remarkable versatility of style of writing that could serve him equally well whether in religious and secular journals, in tracts and reports, or even in legal documents and draughts of laws—all these supplied completely the solid strength and energy of the committee. The result of seven years of labour has been, not the reformation of all the abuses which led to the committee into being, but a most important and effective vindication especially of the Sabbath, lent his great administrative ability to the organization of the New York branch of the Christian Commission. In the course of a few weeks, this part of that great agency passed from a merely nominal existence into that most extensive and vigorous activity which it still exhibits. Before the assumption of this double burden, however, his health, which had long been impaired, began visibly to decline. Under this excessive work it failed more rapidly, and he was compelled to restrict himself again to the duties of his secretaryship. From these, also, he was soon obliged to retire, and a few days ago, trusting with simplicity in the merit and grace of the Redeemer, he rested finally from his most successful labours. Probably no man among us has excited a more definite and enduring influence upon the religious welfare of our land. Few men in any generation combine as he did the imaginative ardour which projects the grandest plans, with the array of steady executive talents which are necessary to accomplish them.

THE CONTEST FOR PRESIDENT.

We are coming to a period which we feel will test severely every good element of our national character. A presidential canvass is always a critical ordeal. But this canvass will combine elements of fearful power and importance. Christian men regard it with the greatest seriousness, but without discouragement. Religious interests indeed can hardly fail to decline under the intensity of the political excitement. Yet the most important moral issues are bound up with the approaching struggle. A mere strife, as eager as that the American Board of Foreign Missions with great promptness and liberality. It was announced that 120,000 dollars would have to be received in the month of August, or the financial year would close with the society in debt. Of this amount 112,000 dollars had been already received, and there is a bright prospect of securing the balance.

POLYNESIA.

A DAY AMONG CANNIBALS.

Under this heading, recent Sandwich Island papers publish a narrative of an adventure by a whaler at the Marquesas Islands, which is not only of thrilling interest in itself, but well exhibits, in one aspect, the great advantages which commerce may and does derive from Christian missions—from the presence and influence among savage tribes of Christian missionaries. The value of this case, as a testimony to the happy influence of missions, is certainly not diminished by the fact that the man who so nobly used all his influence, ready to sacrifice everything he had, in the effort to save the life of a stranger, was a missionary not from England or the United States, but from the Sandwich Islands, himself a fruit of modern missions. It appears that the American whaleship Congress, which sailed from New Bedford in June, 1863, for the North Pacific, arrived before the harbour of Puamau, on Hivaoa, Marquesas Islands, the 13th of January last, and commenced trading with the natives. Mr. Whalon, first officer, went on shore for purposes of traffic, and passed up the valley with a chief, when the natives commenced chasing pigs, and at the same time shouting, apparently for the purpose of calling the people, who came "rushing from all parts of the valley, armed with hatchets and knives." The narrative states:—

Mr. Whalon, fearing that they meant no good, proposed to the chief to return to the boat; upon which the latter stepped up to him, suddenly seized his hat, and placed it upon his own head. This he thinks was a well-known signal among them, for he was instantly seized by a score of natives, thrown down and stripped naked, his hands and feet bound with ropes, which the chief had in his hands, but which he supposed were intended to tie the pigs.

The natives then proceeded to tear up his clothes into small pieces, and cut the buttons off, making a distribution among the crowd. After this they paid their attentions to their prisoner by pinching him severely, bending his fingers and thumbs over the backs of his hands, wrenching his nose, and torturing him in every imaginable way. They would strike at his head and limbs with their hatchets, always missing him by a hair's breadth. For about three hours they continued to amuse themselves and torment him in this manner. He supposed this was the custom preparatory to being killed, as it doubtless is. Some of the natives tried to entice the ship's two boats to come to the shore, and Mr. Whalon's boat-steerer was on the point of landing to find him, when they were warned off by a young Marquesan girl, belonging to the family of the Hawaiian missionary, Kekela.

This girl had previously tried to warn Mr. Whalon against going inland with the chief, but she could not speak English, and was not understood. One of the Hawaiian missionaries, whose name he did not learn, having heard of the trouble, now came, but was unable to converse with Mr. Whalon. A German carpenter also soon arrived, and being unable to procure his release, promised to stay by and do what he could to save him. At night he was put in the house of a "chieftain" who had tried in vain to procure his release and in the morning the natives again assembled, noisy for their victim:—

All his hopes of relief had now fled, and began to look for death as certain, as the chief would soon be called on to release him. At this time, which was early in the morning, the German hearing the natives speaking of the arrival of the Hawaiian missionaries, Mr. Kekela and wife, in the neighbourhood, despatched another Hawaiian for him; and the natives, finding that Kekela had been sent for, hastily untied his hands and feet of their prisoner.

Kekela and his wife are Hawaiian missionaries sent out from the Sandwich Islands, and supported by the Hawaiians. They live in a neighbourhood valley, but at the time of the capture of Mr. Whalon were on a visit to another island. Kekela soon arrived, with the chief under whose protection he lives, and instantly commenced negotiating with the natives for their humane treatment, and besought them to release him. They demanded a ransom, and after a consultation among themselves, decided to release him for his whaleboat and six oars, upon which Kekela begged them to take his boat. At the offer, however, Kekela's chief demurred, as this would deprive their settlement of their only boat. The discussion now waxed warm between the two chiefs during which Kekela declared that he was ready to give up anything and everything he possessed he could but save the foreigner's life—an instance of disinterested philanthropy which the annals of missions cannot equal. After some further parley it was agreed to give a musket and some of trade in exchange for Mr. Whalon, which was immediately done, and he was led beyond boundary which separated the domain of the chiefs.

Mr. Whalon was now taken to the house of Kekela, and was "astonished to find a pleasant, airy cottage, furnished in a neat and tasty manner, much after the style of an English farm house, surrounded by a garden much bears testimony to the upright character of Kekela and wife, and of the influence which they have over the natives of the settlement. Kekela is a most industrious man, thus setting a worthy example to the natives. Thelon's emotions on reaching the ship can be imagined rather than described. He had been rescued from the savages and returned to his vessel through the efforts of a native Hawaiian—a man, who had been prompted to act in his favour by the teachings of the Christian religion, which he gave the most exemplary evidence of. After twenty-three years' voyaging around the world, he says he has never passed through a more dangerous seizure by the natives, and learned that it was done out of revenge for the kidnapping of Marquesans by the Peruvians, who had stolen a cargo of men and women from this and the neighbouring islands. Some of these kidnapped natives had been returned by the Peruvian Government, but many had died on the passage to or from Peru, while others had had various diseases, including the smallpox, which they brought back to the group, and it was spreading over the islands. The Marquesans were so incensed with these outrages of the Peruvians, that they took vengeance on any foreigners that might fall into their power, regardless as to who they were.

Home Intelligence.

MR. SPURGEON AND CHARITY.

THIS is the heading of an article in a London contemporary, on the heavy sentence brought by the minister of the Tabernacle against the Evangelical Alliance of the Church of England. Mr. Spurgeon will be deemed by those who think that he erred in the language which he used in his sermon entitled "Baptismal regeneration," to have aggravated his offence to Christian charity by attempting a justification of it. Two sermons on the subject, from the same pulpit, have followed which we have just named, and now we receive two letters from Mr. Spurgeon, in one of which he addresses the Committee of the Evangelical Alliance, and resigns his membership in that body, and in the other he writes to the Christian public, with a view to show that his accusations are neither novel nor singular. In the first letter he quotes

This rule, he maintains, he has not infringed. "I have not violated the union of believers," he says, "but those have done so who, knowing the truth and loving it, nevertheless lend their name, their countenance, and their subscription to a lie. Notwithstanding, since some of those honoured brethren who are clear of this sin feel aggrieved by my witness-bearing, and consider that I have broken your regulations, I beg to submit to their evident wish, and do hereby withdraw myself from your Alliance until such time as the brethren whom I have charged with duplicity shall clear themselves of the sin, or you shall ease yourselves of their patronage and association."

He has "imputed" nothing, he tells us; he has "proved" the brethren in question to be both dishonest and immoral; yet he has avoided all needless and intentional irritation; and claims to have observed the Alliance stand on record before the merciful face of the Great Head of the Church, and let Him do as seemeth Him good.

What "universal Christendom" will reply, we cannot, of course, tell; but one highly-respectable organ of religious opinion, across the Atlantic, has already, under the heading we have quoted, given utterance to what it thinks of Mr. Spurgeon's "anticipation of the day of judgment." The Christian Intelligencer of New York, the organ of the Reformed Dutch Church in America, says:—

The object of the sermon ["Baptismal Regeneration"] is to expose the unscriptural, unreasonable, and dangerous nature of the error that regeneration is wrought by administration of baptism. The preacher, after showing that, according to the natural meaning of the words, the language used on the subject in the Catechism and the baptismal office of the Anglican Church fairly teaches this doctrine, proceeds to refute it with great force and fervour, presenting the argument in a way well adapted to reach a promiscuous audience. In the course of his argumentation he meets the objection that many good clergymen in the Church do not hold the doctrine. To this his first answer is unobjectionable. He maintains that they preach against the teaching of their own Church, and proceeds: "To take oath that I sincerely assent to a doctrine which I do not believe, would to my conscience appear little short of perjury; but those who do so must be judged by their own Lord." But very soon he forgets this last sound and scriptural principle. Instead of leaving his brethren to be judged by the Lord, he himself ascends the tribunal and decides the whole case in the most offensive form. He insists that the language of the Prayer-book can mean nothing but Baptismal Regeneration in the baldest form, that the Evangelicals know this, and yet solemnly subscribe to what they do not believe, only for the sake of the emoluments of the clerical office. He charges them with the grossest immorality, with shuffling and equivocation, with dishonesty, with confounding truth and falsehood. If "the books were opened," and the secrets of all hearts lay plain before his eyes, Mr. Spurgeon could not speak in more positive and unhesitating style than he does, branding a large body of reputable ministers of the Gospel as wanting in the essential element, not only of Christian, but even of common worldly morals.

The curious feature of this anticipation of the day of judgment is, that it is done under a stringent sense of duty. The preacher in his opening affirms that he is loth to undertake the work, but is forced to do it. He knows that it will cost him the friendship of some, and stir up the enmity of more. But he cannot hold his peace. He must deliver his soul. The burden of the Lord is upon him. He feels like a martyr marching to the stake. It is as though angels and men were watching for his utterance, as if the fate of England depended upon his lips, nay, as if the world's future hung trembling in the balance. "As I am soon to appear at my Master's bar, I will this day, if ever in my life, bear my testimony for truth, and run all risks." "It is as much as my soul is worth to hold my peace any longer, and whether you approve or not, I must speak out." What now is it that, with such an important appeal to the Searcher of Hearts, Mr. Spurgeon protests, Mr. Spurgeon! Surely it is not an argument against Regeneration, nor is it the assertive Prayer-book, understood in that sense, teaches this doctrine. Which may be said, as they have numbered, been said, without of truth which Mr. Spurgeon feels as of God to proclaim and hold forth is that those clergy of the Anglican deny baptismal regeneration, and signed the established formula, as a falsehood, and now get their living to words asserting what the Among these have been and are tian teachers on earth, men of faith, charity, patterns of every good and recognised by all as genuine sacrificing labourers for Christ's one or two, but a multitude, in i generation only, but all past ones, which have shown this subscription to the Prayer-book devoted, spiritual evangelism which has never seen excelled.

Yet he deliberately, as a matter of sight of the judgment-seat, procures men are living with a lie in their does not seem to occur to him to understand words differently from may be innocently under a misapprehension if wholly mistaken, still that favour God from blessing their lives conscience compels him to denounce honest time-servers, and what befall him on account of this is a portion of his martyr's crown for execution for righteousness' sake men must endure in this world not a rare one. We dwell on cause we love Anglican Evangelical other Christians, for because of fault with Mr. Spurgeon, but us to call attention to the debasing a specified course concerning the motives of men. do always in a meek and reverent cost. The other we are or to anybody. How dare in effect he does say, for he that such men as Mr. Ryland the expense of their consciences how can he, know this? men were to turn around Spurgeon found that the Evangelical Establishment were in necessary for him to work that therefore he resort to charge of time-serving could he make? Plain motive lies in the hidden "The day will declare come, let Christian men own Master they all lest ye be judged.

A brother minister Dr. Octavius Winslow given expression subject. Preaching

all them that love our Lord Jesus sincerity," he said :—

once the Evangelical clergy of the Church because they do not preach the doctrine of Regeneration ; to stigmatise their this ground as "equivocal and shuffling" as "inconsistent and dishonest," the gravest pieces of immorality per-England," as ministers "whose friends men neither ask nor accept," is to the censure, in its greatest breadth, Divine Master once pronounced upon reathed a like spirit of condemnation, not what manner of spirit ye are of." I ht to stand between God and a man's

Who made me a judge of my brother? Master he stands or falls. It were an e and a presumption in me to foist my on of any article of faith subscribed to godly men, either upon their conscience nistry. It is enough for me that the clergy of the Church of England ignore, the doctrine of Baptismal Regeneration, many of them with far more sympathy han I preach, the glorious Gospel of the

My firm conviction is, that not one Evangelical clergy of this land really t the Church of England teaches that He honestly believes the contrary, and ibes, and so he preaches. I have heard m assert that, had the decision in the e been adverse to their convictions of her words, had the Judicial Committee Council pronounced that the doctrine d Regeneration was the true teaching h of England, they would have seceded nistry. I am bound, therefore, in the Christian charity, to believe that the clergy do not interpret the Articles as s doctrine, and therefore cannot justly ed as "swearing to one thing, and nother," thus guilty, in its most ape, of perjury and dishonesty. . . .

arraign and judge my ministering the Church of England, than whom—I estly and in love—there are not found ranch of the Church of Christ a more , spiritually-minded, earnest, and y of men. Were I to withdraw my llowship, and friendship from these , I must renounce all reverence for the ories of the Romaines, the Cecils, the e Richmonds, the Martyns, the Bicker- e past age ; and must relinquish com- l friendship with the Marshes, the e Stowells, the Venns of the present. men, are these men, "perjured, dis- oral ! " I shudder at the thought.

rned Dean of Ripon thinks that on is to be pitied, because—want of acquaintance with theological ves him utterly unfit for the deter- such a question, which is a question, doctrine, but of what may be called eology ; and his charges are just a base which the Romanists could bring elf as well as others for his interpreta- words, "This is my body." But mer man than he is, he would know his qualifications are for passing judg- a point, and be willing to learn from such facts, among others, as the Gorham judgment and the cases of Mr. Maskell and Mr. Mozley, what ground there is for his charges against the Evangelical clergy. Let him hold and enforce his own view of doctrine as he pleases ; but when he undertakes to determine what is the exclusive meaning of the Book of Common Prayer, and brings a charge of dishonesty against those who take a different view of that meaning from what he does, he only shows the presumptuous self-confidence with which he is prepared to pronounce judgment upon matters of which he is profoundly ignorant. To hold a controversy with him upon the subject would be to as little purpose as to attempt to hold a logically-constructed argument with a child unacquainted with logical terms.

On the other hand, the Rev. William Brock, of Bloomsbury, has published a letter to Mr. Spurgeon, vindicating and encouraging him, though he thinks Mr. Spurgeon might have been less personal and might have expressed his personalities less distastefully. "There are two or three sentences," he says, "at which, had I been an ecclesiastical descen- dant of Toplady and Romaine, I should have been, I think, somewhat righteously dis- pleased." But he contends that attention ought not to be fixed exclusively on those sen- tences. The Rev. William Landels, another Baptist minister, goes further, and not only defends Mr. Spurgeon, but declares that on account of what he has said, he has been "persecuted," which can only mean—as a correspondent of the Patriot points out—that his opponents use "hard words," of which "he set the fashion." From forty to fifty replies to Mr. Spurgeon have been issued, and the controversy still continues.

THE PAPISTS AND THEIR IMITATORS.

We might fill half our present number with facts and comments bearing upon recent doings of Romanists and semi-Romanists in this country. In one place after another we are told of the opening of chapels and monastic establishments, tongues and pens are busy in advocacy of Popery, either in part or as a whole, and it becomes in- creasingly evident, that much as we see and hear upon the surface of society, much more is going on beneath it, till now scarcely suspected. Can it be doubted, for example, that the apparently sudden accession of wealth to the Romanists, which enables them so to multiply their establishments, is the result, to a large extent, of those priestly arts, practised especially upon the weak, the superstitious, and the dying, in which the priests of Rome have so long been adepts ? There must be passing in society, in relation to these matters, far more than meets the eye of the public, though this, as we have said, is not a little. More alarming than anything that the professed Romanists are doing, however, would seem to be the proceedings of their imitators in the Church of England. The design of re-establishing monastic orders within the Anglican communion is being zealously pursued by Brother Ignatius, as he is called, and he has found an imitator at Newcastle, so that there are at least two distinct attempts at re-establishing monachism within the English Church. It is stated that the other day, at the Norwich monastery, an infant of two years was solemnly dedicated to the service of God: "The infant was dressed as a Benedictine novice, in white serge, and he is now left altogether to the care of the monks, and will not see his mother again until he has forgotten her!"

CHRISTIAN UNION: THE PRESBYTERIANS AND INDEPENDENTS.

A contributor to the Patriot, who says he had long sympathised with the prevailing tendencies and spirit of our day, which, with ever-clearing voice, call out for union amongst spiritual believers of every sect, that the Catholic Church of the Lord be one, and not rent in schism, also observes that these tendencies manifest themselves in many directions. He adds:—

The many unions which have gone to form the United Presbyterian Church in Scotland, and the present agitation, certain of fulfilling its object, which draws the United Presbyterian, the Free, and the Reformed Presbyterian Churches together; the union between the sections of the Methodists; the hankering of many Baptists after closer union with ourselves, and the almost universal desire on our part to receive them, if they will make baptism an open question; the widening of our basis of communion as a denomination so as to receive godly men, who hold an elevated Arminianism; and, above all, however imperfect and perishable it may be, the Evangelical Alliance, and the mighty testimony which it affords of the desire of men who hold Evangelical truth, to rise into the fellowship of a perfect oneness in Christ Jesus. This theme of Christian union ran like a fugue amid all my meditations at Limpley Springs [where he was staying], and wound all other thoughts into its own glorious harmony. Immediately on my return from Limpley, by a strange coincidence, which, I believe, Providence had directed, I received a letter from one who has long been known as the most eminent statesmanly writer and leader of the United Presbyterian Church. The contents thereof startled and delighted me. I give them to the readers of the Patriot to close therewith this paper:—

"It seems to me that a union of moderate Independents and Presbyterians is possible, and that if set on foot it would cause the Christian Church mingling surprise and delight. What would I think of such a basis as the following:—

"1. Each church to have a Presbyterial Board, comprising preaching and non-preaching presbyters, to be ordained in the same way, except that the article of preaching would be read in the formula or passed over, according to circumstance.

"2. The churches to be superintended by one general council or several, exercising simple spiritual yet effective administration.

"3. The united body to be called 'The Independent Presbyterial Connexion.'

"4. Our cumbersome confessions and catechisms to be replaced by a brief summary of principles analogous to that of the Evangelical Alliance.

"5. Instead of nondescript managers, every church shall have deacons regularly ordained.

"6. All members of churches shall have the privilege of choosing their presbyters and deacons, as also of voting on certain specified questions, such as the erection of a new place of worship or an increase of the teaching presbyter's salary, as it is not fit they should be involved in pecuniary responsibilities without their express concurrence.

"7. The united body to have no local restriction, but on account of its magnitude, to regard England as its special field, and contemplate sisterhood with churches in Scotland and Ireland.

"These articles I have indicated hurriedly, without regard to order. They emanate entirely from myself, so that no other is at all responsible for them; but, if they find favour in your connexion, I think they would in ours. You will see that I avoid as much as possible all terminology characteristic of party and calculated to give offence. It will also be apparent, I trust, that I wish to be as conceding as truth will allow.

"Consider earnestly of this proposal, and let us see whether we may not have a union displaying the interest and glory of a new reformation."

A FRENCH PASTOR'S STORY.

Every Sunday afternoon there is held, at the Young Men's Christian Association, Aldersgate-street, a devotional meeting, to which young men are affectionately invited. On a recent occasion of this kind addresses were delivered by three foreign pastors. One of these—the Rev. Achille Manbault, pastor of the French Church, Guernsey—narrated the following story, in illustration of the usefulness of the association:—

Nine years ago your association was led, in the providence of God, to circulate gratuitously among young men in the large warehouses in the city a little paper, entitled "City Life," prepared by one of your then secretaries, Mr. Tarlton, now the Rev. T. H. Tarlton, incumbent of Stroud. It chanced that a copy fell into the hands of a chemist in the city, who, by its means, learned the address and objects of the association. A few days after a young Frenchman presented himself to the chemist, requesting medicinal assistance. He was wretchedly poor, with food, almost without clothes, a deserter from the French army, and, in consequence, unable to visit his native country; and, even here, he was in terror that by some means he might be arrested and made to suffer for his fault. The medicine for which he asked the chemist gave him, in he was directed to the Young Men's Association. He came on Easter Sunday, and found here that welcome with us are always ready to greet a stranger as to throw himself upon your sympathy. placed under the care of a foreign Christian at that time in communion with ciation, and under his guidance and he learned the great truths of Christ and resolved to devote himself to the God. He continued for some time at your meetings, which were the much benefit to him; but in his state of mind, he considered it was his to make what reparation he could for which he had been guilty in deserting. He returned to France, presented to the proper officers, and surrendered as. On his trial much surprise was expressed at his voluntary surrender of himself, and he was specially interrogated him on this he replied, "When I ran away from was in the darkness of nature, and under of sin; now I have learned the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and am His servant. It is by the teaching of His Word that I come back to my duty, and submit myself to you for the punishment I have deserved." Kind friends took an interest in his welfare, and tried to procure a mitigation of his punishment. They were successful. Twelve years' imprisonment was the ordinary penalty for his offence; this was reduced to four, and the severity of the imprisonment greatly mitigated. After undergoing it for a year and nine months, he was allowed to return to duty in the army. Here he was employed as a sort of regimental clerk for about two years, and then finally granted a discharge. Released from all obligation, he went to Geneva to study for the ministry. When his studies were completed, he laboured for some time in the South of France as an evangelist, and then was appointed to the charge of the French Independent Church at Guernsey. He now stands before you to acknowledge that this happy change of position, and far happier change of mind, he owes to the kindly influence of the Young Men's Christian Association. The starving French deserter who sang in the streets of London for a morsel of bread, is the Pasteur Manhault who now speaks to you.

Miscellaneous.

MISSIONARY MATTERS.

TURKEY.

ious details relating to the recent proceedings against Christianity in Constantinople found in a letter from our correspondent in that city, which appears in an earlier from other quarters also evidence reaches us of the mischievous tendency, as well as trace of the course adopted by the Sultan's advisers. "As soon," writes Dr. Pfander, "a fanatical party [among the Turks] knows that the Government will countenance they will make known their spirit, insult and ill-treat Christians, and then tumults dashed will follow." Expiring and Mohammedan bigotry will start up into fresh the influence of these events in the capital, while intolerant votaries of Islam of sanguine class will believe that a new era is to be inaugurated, in which all the sins of past years are to be revoked. "The accession of the present Sultan," wrote ionaries, during a tour in Asia Minor, some months since, "appears to have excited of a revival of the old exclusive and fanatical system." Those by whom this hope cherished will now consider it in course of being realised, and we may be certain it will leave nothing undone to give effect to their wishes.

the tour in Asia Minor, above referred to, the missionaries, Messrs. Weakley and on reaching Thyatira, sought out Gheorghii, the head man of the Protestant Greeks who are in connexion with the American Board. The origin of the Protestant movement at this place is rather interesting:—

young Armenian from Thyatira spent some time in Southern Russia, and whilst in the neighbourhood of the Caucasus he came in contact with the Protestants. On his return to Thyatira, became acquainted with him, and the two frequently conversed about the abuses prevailing in respective churches. At first, Gheorghii used to defend his church, and became angry when upon the subject. But by degrees both became more and more dissatisfied with their creeds, and throwing off outward restraints, professed infidelity. At this time one of the missionaries, visiting Thyatira, gave a copy of the New Testament to Gheorghii's Armenian whilst Gheorghii procured one for himself from Magnesia. The reading of this brought light to their minds, and the result was that they professed themselves Protestants. Gheorghii is now a Christian. Several families joined the movement at that time, and persecution soon broke out. Some went back, others have remained steadfast; and there are now, I believe, six who are visited from time to time by the American missionaries from Smyrna. . . . expressed himself hopefully as to the prospects of missionary labour among the Turks, notwithstanding the apathy, and, indeed, the opposition which the so-called Christian and orthodox manifest when the claims of Evangelical religion are laid before them. There is a certain honesty and religious feeling in the Turk, especially when uncorrupted, which are favourable to the reception of the truth when prejudice has been overcome. Our intercourse with Gheorghe cheered us not a little. We saw him several times, and liked him very much.

There has been manifested at Oorfa (Central Turkey), for some months, a cheering spirit of unity and prayer; as many as forty persons have been awakened, and there is reason to hope that twenty-five or thirty have become new creatures in Christ. The church is, as never before, "a witnessing church," the prayerfulness and Christian deportment of the members exerting a manifest influence upon those without. At Adyaman, also, the congregation has increased to an average of 175; the chapel has been enlarged, entirely at the expense of the people, so that it will now accommodate a congregation of 400; to some extent there has been, as at Oorfa, an increased spirit of prayer; and "some ten or more hopeful conversions are reported."

PERSIA.

A missionary of the American Board writes, respecting the proceedings and influence of the Government agent at Oroomiah:—

Nejef Ali's mission here, to protect our Nestorian Christians, has proved a miserable and contemptible failure. Persian-like, he has proved treacherous, and in his turn become one of their greatest oppressors. He at first beat them, in some instances, because they did not dare complain against their masters; and when, emboldened by him, they did venture to unbosom in confidence the story of their wrongs, he turned right about, and handed them over bodily to those same masters. Verily the tender mercies of the wicked are cruel.

A faithful native helper—Deacon Joseph of Degala—has been called to his eternal reward. He is spoken of as having been a man of well-balanced mind, fine scholarship, and solidity of Christian character. He was very useful to the mission in connexion with the press.

INDIA.

The prevalence of cholera and consequent mortality in the Mengnanapuram District (South India) has put the sincerity and earnestness of the native converts and inquirers there to a severe test. About 150 of the heathen were for a time induced to join the missionaries and put themselves under instruction. But they nearly all left again. Some of the native converts, on the other hand, exhibited the most steadfast adherence to the true faith on their death-beds, and under the most trying circumstance. Thus a native Christian named Vellian lost, within two days, his three children, from the attack of this fatal malady. Thrice, as one child after the other was attacked, did the heathen relatives urge the father to offer worship to the demons in order to save their lives. He firmly refused. Soon afterwards Vellian was himself attacked, and felt death approaching. The solicitations of his idolatrous friends were renewed. They besought him to consent to a devil dance on his behalf, telling him that, though he had thrown away the lives of his children by his obstinacy, there was no occasion for him to throw away his own life also. "Let me alone," he replied: "I know it is God who gives life, and that it is He alone who takes it away." His last request was, "When my senses fail me, take care you do not get up any demonolatry for me, and say that I sanctioned it." Vellian had been only four years under instruction.

Very different was the closing scene in the case of another professed Christian who, during the same time as Vellian, had enjoyed the instruction of the missionaries. Sude-liemaden, as he was called, was the head man of a congregation of seventy souls in a village in the Asirvadhapuram District. He was apparently quite sincere in his attachment to Christianity. His wife, however, who had formerly been a professed devil-dancer, never had given proof of being entirely free from a superstitious fear of demons:—

In the cholera time this woman's child was attacked, and she spoke out her wish to have recourse to the old method of cure—a devil-dance; but her husband forbade it. Such a scene as Solomon compares to continual dropping on a very rainy day followed; and the child, who in all this altercation had been left without medicine, of course died. The next day another child, a boy of two and a half years old, was attacked. The father gave him medicine, and the mother, now not to be restrained, tried the efficacy of a devil-dance, which she conducted in person. The child recovered. Three or four days after the poor creature was also attacked with cholera. Now again she vowed that if she recovered she would give largely to the demons, and, as it happened, she did recover. In this she saw fresh cause for triumph; she had saved, not her child only, but herself, by having recourse to demons. Her husband began now to waver in his mind, and to wonder whether, after all, there might not be something in the asserted efficacy of demon-worship. This soon grew into a sort of assurance that there was something in it; so he began to cast about for ways and means of returning to demonolatry without losing his status in the village, as he would, if he became an apostate from the Church, instead of being the head man in it. He formed the plan of seducing, coaxing, or compelling, as he might be able, all those who had come with him into the profession of Christianity, to return with him into heathenism, and set to work to accomplish this wicked end. Two-thirds of the people secretly agreed with him, but, with horrible duplicity, continued regular in their attendance at church, until a fit opportunity arrived for open apostasy. The head man's next move was to get the support of the rich heathen of the neighbourhood, to give some importance and display to the intended demonstration. These at first hesitated, but afterwards complied, and all preparation was made for a grand devil-dance. Pots and chatties, as many as two men could carry; rice, sheep, and provisions in abundance were prepared; and it was fully purposed to apostatise on the 12th of January; but the triumph of this wicked man was short. The very night on which he had completed his preparations he was taken ill of cholera. In his alarm he vowed twelve rupees to the demon, and had three oxen sacrificed by night; one at the east end of the street, another at the west end, and a third was to have been sacrificed in another street facing north, but the man entrusted with this commission appropriated the fowl to his own use, and walked home with it. Eggs, too, were dashed to the ground at the feet of the sick man. Larger promises and costlier vows were made to the demons. All, however, was vain. The disease gained strength, and the sick man's hopes grew fainter. At last, when he felt that death drew near, he said to his wife and relatives who stood around him, "If you return to heathenism you will be all ruined: continue in the Vedam, and stand fast by the atheist; and, having said this, he expired.

A house of mercy for the reception of lepers has for some time been established, in connexion with the London Society's mission, at Almorah. There has been a remarkable awakening amongst the poor outcasts sheltered there. Several of them have been baptized, and there are now thirteen more candidates awaiting the administration of the sacred rite. One of those baptized had, before coming to the asylum, travelled in company with his father to the four great places of pilgrimage, and had given large sums to the Brahmins to remove his stain of leprosy, which, according to the Hindoo doctrine of transmigration of souls, he believed to be the fruit of some sin he had committed in a former state of existence.

A native teacher in Mysore, while on a preaching tour, visited Tirumalgode, a place thought very sacred by the Hindoos, and where there is a large temple to Ishwara or Shiva. The people daily employ themselves in reciting fabulous stories. Here is one which he tells as he heard from many a mouth:—

There was in the southern part of India a certain rich Brahmin, who, before his death, advised his son to carry his corpse away to Kashi and burn it there, that he might get into heaven. Accordingly, when the death of the Brahmin happened, his son hired a Brahmin to carry the corpse; and travelling towards the north, he came to this place. The Brahmin made his coolie to stay here in a place till he came back from seeing his friend; but the hired Brahmin, in the absence of his master, fancied he should like to see what was in the box, and opened it. The man was quite astonished to see a lot of flowers of different colours, and thought in himself that his master was taking them to offer to the god of Kashi. After many days' journeying they arrived at Kashi, where they opened the box, and saw nothing but bones. The hired Brahmin then related to his master the change he observed in this place. In consequence, they both readily brought back the bones to this place, and found it was a miraculous change produced by the sacredness of the place. He was exceedingly joyful, threw all the flowers into the sacred river; and giving a public feast to all the Brahmins, went home.

CHINA.

The preaching of the Gospel in the Chinese capital is now a daily work, the people are attentive, and there are some inquirers. "The harvest in China," writes a missionary of the American Board, "is drawing nigh. I think it may be said hundreds are now uniting with the Christian Church each year."

The Rev. W. C. Burns, of the English Presbyterian mission, who, as we mentioned in a previous number, has been visiting Peking, still continues there, the object which he had chiefly in view—namely, full toleration for native Christians—not being yet attained. The rights of Protestant, as compared with those of Roman Catholic missionaries, are also engaging his attention. Roman Catholic missionaries have the right, obtained by French diplomatists, to hold property in all parts of China; and as English subjects are secured, by treaty, the enjoyment of every privilege possessed by "the most favoured nation," our own missionaries are entitled to the exercise of the same right. Yet a case having arisen in which the title-deeds of a Protestant chapel required official recognition, it was refused by the local authorities, and on reference to Peking, the refusal was confirmed, and the missionaries were informed that they had no right to hold property beyond the open ports, and that they must give up the chapel to the authorities. Should this decision not be set aside, as, by the efforts of the British and American ambassadors, there is reason to hope it may, then, says Mr. Burns, "as far as the law is concerned, all our mission-stations beyond Peking might be broken up at once, and the progress of the Gospel everywhere be arrested by Government interference; and this while Roman Catholics have had secured to them such ample freedom, both in holding property and in many other respects, such as immunity of their native converts from taxation for idolatrous purposes, &c."

Two native soldiers were lately baptized by the American missionaries at Tien Soon afterwards an order came to detach one-fourth of the regiment to which they belong to receive and welcome at midnight Hsi Shen, the god of joy. On application to the authorities, the missionary was informed that private soldiers would not be required to worship idols; officers must.

Forty members were received by the American Presbyterian Church at an out-station near Ningpo, during last year, not one of whom receives any support from the mission. They have a native pastor, supported, in part, by the Church. In all, there are about a hundred members, two native pastors, and four licentiates or probationers.

The labours of the medical missionaries are operating most beneficially in securing the brethren in general more respectful treatment than they would otherwise receive. "In one place," writes the Rev. Mr. Swanson, of Amoy, "on our return from Yam-chau, we were stopped by a band of lawless fellows, and speedily found ourselves surrounded by a crowd. We were asked if we belonged to the same party of foreigners as Dr. Gauld, and on our replying in the affirmative, we were allowed to pass on without any further annoyance. Since Dr. Gauld has opened an hospital in Swatow, he has had patients in great numbers. One while I was there, the doctor had 101 out-patients, besides 58 in-door or resident patients. Thus too, Dr. John Parker, of Ningpo, writes: "I can have any amount of patients, all kinds of diseases. The people are very friendly, and have confidence in us, knowing we are men who preach Jesus and heal their diseases. They hate foreigners, but the us 'kwe kyu,' or honourable men."

JAPAN.

Dr. Lockhart, of the London Society, visited Japan previous to his departure for China for this country. The people, he says, seem much disposed to have the Gospel, though the Governor has declared that he who is baptized shall be at once executed. There are six American missionaries at Yokohama. One of them, the Rev. S. R. Brown, of the Reformed Dutch Church, writes:—

"We are, and have for some time past been, in the midst of a work of divine grace here. The seamen of the fleet are the subjects thereof. One vessel has now six men who rejoice in having peace in Christ. One officer in another. One or two men in a third; and two or three in a fourth and three or four in a fifth. The captain of one man-of-war is a devoted Christian, and at his request I have preached twice on the Lord's-day at the hour of Divine service, and established a Bible class which numbers fourteen men and boys. This has resulted in the conversion, I verily believe, of three. A good many are anxious to know the way of life, who have not found it. Next Sabbath our communion day. I hope that several will be able to be present and confess Christ before me on that occasion. I felt assured at the opening of the year, during our week of prayer, that God's will was with us, and I believe the Lord is answering the prayers then offered up for the outpouring of His spirit upon men around us in this dark corner of the earth."

WEST AFRICA.

The Pongas Mission of the Propagation Society appears to be prospering. The baptisms at the Domingia station include the chief, Mr. Charles Wilkinson. The Rev. J. H. A. Duport, the missionary, writes:—

"I am in great hope of obtaining a footing in Bangalong next year. I have visited that place and seen the chief, who is inclined to give us a place near his town. Bangalong is the place to which the slave-trade was carried on in all its branches, and where John Ormond, an incendiary, lived about fifty years ago. He burnt out the first missionaries at Freetown and afterwards shot himself. Bangalong is the key to the interior, and there are adjacent towns, e.g. Sangha, Farringia, Bacoro, Samucco, and others. I spent a long time with the chief, endeavouring to persuade him to follow the dictates of his better mind. The morning after, I informed the chief of my intention to depart. He then called together the people who were at the time in the town (about thirty in number), to whom I preached from text—"This day is salvation come to this house." They were all very attentive, and said they were very glad to hear what they had heard, and that if the missionaries be received they will be by them. The total number of persons baptized by us up to the present date is 421, and there are now eighteen in preparation for baptism."

The Rev. S. H. Edgerly, of the United Presbyterian Mission, Old Town, Old Calabar, states that Ekpenyong Etim, the chief, with all Old Town, has been compelled to endure a good deal of annoyance on account of his endeavours to maintain the sacredness of the Sabbath:—

A month or two ago the people in the town made ikpo, or funeral orgies, for one of their men, now dead some sixteen months. This ikpo continued two weeks, during which time even red by the Calabrese; so these men were entrusted with a great deal of power—but unjust to our little town. The first notice we got of their arrival was by seeing and hearing a lot of people into our yard. I asked what was the matter, and got for answer “Ekpe ke ke is in the town), which was and is answer sufficient for all who know what “Ekpe ke ke is. Going into the market-place, I saw an Old Town lad in the clutches of three of the men, who wanted to flog him; and why? because they were authorised to do as they chose to flog him. After some palavering, however, they let go the lad, and then a whip in my face, as if they would like to give me a taste of it, went to find here. Not to prolong my story, I merely add that the other messengers had by this time two lads, whom they brutally flogged. Of course Ekpenyong and his chiefs did not relish this, and turned out to stop them. Had not the messengers been Egbo men, they would have been knocked down and put in irons; but seeing they belonged to the sacred and privileged class, merely cursed and ordered out of the town, which order they obeyed in high dudgeon. Ekpenyong went to Duke Town to see what was meant by the late disturbance; and very soon before leaving, though he promised to use soft words. The day following I learnt from Ekpenyong that he and his town chose to regard God's day in preference to Egbo, they shall be fined of brass rods (not less than 120/). The fine was laid on, not by the Duke Town people, but by the head man of the particular grade of Egbo that had been disappointed of a feast and dance. To Ekpenyong's petition, the fine was reduced to twenty boxes of rods, and thus the matter rests. The rods must be paid, no matter who pays them, but Ekpenyong is responsible for it. I am glad to say that the affair has had no injurious effect upon either church or school.

SOUTH AFRICA.

A missionary of the United Presbyterian Church in Kaffraria, in mentioning the case of a woman who has come out of the depths of heathenism, but who had the seeds of truth sown in her heart while young and in service in the colony, observes:—“More than one-half of those girls who had learned to read the Word in our stations, and were full of good from the instructions of missionaries, but whose parents, living in heathenism, away afterward for cattle, when they came of age, became recovered in the long run. This is the case of young men, or rather of boys, taken away from our stations as soon as the period of maturity arrived. It is found that these persons are generally the first to come to newly-formed churches, and would they happen to be near them. There are many facts of this sort that have come under the observation of missionaries.

MADAGASCAR.

The labours of the missionaries have hitherto been confined mainly to the capital and adjacent districts of Madagascar. In consequence of an invitation from the native Christians, the brethren of the London Society now contemplate opening a new centre of mission in the Betsileo country. Not a month passes without additions to the existing churches in Antananarivo. One of the churches has been burnt down in a great fire. Christian worship has been prohibited from the commencement of the present reign of peace only in the island—Ambohimanga—which is regarded by the idolators as their superstitious observances. The Christians, in deference to this feeling, have no church outside the walls; but now the Queen has been induced by the heathen to issue a proclamation prohibiting all Christian worship, either public or private, which left but twenty of the three hundred and forty pupils in the school without a hope in Christ." One who is said to have known Miss Fiske long and well, remarks upon her character and influence :—

That she was generally regarded by those who knew her as a remarkable woman was not owing to the predominance of any one quality in her character, but to a combination of qualities, intellectual and emotional, surpassing any thing, as it seems to me, that I have ever seen in any other man or woman. In the structure and the working of her nature, she was the nearest approach I ever saw to my ideal of the Saviour, as He appeared when on earth. The amount of her usefulness is as extraordinary as her character. The book entitled "Woman and her Saviour in Persia," strikingly sets forth her influence on Nestorian character, and I doubt not it would be the judgment of the mission, that few of their number exerted so great a formative influence on the Nestorian mind, as did this departed sister. Certainly the tidings of no death could awaken so many voices of lamentation, as will the tidings of hers, over the plain of Oroomiah, and in the glens and fastnesses of Koordistan.

The principal fact in the following interesting statement we were only able to mention last month with the utmost brevity :—

"The Classes of Wisconsin and Holland," composed almost exclusively of ministers and people who have immigrated from Holland, and are now settled in our North Western States, to the number of 30,000, with a deep conviction that there should be manifested more earnest zeal for the conversion of the world, have devised a plan of missionary operations for themselves. The Classes are to appoint, send out, and support missionaries, in fields which shall be occupied exclusively by them while they are to be also missionaries of the Reformed Dutch Board, and to correspond both with the Classes and the Board. The first missionary was ordained at Holland, Michigan, June 26. A large church edifice, one hundred feet long, was "packed with an eager and most sympathetic audience, at a place where, "only seventeen years ago, the first tree was cut from the almost unconquerable forest." The foundations of a new theological seminary are to be laid, establishing first of all, "Theological Professorship of Missionary Training." But the most remarkable feature of the plan, considering the locality, is the arrangement for building a missionary ship, designed to be of about three hundred tons burthen, capable of lake and ocean navigation, which is to reach the ocean through the Welland Canal, is to take out not only ordained ministers and their families, but also other families as missionary colonists, and is always to make Holland, Black Lake, Michigan, the port of departure and return. The keel of this vessel was laid, with imposing public services, in the presence of a large assembly, on the 24th of June. One of the addresses on the occasion was delivered by the Corresponding Secretary of the Reformed Dutch Board.

POLYNESIA.

The Austral Islands, being small, thinly populated, and far apart, though, through the instrumentality of the London Missionary Society, possessing the Gospel, have no resident missionary. They have lately been visited by the Rev. J. L. Green. His reports are generally encouraging, but in respect of Rapa he sends home most mournful intelligence, as a sequel to that previously received respecting the atrocious proceedings of the Peruvian slavers. We had before learnt that the Peruvian Government, aroused to a sense of the cruel conduct of its subjects towards the inhabitants of several islands in the South Pacific, had provided a vessel for the reception of such of the enslaved people as were anxious to return to their several homes :—

The number of those rescued from slavery amounted to 360, but, from the crowded state of the ship, and the cruelty they suffered on board, as well as the ravages of small-pox and dysentery, less than 344 died at sea and were buried in the deep. The captain carried the sixteen survivors to Rapa, and finding that the inhabitants hesitated to receive them with the vestiges of the disease still upon them, threatened to throw them into the sea; whereupon the Rappans, forgetting themselves, consented to take them into their houses. Thus the seeds of death were scattered; they spread a fatal pestilence under which they laboured throughout the island, and one-third of the population have fallen victims.

At the time of Mr. Green's visit, seven only of the sufferers who had sailed from Papeete remained. Such has been the horrible result of the recent attempt to enslave the peaceful and Christian inhabitants of Eastern Polynesia. More than 2,000 were torn from their homes and kindred, and of those rescued from bondage probably not one will return to report the sufferings and the death of his countrymen.

It is interesting to observe how one of the distinguishing features of Wesleyan Methodism at home—liberality in contributing to religious objects—is reproduced by the missionaries in the most remote parts of the globe, among those who once displayed all the selfishness which is characteristic of heathenism. The Rev. James Calvert gives an account of a missionary meeting held at Lomaloma (persons from other towns, however, being also present), in Fiji, at which what is justly designated "a noble collection was obtained. Five hundred and ninety gallons of oil were contributed, which would realise 70*l.*, and nearly 17*l.* in cash, including a nugget of gold, and a twenty-dollar gold piece, given by a native chief.

Monthly Retrospect.

FOREIGN.

the importance of the news from Italy which our correspondent narrates, can hardly be exaggerated. At last there is a definite prospect of the French troops being withdrawn from Rome. It is true that this desirable event is not to be realised for two years, only then upon certain conditions, which cannot be entirely to the mind of the Italian people. One of the most important of these is to be immediately carried into execution the choice of a capital for the Italian kingdom, which, of course, is to be some other place than Rome, the city on which all good Italians had set their hearts. That honour has already been assigned to Florence; and we regret to observe that the choice has led to tumults and bloodshed in Turin, whose inhabitants are irritated at being called upon to give up the honour their city has so long enjoyed to any meaner claimant than the old capital of the world. Another consideration is that the Italian Government is to take upon itself the burden of the old Papal debt, as a consequence of their retaining so large a share of what was once Papal territory. The Government also engages to defend the Pope and his officials from any attack made upon them "from without," and by implication it engages itself to respect the Papal independence. As a further guarantee, the Italians agree not to object to either the number or the composition of any force the Pope may raise for his own protection, "so long as that force does not degenerate into a menace upon Italian liberty." The Emperor of the French engages to withdraw his troops as soon as these conditions are fulfilled, and at latest within two years. The difficulties and incoherencies in this treaty are manifest on the face of it. The consent of the Pope is not asked in the matter, and his unwillingness thus to acquiesce in the resignation of his territories may be measured by the pertinacity with which he has hitherto persisted in denouncing what he calls the Sardinian spoliation. The new Papal army is not to be a menace to Italian liberty, but the last Papal force was subtly so considered, and the new one will not be regarded by the Italians with less misgiving. Besides, the Italian Government is only to guarantee the security of the Papal Government from foreign attacks; there is no engagement to maintain it against domestic attack; and yet, if we are to believe the most trustworthy evidence, the Pope's greatest enemies are his own subjects. In short, it is impossible not to see in this new movement of Emperor Napoleon a determination to get rid of the Roman incubus at all hazards, and to make use of any decent pretext for the purpose. It may well be supposed that the shameful injustice which the Pope has committed in the late kidnapping of the Jew boy, and the cool contempt with which all French remonstrance on the subject has been treated, have roused the indignation of the Emperor, and filled up, in his eyes, the measure of the iniquities of a Government which, while arrogantly professing to be God's viceregent on earth, is daily committing acts which are an outrage on all laws Divine and human.

While the Papal Government thus rocks to its foundation, the Pope himself, with a complete indifference to his own position, calls the Emperor of Russia to account for the persecutions with which he is visiting the Roman Catholic Church in Poland. In the recent Letter which he has lately published he enumerates a heavy list of sufferings and persecutions which the bishops, priests, and laity of that denomination are called to endure. Churches are closed, controversial preaching is prohibited, perverts to the Greek faith are punished, on heavy penalties, to return to their original faith, and the Bishop of Warsaw has been banished from his diocese. Supposing these accusations to be true, they are, no doubt, gross injustices on the rights of conscience; but it is hardly consistent in the Pope to condemn them. There is not one of the persecutions here enumerated which the Popish Church has not herself over and over again sanctioned and practised. In fact, as it has been remarked, the Pope does not even now condemn these outrages because they are wrong in themselves, because they are practised on the adherents of his faith. But in another point of view the Pope may well mourn over the calamities which have befallen the Polish patriots, for they are all suffered in his cause. It suits his Holiness now to declare that he never encouraged insurrections against Governments; but all who know anything of the Polish insurrection know that it was more religious than political, and that the great object of the insurgents was to found a new Latin kingdom in the East of Europe which should be wholly dependent on the Pope, and which would more than make up for all Rome has lost in the West.

The French Protestant Church is at the present time agitated to its depths with the great question of Orthodoxy against Rationalism. The general elections take place in January next, and both parties are exerting themselves to the utmost to secure a majority. The future which our correspondent draws of the state of parties is very gloomy. Men who would not be admitted, in this country, to vote for any office higher than a churchwarden, are here described as the parties on whom the future destinies of the Protestant Church in France are made to hang. But good comes out of evil, and the increased attention which is thus attracted towards theological questions cannot fail to be attended with beneficial results.

A Roman Catholic Conference was held, during the last month, at Mechlin, in Belgium, or Malines, as it appears now to be the fashion to Gallicise the name. Extraordinary importance was attached to the gathering in consequence of the signal defeat which the Belgian Ultramontanes had sustained at the recent elections, and several of the bishops on the French border attended to dignify the event. The Conference opened pompously enough. A magniloquent address to the Pope was adopted, thanking him for maintaining the doctrine of the temporal power, which, if we are to believe them, is the corner-stone of Christianity. An extraordinary effect was produced by the sermon of a preaching friar, who raised the whole audience into such a pitch of delirious enthusiasm, that, forgetting at once the dignity and the solemnity of their Christian profession, they raised repeated shouts of "Vive Jesus Christ!" much as if He had been an electioneering candidate. But all these strange displays ended in some very common-place resolutions.

In our Turkish correspondence there will be found this month the fullest accounts which have yet appeared of the great crisis through which the cause of religious liberty is at this time passing in Constantinople. It must be matter of regret and shame to every Englishman that the representative of this country has ranged himself on the side of Protestant persecutors. Such a stain upon the English name and influence would hardly have taken place had Lord Stratford de Redcliffe continued to watch over British interests at the Porte. At the same time, our correspondents do full justice to the difficulties which beset the course, and the temptations towards expediency and compromise which fetter the action of Sir Henry Bulwer. They do not disguise that the religious movement has been distorted by the fanatical Turks into a political agitation, and the mistake into which Sir Henry has fallen arose out of his conceiving it his duty to prefer the support of the existing Turkish Ministry to the protection which it was his duty to offer to the faith of his country. This might have been borne; but, unfortunately, the Ambassador has thought it necessary, in justification of his conduct, to misrepresent the facts, and to load the missionaries with the obloquy of various imprudences which they earnestly deny, and challenge him to prove. The whole question is now in the hands of the people of this country, for, unfortunately, the Foreign-office appears to be swayed by the opinion of the Ambassador. But Lord Russell has generally proved himself true to the principles of religious liberty, and he is more than most men impressed by the influence of public opinion. If ever there was a time when public opinion was called on to assert its often-vaunted omnipotence, that time is the present.

The affairs of America have of late entered into a new and more interesting phase. The craving for peace which has long been said to exist in the heart of Northern society has at length assumed a definite form, and has found expression in the unanimous nomination of General McClellan for the Presidency on the principles of union and peace. These two apparently incongruous terms were adopted as the rallying cry of the democratic party at a numerously-attended Convention of Delegates held at Chicago, at which also the nomination of McClellan took place. We have said the terms of the rallying cry are incongruous; we may add that they have already broken down. McClellan accepts the union, but without the peace. A portion of the democrats who are for peace without union have already repudiated his nomination. The result of this split will probably be to secure the re-election of Mr. Lincoln. But it is stated that President Lincoln himself is not averse to an armistice and a convention, upon certain conditions, and that, in the meantime, he has abandoned his intention to enforce a new draft for the army. While this is the position of political affairs, the military situation is not less interesting. A series of brilliant successes has of late attended the Federal army. Grant has seized Weldon railroad, through which derate army in the town of Petersburg drew a large portion of their supplies ; and bloody assaults by the Confederates have tended to shake, but could not induce relax his hold. In Georgia, Sherman has captured the important city of Atlanta, and has now in his possession all the outer defences of the harbour of Mobile. It is how these military advantages heighten and complicate the interest of the political sea. For ourselves, anxious as we are for the restoration of peace, we confess we should be disappointed if all the blood that has been spilt, and all the horrors of war that have been are not to purchase some substantial advantage for the downtrodden slave.

HOME.

A distracted state of feeling arising out of the recent judgment by the Committee of Privy Council in the matter of the "Essays and Reviews," shows itself in many ways. First of all, we have the views of the Bishop of Salisbury—who, it is remembered, was the prosecutor in the suit against Dr. Williams—who, while he upholds the decision, and regrets the composition of the tribunal which made such a decision, regards the result as a loud call to union on the part of all who hold the fundamental doctrines of the Gospel, and intimates that such a conviction was especially prophetic in his mind when he received an offer from a Dissenter at Manchester to bear his share of the liquidation of those expenses which he believed the bishop had personally incurred in the prosecution. Dr. Pusey, on the other hand, is a good deal more outspoken than the bishop. In a pamphlet he has published on the subject, he maintains that the Chancellor "has abolished hell for all who believe in that secular functionary rather than the Church," but he uses that only as a spur to stimulate Churchmen to agitate for the extension of the jurisdiction of a secular court in ecclesiastical causes. He calls upon all, of whatever shade of opinion, to vote for no member of Parliament who pledges himself to vote for the removal of ecclesiastical causes from the province of the Judicial Committee of Privy Council. Churchmen will probably form their own opinion on this advice. The judgment of the Judicial Committee was, no doubt, very wise in the eyes of all men of devout minds ; but before removing one evil, it is desirable to know what kind of substitute to be provided. A tribunal of secular lawyers has its inconveniences, without doubt ; but would a tribunal composed of theological doctors be altogether free from objection ?

A Conference is about to be held at Bristol, on questions affecting the wants and interests of the Church of England. We notice the matter, however, not so much for the discussions of the Conference itself, as for the incidents connected with it, which tend to illustrate the rents and flaws that now everywhere appear in the fabric of Church life. As the meeting is to be held at Bristol, it was natural that the Bishop of Bristol, Dr. Elliot, should be invited to become one of the leading members of the Conference. He was named a vice-president, and it appears had accepted the honour. But meantime, a scandal had gone abroad that the dean had wounded the tender consciences of High Church brethren, and given great scandal, by marrying a lady who had procured a divorce from her former husband. According to the law of the land, there was, of course, nothing wrong in why he should not do so ; but the High Churchmen considered it to be an infracture of the law of the Church, which, according to them, upholds the indissolubility of marriage.

The scandal was so great, that the dean recently resigned the prolocutorship of the House of Convocation, to which office he had been unanimously elected not very long since. And now, on the approach of the Bristol Conference, the restless Archdeacon wrote a letter to the Bishop of Gloucester, President of the Conference, resigning his appointment as one of the vice-presidents, on the ground that he could not act with such consistency as a transgressor of the canon law. The dean has since, however, relieved the venerable Archdeacon of his scruples by resigning his own appointment as vice-president, and by declaring that he will not attend any of the meetings, at the same time that he protests against his being taken as an admission of the justice of the charges brought against him. It is noted that Brother Ignatius means to attend the Conference to advocate the ingrafting of the monastic system in the Church of England. Another Conference was about to be held by the Evangelical party, but to avoid the semblance of rivalry, it has been postponed till next spring. Although not connected with the Conference, yet, as illustrating the divided state of feeling in the Church, we may add that a certain clergyman has been found bold enough to invite Bishop Colenso to preach in his parish, which adjoins Lutterworth, the parish of the great Reformer, John Wycliffe. It is something to add that the incumbent has passed his eightieth year, and seems to be in the hands of his windmill. Bishop Colenso was, as a matter of course, inhibited by the Bishop of Peterborough, and somewhat of a scene ensued, but it ended in Dr. Colenso addressing the parishioners on the village green.

The controversy which Mr. Spurgeon raised between himself and the Evangelical clergy of the Church of England, to which we adverted last month, has issued in his withdrawing from the membership of the Evangelical Alliance. The step was purely voluntary on his part, for the Council of the Alliance took no action in the matter, nor did any of the Episcopal members of the association, as far as we know, make any complaint or raise any objection to Mr. Spurgeon continuing to be associated with them. The objection came from an entirely different quarter. It was Mr. Spurgeon's own brethren—Dr. Winslow, of Leamington, and still more emphatically, the Rev. Baptist Noel—who called the attention of the reverend gentleman to the inconsistency of his harsh language with the mildness of the Christian temper, and the pledge given by every member of the Alliance to speak the truth at all times in love, and in the spirit of that charity which thinketh no evil. Mr. Spurgeon, in his reply, chooses to regard this pledge, thus applied to himself, as fettering his free action, and he therefore revokes his pledge and resigns his membership. He has of course a perfect right to do so; and in his cooler moments, we dare say, he will not forget that the injunction against whose application to himself he thus chafes, is of a far higher authority than the Alliance, existed long before its formation, and will continue to endure long after its dissolution. The incident is an instructive one, as proving the vitality of the Alliance bond. It cannot always, indeed, restrain the infirmities and irascibilities of human temper, but it rises up as a faithful witness against them; it makes an indulgence in such temper and a continued membership impossible—one or the other must give way. In the present instance, we regret to say, it is the bond of membership that has proved the weaker tie; the cases we believe to be many, though in the nature of things they are not likely to be so conspicuous, where the violence of invective has been suppressed by the superior influence of love to the brotherhood.

The Protestants of the country owe the magistrates of Lancashire their gratitude for the open and undisguised manner in which they have set forth the practical working of the Prison Ministers' Act. Some time since they voted a sum of money for the salary of a Roman Catholic chaplain at Preston Gaol; they have since followed this up by voting a sum of money for paraphernalia of Roman Catholic worship, including an altar, incense, crucifix, and all those articles which Protestants regard as objects of idolatrous worship. The money comes out of the county rate. It is indeed, as one of our contemporaries remarks, a church rate, only that it is for the benefit of the Roman Catholics. If Popery is to be re-established in England, the Protestants of the country cannot say that they had not sufficient warning.

The British Association held its annual meeting at Bath last month. Sir Charles Lyell was the president, and he devoted his opening address to an examination of the medicinal waters for which the city is so famous, considering them, of course, with regard to their geological origin. Towards the close of his address, he found his way to his favourite theory of the antiquity of man, but with less of dogmatic positiveness than he has shown in his book on that subject. It further appears that though Sir Charles takes leave to raise startling theories on his own account, that is a liberty which he is by no means disposed to award to others; for he enumerated several geological theories, in the course of his address, only to pronounce that they were utterly untenable. In other respects the meeting passed off much as those in former years have done, in a liberal admixture of scientific gossip and country excursions. But the incident by which the meeting will be most remembered is the melancholy death of Captain Speke, the discoverer of the source of the Nile. The captain had come to Bath, to attend the association, where his presence would no doubt have been one of its chief attractions; but a few days before its opening he went out shooting, and in passing through a hedge his gun accidentally went off and shot him through the heart. Thus suddenly and prematurely perished in the bosom of society a man who had passed unharmed through a thousand perils and hair-breadth escapes from the violence of savage men. So true it is that in the midst of life we are in death. The Social Science Association also held its annual congress at York, where several interesting topics were broached, the venerable Lord Brougham being conspicuous in every section.

Evangelical Christendom.

SPIRITUAL LIFE IN THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

Friend of the Church of England can contemplate her recent history without a holy feeling ; but when we consider well the circumstances of her position and attitude in which she presents herself to the observation of Christendom, this, instead of deepening into dismay, rises into something more hopeful. She has been insulted by those who ought to have done her honour ; she has been assailed by those who ought to have been her guardians ; she has been wounded by hands which ought to have held spear and shield in her defence. But her hurt has not been mortal. It has not produced the stupefaction of collapsing energies and approaching death, but called forth the sturdy resistance of awakening life. It has shown to all the world that there is in the Church of England that recuperative power which, in all organic bodies possessed of vigorous animation, repairs the injury by aggression or disease. Let us explain and illustrate our meaning.

The Church of England has throughout her history exhibited a twofold character. Relatively to the State, she has been usually pacific, long-suffering, zealous, disposed to acquiesce in the decisions of the powers that be ; but, beneath this placid exterior—beneath this habitual patience and forbearance—there has burned a central fire, capable at any moment of breaking forth if injustice and oppression were pushed beyond certain limits. For years, for decades, almost for centuries, the turf has been green and dewy, but when all men began to believe that the like silence would never be broken, the volcanic flame, slumbering in the heart of the mountain, has burst into terrible manifestation. James II., having heard all of the quiescence of the Church of England, having been told that she would never swerve from the practice of passive obedience, having convinced himself that she would be faithful to the Crown even unto the death of her principles, ventured on the experiment of transmuting her from a Protestant into a Popish institution.

He found out his mistake. A storm arose which swept him and his dynasty for ever from the throne of these realms. The Church, which up to that certain point had been all submission, confronted him with an opposition against which he found it vain to contend. She would bear much from men, but she would not bear to be led back into allegiance to the Church of Rome. In our own time, she has so long been content with the status quo, she has so long exhibited only the pacific side of her character, that it began to be doubted whether the capacity of self-assertion, the power of resisting injustice, survived within her. She appeared to have become exactly such a Church as worldly men, and worldly-minded statesmen, love. She was loaded with compliments by writers and orators ; she was honoured to religion, compliments sincerely meant, but which, somehow or other, had a sting in them. She was said to be superior to the agitations of the sects ; she could comprehend, and adapt herself to, the wants of polite society ; she could reflect the temper of the public mind and share in the ideas of the most advanced men ; she had grown too wise to perpetuate theological discussions to the disadvantage of the age ; she was too prudent, too respectable, to insist upon the truth of doctrine for which the public cared nothing. Such was the essential import of the laudation of the Church to which readers of the Times and Saturday Review were accustomed. But once more, as in the days of James II., the Church has been called into a vital part, and once more her spirit has awakened in its might. Who thought that she was no more than a part of the machinery of social order have been astonished at the magnitude of their error. They dreamed that she would make any conceivable sacrifice of purity for the sake of peace, but they have found that there are things she will not sacrifice. She has been commanded by law—so this is the precise effect of the now famous decision of the Privy Council in the case of Dr. Williams and Mr. Wilson—to tolerate within her pale clergymen who do not believe in the authoritative inspiration of Scripture, in the eternity of the Divine punishment of sin, in the transfer of merit from the Saviour to the soul of the believer. Against such an imposition she has protested. Convocation has spoken out, and declared that, so far as it speaks for the clergy, the judgment of the Chancellor is repudiated by the Church of England. Individual ministers have spoken out, putting their names, to the number of 10,000 or 12,000, to a declaration that the faith of Essayists and Reviewers is not the faith of the Church of England. Distinguished men, leaders of parties—Dr. Pusey, Dr. Keble, the Bishop of Salisbury—have spoken out, proclaiming in the ears of Lord Westbury that the cry of a Free Church has been raised in England, and affirming that, if choice must be made between the doctrine of the Church and her civil Establishment, the Establishment ought to be sacrificed rather than the doctrine. These things have, as we said, taken by surprise those who were formerly lavish of their commendations of the Church. A change has become observable in the tone of their references to her. With heart insouciance of vituperation, they reviled those bishops and doctors who refused to have the Church tried by after-dinner standards, and would not wink at the mutilation of her doctrine. This it is that is well fitted to revive the spirit of the well-wishers of the Church. The praises of those men had been insults; their insults have the significance of genuine praises. They are pierced to the heart to find that the Church is not the mere creature of fashion, obedient to every whim of a sentimental and quasi-intellectual public, but has sacred duties which she will at a hazards discharge. Such is the reason why the recent troubles of the Church of England ought not to be looked upon with dismay by those who believe that the highest honour, whether in good report or in evil report, is to approve herself, in the true sense, a Church of the living God.

One of the most striking and impressive of the manifestations which have recently been made of spiritual life in the Church is presented in the charge lately delivered to the clergy of his diocese by the Bishop of Salisbury. His lordship boldly disclaims the notion that the Church has no authority save that derived from the State, and maintains that the supremacy of Christ is paramount to the supremacy of the Crown. Contemplating the possibility that the fleshly arm in which the Church has been ready to put her trust may fail her, the Bishop looks round for sympathy to a quarter in which, in her time of prosperity, the Church has not been apt to seek for friends. Mentioning that, when it was probable that he would suffer pecuniary loss in his efforts to maintain the doctrinal purity of the Church, he received an assurance of aid from a Dissenter of Manchester, he alludes to those bonds of fundamental agreement as to the great truths of the Gospel by which Churchmen and Protestant Dissenters are drawn together, and to that friendship which ought to result from association in one glorious and hallowed cause. We have alluded to the magnificent uprising of the Church against Popery in the close of the seventeenth century. It is remarkable that the occasion was signalised by unwonted harmony and co-operation between Churchmen and Nonconformists, and we hail it as a good omen that, in our own day, when the Church is called upon to resist the definite and final legalisation of Socinianism within her pale, a bishop should be found holding out the right hand of fellowship to Dissenters. It is to be regretted that, at such a time, anything should have occurred—in particular that anything have proceeded from the side of Dissent—to mar the harmony between those maintain the Catholic faith within the Church and those who maintain it her boundaries. We are not called upon to enter on the question of the leness or unjustifiableness of Mr. Spurgeon's attack upon the Evangelical but we must say that, since he was able to suppress his indignation against ngelical clergy for so many years, it was unfortunate that he found himself ly impelled to proclaim it precisely when, distressed by heresy within the and forsaken by those civil authorities to whom they looked for redress, nd most in need of temperate, thoughtful, and friendly counsel.

the Bishop of Salisbury hopes for sympathy with the Church in her es from another quarter besides that of Protestant Dissent. He looks the old Latin Church, and yearns for the reunion of Christendom. ration is beautiful and praiseworthy as an aspiration, but until something ence can be produced that the Church of Rome is ready to abandon those which she has perverted or nullified the Gospel of the Kingdom, we must that talk of union with her is not only premature, but mischievous. That party within the Church of Rome which has comparatively small reverence l claims, and which might be induced to enter upon a negotiation for the communion of Christendom on the basis of Catholic orthodoxy, we know. But these men have been unable to assert for themselves a position influence within the Church. They cannot be accepted as her repre- s. Rome has her eye upon them, and is prompt to check any display geness and liberality of their spirit. The Church of Rome, as represented ope and his conclave and the dominant Ultramontane party in all Popish , has never deviated one hair's breadth from her traditionary policy of simply ing, proscribing, anathematising the Protestant Churches, and has never t of those pretensions by which she arrogates to herself a superiority over en law of God. Before it is practical or useful to speak of union, there a willingness in the two parties in question to unite, and nothing like an tive indication has been received from Rome that the very idea of com- with Protestant Churches will be entertained. We are confident that it e from Rome that the Church of England can derive either comfort or in her troubles; rather will her strength be found in showing herself y Protestant, though resolute that her Protestantism shall not signify the 1 of all ties of belief.

these remarks we have taken one thing for granted—namely, that the danger the Church of England has been threatened is serious enough to justify the manifestations of resistance which have been made. Respecting this tal position, there can, we think, be no doubt. Without entering into any of the constitution of the Church, we may say that, as every system, ontrivance, or sentient existence is exposed to some danger peculiarly its diarily fatal to its life or governing principle, so there is such a danger e in connexion with the Church of England. She is a Church possessing es of doctrine and worship, but the efficient authority over her is the mt of the country. She is what statesmen would have her to be—that is re is no provision made in her constitution that statesmen shall not interpret rds as they choose. Statesmen, however, naturally regard the Church more of her terrestrial uses than in respect of her celestial mission and her celestial

Their tendency is to believe that, for the practical purposes of a Church, an auxiliary in the maintenance of social order, one scheme of doctrine is i another. And the danger inherent in the very constitution of the Church of England is that this secularist tendency should so far prevail as to sweep away all doctrinal barriers whatsoever, and admit to her pulpits any man of decent behaviour and respectable culture, who consents to lecture the people once or twice a-week on their moral duties. We say not that, even by the decision of the Privy Council, the Church has been brought to this pass; but we do say that, unless the Church can induce her rulers to proceed no farther in this perilous direction, nay, unless she can persuade them to repair the breach by which they have already admitted Socinianism within her walls, this consummation cannot be long averted. The day has come when it must be finally determined whether the Church of England is to be known as a Church maintaining the fundamental positions of Catholic dogma, or as one of those governmental organizations, of which examples might be found on the Continent, in which all shades of theological opinion are to be met with, and preaching may or may not, as it happens, be Christian at all. Solemnly and earnestly we say that the time has come for the Church of England to make a stand. It is cause for thankfulness to the whole body of believers throughout the world that grace has been given to so many within her pale to take up an attitude of decision. The grand point is that they see clearly the goal to be aimed at—the vindication of the doctrinal integrity, and divinely-appointed authority, of the Church of Christ. How the end may be attained it is not for us to say. The vigorous testimony of Convocation to the truth may do somewhat, and still more may be effected by diocesan synods. But these will hardly bring about a reversal of the decision of the Privy Council, and until that decision is reversed, we must look upon the Church of England as denied that inheritance of sound doctrine bequeathed her by the Reformers. Should the State refuse to inscribe once more in the formularies of the Church those doctrines which the decision of the Privy Council has virtually erased, Churchmen will be bound to follow the Bishop of Salisbury in holding to the doctrines of the Church, even though, in doing so, they must relinquish the emoluments bestowed upon her by the State.

We have confined ourselves to one mode in which the spiritual life of the Church of England has been recently manifested. We have spoken of the pain experienced, the indignation shown, when the truth of God, committed to the Church, appeared to be in jeopardy. Did space permit, we could refer to many other symptoms of reviving zeal and earnestness within the Church. Suffice it that we direct the attention of readers to the habit which has of late sprung up among the clergy of taking counsel together on the work of the Lord. In such gatherings as the Congress which met last month in Bristol, every department of ministerial duty is carefully surveyed, and the light of many minds is brought to bear upon each. If the State has been sinfully negligent of its self-assumed duty of guarding the doctrine of the Church, her clergy have striven to compensate for the laxity of the civil authority by perfecting her machinery of practical usefulness, and by stirring up each other to fresh exertion in the cause of her heavenly Master. An efficiently-worked parish no longer means one in which the clergyman preaches at the regular intervals, discharges certain magisterial duties, keeps on good terms with the squire, the doctor, the principal tradesmen, and the principal farmers, but one in which every child is looked after in the Sabbath-school, in which the young men and the young women are instructed in Bible-classes, in which the zeal and energy of the pastor have awakened a like spirit in the laity, and brought around him an efficient band of auxiliaries, male and female. This description, we rejoice to think, applies equally, mutatis mutandis, to Nonconforming congregations, but our present concern is with the Church, and it is cheering to think that the days of clerical indolence, and ineffectiveness have gone by. The heart of the Church beats soundly. A large number of men as compose the Anglican clergy, there must be instances of extravagance and absurdity, but the way in which two flagrant exceptions to the general rule of sobriety, moderation, and Christian feeling were dealt with at the meeting was completely reassuring. Mr. Lyne, who, finding that, as Mr. Lyne, did not take notice of him whatever, nicknamed himself Brother Ignatius, observing that, when he walked with shoes and stockings, he was lost in the crowd, took to walking barefoot, appeared in shaven crown and serge nightgown to the assembled clergy, and declared that the working men of England could be comforted only by the instrumentality of such as he. At first he was howled and hooted at, but the meeting calmed down sufficiently to give him a hearing, and the Earl of Derby then quietly extinguished him by remarking, with the unanimous assent of the assembly, that the Gospel of Christ can produce the effect divinely intended without aid from the grotesque, the bizarre, the extravagant. Mr. Lyne violated the Christian rule of sense and sobriety—"Be ye wise as serpents." Mr. Hoare—the second of our exceptional instances—outraged the Christian rule of harmlessness—"Be ye harmless as doves." He boasted of the pugnacity with which, in the matter of Church-rates, he had combated Dissenters, proclaiming with pride that he had put so many of them "in limbo," and avowing his intention of termination to sell up the goods of many more. The reception of him by Mr. Hoare was marked by disapproval as severe as that which was the lot of Brother Ignatius. Mr. Hoare's unchristian sentiments were evidenced with hisses. To the intelligence and piety of the Church it is no secret that Dissenters are to be won over, it must be by very different methods from those of Mr. Hoare. The Congress evidently agreed rather with the Bishop of Exeter, that, at a time when Evangelical Nonconformists ought to support Church-dissension, demanding that the National Establishment of religion shall be Catholic, not Protestant, Churchmen ought not to insist with irritating importunity upon those points of doctrine, of a material kind, which law enables them to assert over Dissenters.

HOW SHALL THEY HEAR WITHOUT A PREACHER?

The objects of Church-organization are these three: first, to set forth the worship and praise of God in the midst of a world that denies Him; secondly, to further the instruction, consolation, and discipline of Christians; and thirdly, the more fully to spread abroad the saving truth of Christ among mankind. The corrupting influence of the best thing produces the worst; and when a Church does not effectually perform these three purposes of its incorporation, it always hinders them in the progress of its perversion. It is with the third of these objects of Church-communion that this paper will be occupied.

respecting the publication of Christianity is that, though Divine in its source, it shall reach mankind through humanity alone. When God would save the world, He would become man in order to bring salvation. And it is through "flesh," like to that which the "Word was made," that He manifests himself still by His truth and Spirit. God works not directly, but by the voice and hand of man—"He worketh in us to will and to do according to His good pleasure." If we will not work, but will stand all the day idle in the market-place, the message will not be made known. We know no example in history of the spread of the Gospel by direct Divine, or direct angelic, agency. The "Lord worked with" the Apostles, but it was through them that He wrought. Angels delivered Peter, but it was that Peter might preach. The Spirit of the Lord "caught away Philip," but it was that Philip might evangelize at Azotus. To employ the instrumentality of man is the fundamental law of the Kingdom. To teach and preach Jesus Christ is "the work which our Father hath given us to do." And hence the silence of the wise is even a greater calamity to mankind than the speech and noise of fools.

It is, therefore, the will of God that each community of Christians should first proclaim the Gospel in its own neighbourhood; that each Church should make its voice heard in the streets around its own doors as the "Wisdom that crieth without." The whole work of filling the world with the light of truth is to be done by division of labour. Each Christian is to shine, and each Church is to be a candlestick. "Go stand and speak in the temple to the people all the words of this life." To make the words of God publicly heard, this is the first external duty of Christians. "Lift up thy voice like a trumpet." "Whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I deny." "Thou shalt speak all my words to this people, whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear." "They that were scattered abroad on the persecution of Stephen went everywhere preaching the Word."

This, then, is our duty—each in our own neighbourhood to make the Gospel the thing most publicly known there—to preach it, to herald it, to proclaim it. To confine our efforts within closed doors is not to "preach" the Gospel. To preach Christianity is to fill the air with its music, as the sky was filled with the midnight songs of angels at the Redeemer's birth. To preach Christianity is to set it forth before mankind with so much intention of purpose, that men shall not succeed in making anything more public than itself; so that no announcement of pleasure, no advertisement of business, no report of news, shall be better known, or enter men thoroughly into the ears of men, than this message from beyond the stars, from the LORD GOD OF SABAOOTH.

This is the duty of each Church in its own neighbourhood, and everything which must be done in order to the doing of this, is a duty as well—the surveying of the population, the study of their peculiarities, modes of life and of thought—all must be examined, in order "that the preaching may be fully known." Whether we live in villages or in great cities, in heathen or Christian lands, the duty of boldly evangelising the people rests with equal weight upon the Churches of God. "Go forth into the streets and lanes of the city and compel them to come in."

Now, this involves hard work. God has made hard work the law of man's life, and not less the law of the new life. It is difficult to serve in the wars of the Lord. It is difficult to spread truth in a world where resistance is offered by the whole force of man's ungodliness, and the whole force and craft and hatred of the powers of darkness. "We wrestle against principalities in the heavenlies." There are spiritual agents whose one great daily business is to "hinder" the Gospel, to close doors against the entrance of the Word, to oppose obstacles, of violence and of seduction, to the progress of Christ's kingdom. The vastness of the population to be evangelised, moreover, is such as to daunt all except those who are in earnest. All but those who take account of the resources at our disposal will look upon the "five barley loaves" and say, "What are they among so many?" There is nothing which operates so successfully in paralysing the energies of the half-converted as the aspect of great multitudes "walking according to the course of this world." They say, What can we do against such crowded neighbourhoods—against enormous districts filled with those who despise their own souls? Look upon the City and its suburbs! Even if we subdued a portion of the hostility, fresh legions would spring from the ground at every stamp of the arch-enemy's foot. But it is not wise thus to take counsel with the spirit of despair. We are not responsible for the conversion of these millions, but we are under obligation to cause them to hear the Gospel. And the largest population can be divided into fractions, and evangelised in detail. The Lord has "set the bounds of the peoples in relation to the numbers of Israel." What is required is that every Christian shall earnestly do his part.

Another difficulty frequently felt is the apparent impossibility of gaining access to a large proportion of the inhabitants of the world. The poor are approached with comparative ease. Their wants secure a ready welcome to all who may be supposed to visit them with kind intentions; but above a certain grade in society doors are closed against casual visitors. People become too "respectable" to be evangelised. You may knock at the door of a very poor man and ask leave to make known the "glad tidings;" but houses of a certain aspect are closed against the missionary, both at home and abroad. There is some truth in these representations. But houses that cannot be entered by the truth, in one form, may be entered by it in another. The true Light shines into all windows, even when the doors are shut. Let true religion begin its work in earnest in a neighbourhood among the poor, and few will remain ignorant of its Divine presence. The most unpromising houses will be among the first to furnish converts and fellow-labourers. The Lord always has His "rich" Josephs and Nicodemuses ready when their aid is required. These are only the lions in the way, which the sluggard sees in his drowsy visions. "All things are possible to him that believeth." The experiences of the last thirty years of evangelical work supply an answer to every one of the excuses and objections of idleness and despair.

The question now comes, On what does the proclaiming, publishing, truth-spreading power of a Church depend? What are the conditions which supply the spiritual forces adequate to the work of the Lord at home and abroad? Here and there might be found one who would still reply, "Money, money is the power, the prime mover, the secret and mighty force which is above all things requisite; money is the Church, by which we may send forth and sustain labourers in the harvest; money, by which we may buy land in the midst of crowded cities, and by which we may build schools and churches, and fight against the powers of darkness by lofty edifices which shall bear visible testimony to the reality of the invisible world, to the spiritual nature of man, and to the perpetual presence of the Living God."

It is not to be denied that buildings are of use. Great buildings for religion are powers for good, if used by good men. The material and spiritual worlds are closely related. He who loves God's holy nation often, and wisely, "builds it a synagogue." To this end large money is needed, in order that the work may be nobly done. But money is not the first or the chief resource by which Churches are to operate in the regions around them. The first, the chief, the great power of a Church for spreading the Gospel around it, is the godly life of its members. Almost all vain are all formal messages and exhortations to the spiritual life sent forth from persons who are themselves devoid of it. It is this life itself which is the "light" which must shine. Being good is the chief means of doing good—a true and real conversion to God. In vain will a dead Church subscribe for some one else to preach the Gospel, or to leave printed descriptions of goodness at hostile doors. The great thing for us is to exhibit in our daily life the power and reality of cross-bearing sacrifice and love. It was thus that the Gospel spread abroad in Macedonia and Achaia from the centre of Thessalonica. "Our Gospel came not to you in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance, and ye became followers of us and of the Lord, having received the Word in much affliction, with joy of the Holy Ghost, so that ye became ensamples to all that believe in Macedonia and Achaia. For from you sounded out the Word of the Lord, not only in Macedonia and Achaia, but also in every place your faith to Godward is spread abroad, so that we need not to speak anything, for they themselves show of us what manner of entering in we had among you, and how ye turned from dumb idols to serve the living and true God, and to wait for his Son from heaven, even Jesus, which delivered us from the wrath to come." It was the "turning from dumb idols," the visible discontinuance of idolatrous practices and a heathenish life, and the new aspect of people waiting for God's Son from heaven, which was the grand means of "sounding abroad the Word of the Lord." If you only describe religion to a neighbourhood in tracts and sermons, you may fail of making an impression. But if you exhibit it, and exhibit it in an organised form, in the social life of a Church whose ταξίς, "battle array," gives "joy" to the eye of an apostle, the life of a Church like Dorcas, "full of good works and alms deeds," you cannot fail to publish far and wide the glories of God's kingdom.

In our day we cannot exhibit a change in England of the particular description here referred to by St. Paul. There is no man who, having been a worshipper of Jupiter, or Mercury, or Bacchus, or Venus-Aphrodite, abandons those worships, and begins to pray to, and serve, an invisible God. But changes just as great and striking may exist, and just as fitted to "sound abroad the Word of the Lord" in a modern neighbourhood. When a man becomes really "spiritual," and rises into a life which has its springs in God—when a man becomes strictly pure and temperate—when from having been a trifier he becomes thoroughly in earnest, and embraces with mighty power faith in a definite and glorious Gospel—when he becomes absolutely honest in word and deed, loving, patient, affectionate, forgiving, peaceable—when he becomes capable of solid sacrifice, of hard personal labour for God and man, and evidently compassionate towards those who are erring and straying from the ways of pleasantness and peace—then there is a change as well fitted to draw attention to the Gospel in the most crowded locality of a modern city as was the conversion of the Thessalonians from idolatry fitted to sound abroad the Word of the Lord in Macedonia and Achaia. The world will "see and admire," and not always "hate the change."

And when Churches consist of aggregations of such changed characters, of companies of such faithful, temperate, truthful, affectionate people, then there is generated a power which is eloquent for God, for heaven, for repentance, for eternity, over all the region in which they dwell. These are the materials out of which effectual missions will emanate. A combination of Churches such as these is equal to any work which God may set before them. Such an association of them will pray with a power before which "doors will be opened" by the hand of the Almighty, which "no man can shut." Such a brotherhood will speak with a voice which no opposition can strike dumb. Such a priesthood will compass about Jericho with blasts of the trumpet before which the loftiest fortifications will "fall down flat." If we desire to be successful abroad, we must first "show piety at home."

There is nothing in the world that has so much life in it as the Word of God; who can speak that Word, even in the simplest form, with stammering lips inspired by a loving heart, wields a power which is "mighty through God," not fail of a share in the fulfilment of the promise, "Instead of the thorn we set up the fir tree, and instead of the briar the myrtle tree, and it shall be to us for a name—for an everlasting sign, that shall not be cut off."

Eternal glory in heaven is an outward and visible adornment for those alone who were made glorious here. Life is an experiment in shining. None but those spirits are lights on earth will "shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of God the Father." But the inward light of a true and truth-radiating Christian is to "put on" congenial light hereafter, to "walk in white," to be clothed in "shine as the stars for ever and ever." The outward will be an eternal manifestation of God's value and estimate of the inward: "They shall be mine, saith the Lord, in the day when I make up my jewels." He sets his finest diamonds in the firmament of gold. He fixes His "burning and shining lights" in a firmament of the translucent sapphire. He illuminates His "roses of Sharon," His "plants of the field" with the rays of the uncreated glory. He clothes His child of clay in a many colours, in the rainbow dyes of heaven, and covers the natural dishonour of humanity with the immortality of God. Let your light, then, dear brethren, "shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven;" so shine, that the Father of lights Himself may open to you a way of escape from amidst the shades of death into the splendours of eternity.

W.

THE REV. DR. RAFFLES.*

RAFFLES, the son of a London solicitor, was born in Princes-street, London, May 17, 1788. Sedate and thoughtful as a child, at twelve years of age sent to a boarding-school at Peckham, kept by the Rev. Martin Ready, a minister. This good man did all he could to foster religious feeling in his pupils, and they had the great advantage of attending the ministry of Dr. Collyer. At the annual meeting of the school before the Christmas recess, when the scholars recited passages which they had committed to memory, the recitation of young Raffles was so wonderful, that Dr. Collyer, who was present, felt, "If this youth be what he seems, what an impressive preacher he may become!" He gained the friendship of Dr. Collyer, became a member of his church, went to Homerton College, and at the more than eighteen years of age, and still a student, he had gained such notice by his appearances in the pulpit, that his services on Sunday were in great demand. He was not twenty when he wrote the following letter to a schoolfellow:—

I left London I have been in travels oft and in labours abundant. I have visited London twice, and preached there in all five times to very large and attentive congregations. There will seat about 700 people, and the last time I preached it was so full, that many were obliged to stand. I visit Canterbury again next week, and preach there on Thursday evening to a very young persons. The week before last I travelled to Hythe, Sandgate, and Folkestone, and very much wished to visit the latter place again, to give them a sermon in Lady Anne's chapel, but cannot. Next week I go to Lenham, a town about ten miles from London where I am to preach on Monday evening; on Tuesday I proceed to Canterbury, where I will preach on Thursday. On Friday I return to Ashford, where I preach in the evening. On Saturday I go to Cranbrook, twenty miles, and preach for Mr. Skinner on Sunday, and he comes to Ashford for me, and administer the sacrament.

You ask, "How do you go on at Ashford?" O, my friend, my success has exceeded all my expectations. It would indeed delight you to see how the chapel is thronged with hearers. On Sabbath evening every place where an individual can stand is occupied, even up to the pulpit door, and though 'tis winter time, and very cold, yet last Sabbath there were so many standing in the passage to the place, in the open air, as by their numbers to keep each other warm.

Memoirs of the Life and Ministry of the Rev. Thomas Raffles, D.D., LL.D. By Thomas Raffles, Esq., B.A. London: Jackson, Walford, and Hodder.

And for more than fifty years a similar activity marked his course, and a new failing popularity rewarded his labours. He had just attained majority when he was ordained at Hammersmith. Here he remained for two years and a-half, when early in 1812, he was transferred to Liverpool, to be the successor of the still more youthful and truly wonderful Spencer. In Liverpool he fulfilled a ministry of forty-nine years, and it is hardly too much to say that his renown in the pulpit added the fame of that magnificent city; for in many corners of the country the frequent of the Nonconformist chapel had no association with it more familiar than as a place from which the great Dr. Raffles had come. On the other hand, to many visitors of the great western emporium, the spot which stood out predominant was the Great George-street Chapel, and to the occupant of its pulpit the suffrages of many would have assigned a rank as the very prince of English preachers.

Of that preaching it was one great merit that it always contained the Gospel, and in Dr. Raffles's earlier years "the joyful sound" was not so familiar, nor were Evangelical phrases so commonplace as they have since become. Even now, when out of the abundance of his heart any one preaches the glad tidings, the people are attentive to hear. And there was a great charm in his manner—a fine countenance, radiant with sense, and candour, and kindly sympathy; a voice of great compass, melodious, rich, and tender; with an amount of action which threw a surprising force into his words, and which in the reading of Scripture would occasionally light up the text with a new significance. His printed verses are not poetical, but they show such command of expressive diction and of the usual images, as would go far to give a popular audience the sublime sensation; and, what is far better, his implicit, unquestioning confidence in the great truths he proclaimed, and his own homely, genial, manly nature, in broadest contact with his friendly and affectionate audience, went farther than any originality could have done to bring his hearers to a belief in those faithful sayings which thrilled in every tone and shone from all his countenance.

Of the actual results of Dr. Raffles's ministry, beyond its amazing popularity, his memoirs do not furnish many details. But they abundantly prove that that popularity did not injure the preacher himself; and there can be no greater testimony to the solidity and worth of his character. Although he sometimes had to enter the church where he was to preach by the vestry window, owing to the crowd at the door, and although after a memorable campaign at Bristol the streets were crowded with people waiting to see him off, no amount of admiration or notoriety could turn his head. It neither made him arrogant or conceited, nor did it betray him into paradox or affectation. It seemed only to draw forth his affections more cordially to a people from whom he received such kindness, and made him feel very much at home in all regions of that great English commonwealth through which his own career had been such a triumphal progress.

When the Evangelical Alliance was first formally projected at Liverpool, December, 1845, Dr. Raffles took a warm interest in its proceedings, and as "the embodiment of Liverpool hospitality," helped to diffuse much of his own brightness over the social gatherings with which its proceedings were interspersed. With his rooted dislike to controversy and his own catholic relations to Evangelical Christendom, he was a ready-made member of the Alliance; and perhaps we ought to specify one service which he long rendered beyond all his brethren. Although he had never been in the United States, there was probably no clergyman, Established or Dissenting, whose heart and home were so open to transatlantic visitors; and it was a happy circumstance that in the port of their arrival so many distinguished and professors from America found awaiting them the large and loving of an Englishman so representative as Dr. Raffles. of years and full of honours, he ceased from his labours August 18, 1863. biography now published we are indebted to Dr. Raffles's eldest son. This filial affection has been executed with judgment and with care. Praise-mains have been taken to collect the information likely to interest the friends ther, and as happily in such a history neither reserve nor panegyric was the manly and straightforward narrative proceeds with nothing fitted to the reader nor likely to awaken doubtful disputations. We thank Mr. or giving us such a book, and for giving it so soon.

DEATH OF PASTOR FLIEDNER, OF KAISERWERTH.

FLIEDNER died (in harness) on October 4, at the Deaconesses' Institution at Werth-on-the-Rhine, which he had founded. He lived to preside at the celebration of the anniversary of this his foundation, which he began in 1833, with one "sister," one female criminal, and no money, in a small house in his pastor's garden. But though he willingly kept himself in the end on this thirty-first anniversary, he was so exhausted after it, having suffering from chest disease, that the medical man ordered him entire rest and change of air. He went to the Convalescent Institution, which he himself had for his sick Deaconesses, but came back for the confirmation of two of them on September 25, and all then saw he was dying. But he had time to collect children about him, to give them precious words of exhortation, and to speak too, quite simply and openly about his own death, of which he said, "It is my duty to be as a little child going to its Father."

He was in the last agony on Tuesday morning, October 4. But hymns were and prayers offered aloud, at his own desire, all that Tuesday morning, as he lay in his chair. And the Deaconesses were all admitted into his room, by tens and to see him and to join in these hymns and prayers, till two o'clock, when he said his last words were "Victory!" and "Overcome!"

Pastor Fliedner created a hospital, a penitentiary and asylum for females released from prison, an orphan asylum, a normal school, an infant school, and lastly, a lunatic asylum, the whole to serve as training schools for his Deaconesses, whom he also employed as Parish Deaconesses. The mother house was at Kaiserswerth. But his influence was not only all over Germany, but all over the world, from the East to North America, from Italy to London. He has Deaconesses at Jerusalem, Constantinople, Alexandria, and Bucharest. And since 1860, he has (as stated in the number of Practical Christendom of October, 1862), at Beyrout and Sidon, given a Christian home to the orphan children and sufferers from the Lebanon massacre, under his Deaconesses' wing.

In the spring of this year (1864) there were 415 Deaconesses belonging to the Institution, of whom 256 were full sisters; 303 are at work at 103 stations in Germany and abroad. Besides these, twenty were at work in the war hospitals of Schleswig-Holstein, ten more had been asked for by the War Minister, but only some could be spared to go. In the Schleswig-Holstein war-hospitals were many Catholics, Austrians and Danes, than Prussians. (So much the better. Many Catholics know now how Evangelical Sisters of Charity can work.) Three sisters are at work as Parish Deaconesses in twenty-five parishes, but many applications for sisters to be refused. The harvest truly is ready, but the reapers are still too few. Seventy-five sisters devoted to education only (of which fifty-one are full sisters) are included among the above 415. But this number gives no idea of the work of training mistresses for infant schools, elementary school industrial schools, young ladies' boarding schools, and governesses for private families which goes on at Kaiserswerth. 1,007 have been thus trained, who work freely for the good cause, but do not enter as Deaconesses; and, blessed as is the work of the latter, perhaps the former work has an equally world-wide influence for good.

When arrived at their destination, the school-mistresses try, by Sunday-school visits to the poorer children at home, by friendly acquaintance with the mothers to spread the real work of education. At the young ladies' boarding-schools, besides excellent instruction, the girls can, if the parents wish it, receive an initiation in housekeeping, cooking, and dress-making. They are exercised in gymnastics and the open air. And they have all the beautiful German music-teaching. At stations (e.g., London) were also originally started with Pastor Fliedner's Deaconesses who still administer them, though no longer attached to Kaiserswerth.

And when we consider that all this was done at an annual expense (last year of about 7,500*l.* (plus a sum of about 1,500*l.*, spent in building in 1863), we can truly say, never was so much good effected with such small means. And all this has been accomplished in little more than a quarter of a century—in twenty-seven and thirty-one years, or, including the Penitentiary, which was Pastor Fliedner's first work, thirty-one.

They ask our prayers from Kaiserswerth, for the continuance of his work. He leaves a widow, who was as efficient a "mother" to the Deaconesses as he was a "father," and seven children without provision. His daughter is married to Pastor Disselhoff, who seconded him in the institution. They ask our prayers, not for the fatherless children and widow, but for his work.

Let us, then, after returning thanks to Almighty God for the life and work of this good man, pray that it may please Him to raise up men who will continue the work which belongs more to Him than to us, in the same spirit of poverty and of taking up the cross, of purity and of a sound mind, that His servant Fliedner did.

London, October 21, 1864.

FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE

Foreign Intelligence.

FRANCE.

—, France, October, 1864.

HOW PIUS IX. HAS COMPROMISED THE CAUSE OF THE PAPACY.

In speaking, in my last letter, of the Roman question, I had no idea that it would enter, a few days afterwards, a new phase. It is certain that the Franco-Italian convention has excited general astonishment. Napoleon III. showed, for a long series of years, a hesitation, a timidity even, which gave us no reason to suppose that he was on the eve of adopting a most decisive resolution.

The causes of this change have been variously interpreted. Many persons regard it as being of political rather than religious significance. The Emperor did not approve of the conduct of Austria in the affair of Denmark; he was displeased to learn that the Northern States were for a new coalition against Western Europe and in his ill humour he thought proper to give the Cabinet of Vienna a severe lesson. But I have no intention of venturing on political ground. The matter has also religious causes, and it is to this aspect that it is for me to call the attention of readers.

Pius IX., as regards his personal vices and virtues, is assuredly a man worthy of respect. He has, so far as we are aware, a most sincere belief in the doctrine of Romanism, of which he is the representative, and his private conduct has not afforded occasion for severe censure. His advances and long-sustained misfortunes secure him, moreover, from being made the subject of criticism. But it must be acknowledged hand, that the Pontiff is but ill guide what is called the bark of amid the storms of the nineteenth his intellect is narrow. It is, in the mind of a monk of the middle than that of the head of a great communion. Pius IX. does not at and the ideas, the principles, or ies of the present age. He con- blind obstinacy with fidelity and nd imagines that, after having , for the hundredth time, his possumus, he has triumphed over versaries. Moreover, under the ence of bad health and old age, incapable of reflecting seriously he says or does. He falls into a us passion, and then makes im- eches. Thus, for example, in the bland, Pius IX. violently attacked Muscovy, without having given s, his bosom counsellors, a hint of n to do so. This was a silly piece tion, uttered on the spur of the hich could do no good for the hich greatly offended the power- t of the Russias. We may be sure nder II. will now favour the Liberal Italy rather than obstruct ncy and imprudence also charac- ts of the poor old Pontiff. After ies and the indignation resulting bduction of young Mortara, how IX. again commit the same fault up in a monastery young Cohen ? ntage did he gain by this pro- rich was revolting to all honest n in the ranks of somewhat Roman Catholics ? Might he not en that the French Government offence at it, and that Napoleon III. would regard it as a provoking is own person and authority ? perdere Jupiter, dementat, said an . The Roman Pontiff has acted and must pay the penalty of his read the documents published by r for Foreign Affairs, and there is at I should analyse them. One es to be particularly noticed—the n which M. Drouyn de Lhuys conscience of the French nation f Rome, and declares that our cannot accept the responsibility s which are not in harmony with s, and with the principles of our If we disencumber the idea of its diplomatic drapery, this signifies, in good French, "In Rome you commit inexcusable crimes ; you violate all laws, human and Divine, in face of the French flag. Well, you have exceeded the measure of our forbearance, and we no longer wish to share the odium of these dishonourable practices. Our troops will speedily depart, and if you succumb in a popular revolution, so much the worse for you ! It is not our fault, but yours !"

OPINIONS OF THE ULTRAMONTANE PRESS ON THE CONVENTION OF SEPTEMBER 15.

It would be difficult to depict the lively emotion excited in France by the publication of the new treaty between Paris and Turin. It was like a sudden thunderclap.

The Ultramontane organs, with those of the Legitimists, or partisans of the old Bourbon dynasty, refused at first to believe in the reality of any such convention. When doubt was no longer possible, they expressed great dissatisfaction, at least so far as they could, within the limits to which they are compelled to confine themselves. If the press in France were quite free, we should have heard much more violent protests, and Napoleon III. would have been represented as an apostate and an impious man.

The Jesuits are singular logicians. On the one hand, they affirm, with remarkable boldness, that the majority—the great majority of the Romans—love, respect, and venerate the Pope's temporal power ; and on the other hand, when the Government announces that our troops will quit Rome, after having left Pius IX. time to organise an army, and under the express condition that the Italians shall not attack the city of the Vatican, these same Jesuits shout aloud in terror ! They predict that the Pontiff will be compelled to go on his way to exile ! How are these two opposite assertions to be reconciled ? I am quite unable to say. Will not the great majority of the Romans, seconded by 10,000 or 12,000 soldiers, be capable of protecting Pius IX. against the efforts of a minority ?

It is clear that the disciples of Loyola do not believe a syllable of what they say, when they talk of the deep affection of the Roman people for the Pontifical Government. They know that the tyranny of the priests is detested, and that they need to be supported by foreign bayonets. But their object is to arouse the passions of the bigots, in order to intimidate Napoleon III. and his Ministers, and all means are lawful which will enable them to succeed in doing so.

SENTIMENTS OF THE LIBERAL PRESS ON THE CONVENTION.

With the exception of the clerical press, the Paris journals are unanimous in their approval of the convention of September 15. There only exists among them different shades of opinion, which are characteristic and curious.

The Liberal Opposition and Radical papers openly proclaim that the departure of the French troops will be immediately followed by the fall of the temporal Papacy. According to their opinion, there cannot exist the least doubt upon the subject. The citizens of Rome, say these journals, are tired of sacerdotal despotism, and wait impatiently for the moment to throw off the yoke. They have, like other Italians, a patriotic heart and a love of independence. Pius IX. will not have enough money to support a numerous army. Moreover the Pope's soldiers have a proverbial reputation for cowardice and baseness; they are vagabonds, ruffians who will be more prompt to follow the ignoble trade of bandits, than to expose their lives in defence of the Papacy. It is therefore a simple question of time, and the day when the French go thence, the Pontiff will cease to be king at Rome.

The Ministerial journals hold a different language. They set forth long arguments to prove that the convention of September 15 offers to the Pope guarantees of security; they say that Victor Emmanuel and his Cabinet are solemnly pledged to respect the Pontifical territory, and consequently they assert that Pius IX. can accept, without the least fear, the stipulations of the new treaty. Is the French Government press sincere in these promises of peace and tranquillity for the temporal Papacy? That is very doubtful. The sole object of this line of controversy is to free Napoleon III., in the eyes of the devotees, of all responsibility in the matter.

Be that as it may, there is great agitation in the public mind, and I believe that the problem will be solved before the two years stipulated in the convention are passed. It would indeed be far better to terminate the affair promptly, one way or the other, than to keep up a feverish excitement.

EVANGELICAL CONFERENCES IN THE SOUTH OF FRANCE.

We now come to the conflicts of French Protestantism, which appear, every day, to assume greater gravity and intensity. Evidently there exists among us two parties, opposed to each other upon fundamental principles—two churches, so to speak, or two religions. One of the most striking symptoms of this schism is the establishment of the National Evangelical Conference in the south of France. Some explanations are here necessary.

For many years, meetings of pastors and elders have been convened under the name of Conferences. They are not official assemblies like the consistories; they have no right to impose their wishes upon the flocks, or to introduce changes in our disciplinary laws. However, these wholly non-official Conferences exercise considerable influence, and their voice is listened to in our churches.

In the month of June last, an assembly of this kind opened its sittings at Nîmes, the metropolis of Protestantism in the South. It was very numerous, and composed of sound elements. In other words, Evangelical and those of the negative school, were seated upon the same benches. But the so-called Liberals took advantage of an article in the bye-laws, and refused the elders the right of voting; upon which the laymen, indignant at this infraction of the rules of our ancient discipline, withdrew from the Conference, and almost all the Orthodox pastors went with them, so that the Rationalists remained as masters of the field.

A proceeding like this was intolerable, and the result clearly showed that Evangelical and men of negative views could no longer go on together, with any hope of agreement. It was therefore resolved that another Conference, composed only of pastors and elders professing orthodox doctrines, should meet at Alais, a town which has also a glorious name in our Protestant annals. Such is the National Evangelical Conference of the South, which will open its session in a few days. The spirit and character of this assembly are clearly indicated in the circular by which it is convened. I copy the very words: "The Conference professes, on the one hand, belief in the supernatural element (la foi à l'ordre surnaturel), as it is attested in the inspired books of the Old and New Testament, and it is summed up in the Apostles' Creed. On the other hand, the Conference recognises the necessity for common and definite beliefs to constitute a Church, and the legitimate participation of the laity in all that concerns ecclesiastical interests."

These three great points are thus laid down:

1. That the Gospel is founded upon a supernatural revelation of God in Christ.
2. That the Church must have a common belief, or a confession of faith;

the laity, or elders, have the right, ity with the Presbyterian system, rt in the government of the re- sty.

re the bases of the organization of ed Churches of France, and the of Alais is faithful to our time- traditions. We shall see what a it. The trial is a solemn one. se, an open separation is now The Evangelicals have said to the We can no longer remain under inner with you. Go and act with as you think best; we are resolved ur own course."

ake care to communicate to your more important proceedings of ly. Two theological professors of have undertaken to comply with o set forth the rights of the laity inctive principles of French Pro-

CHOICING ECCLESIASTICAL ELECTIONS IN PARIS.

are aware that, in the month of t, the parish elections take place; rds, all the male Protestants, of thirty, will be called to give their the appointment of one-half the f our Presbyterian councils and

There will be, especially in the Paris, a decisive struggle. If guerel, father and son, do not majority of votes for their candi- influence will be gone, and they t with resignation to accomplished n the contrary, they are stronger ends of orthodoxy, the Consistory ll find itself in a critical position, dicals will imperatively demand ion of M. Coquerel to his post of astor. So each party displays e activity in order to gain over t. The Radicals especially spare r time nor their money—neither r other means—in order to obtain

The Evangelicals have in their r present position and preponde- sh they acquired in preceding Let us hope that the Lord will help to those who maintain the th and piety.

se discussions which have taken s occasion, I may refer to a some- r dispute. There are in Paris a sive Protestants who have formed dpendent Church—that is to say, t in receipt of any salaries for their pastors from the public treasury. May these Independent Protestants give their votes in the Consistorial elections? Yes, in one aspect, since they continue to pay the taxes which serve to support Protestant worship, and they possess the rights granted to other citizens.—No, in a different point of view, since they have seceded from the National Church.

The Radicals fear very much the Inde- pendent Protestants taking part in these elections, because their votes would certainly be given to the representatives of ortho- doxy. They have therefore declared that such Protestants, if they are honourable and conscientious men, cannot interfere in our ecclesiastical elections. It is probable, in fact, that most of the members of the Free Church, kept back by their scruples, will, in these grave circumstances, abstain from voting. This will be a sensible loss to ortho- doxy.

But these same Radicals, who have cautioned the Independent Christians not to deposit their votes in the electoral urn, are calling to their aid infidels, indifferentists, worldlings, and people who never set foot within our churches. It is a simple matter, as far as they are concerned. Their motto is not piety, it is a non- descript kind of liberty, or some sort of charity, which pretends to unite affirmations and negations, light and darkness.

GOOD EFFECTS OF M. GUIZOT'S BOOK ON THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION.

Your readers have probably learned that one of our most illustrious statesmen, M. Guizot, has lately published a volume en- titled, Meditations on the Essence of the Chris- tian Religion. The entire work will occupy four volumes.

It is a great and noble spectacle to see M. Guizot, already advanced in age, bearing one of the most glorious names of the era in which we live, gathering up his remaining strength to defend the Evangelical faith against the attacks of rash innovators. His book bears throughout the impress of a lofty intellect, a powerful genius, and a thorough mastery of religious questions. Assuredly, M. Guizot is not a theologian by profession, he has no pretension to be one; but he is a thinker and a writer of the highest order, who employs in the service of the Gospel the talents which he has received from God.

The publication of such a work is also an honour to French Protestantism. The Ro- manists are perpetually repeating that the Reformation of the sixteenth century plunged the nations into infidelity. They may now see that the disciples of Luther and Calvin are often the firmest believers in revelation, and the best able to defend it. Half a century ago, George Cuvier, who was at the head of the savants of Europe, maintained, by scientific evidence, the chronology and the narratives of Moses. Now M. Guizot is proceeding in the same path. This is the best reply to the calumnies of our opponents.

X. X. X.

THE NEW THEOLOGICAL PROFESSOR AT MONTAUBAN.

In accordance with the recommendation of the various consistories of the Reformed Church of France—there being no other candidate for the post—M. Jean Monod has been appointed by Imperial decree to the professorship of dogmatic theology at Montauban, vacant by the death of M. Jalaguer. As our respected correspondent, "X. X. X.," indicated some months since (Aug., p. 380), M. Monod has thus united the two opposite parties in the Church in voting for him. The new professor has for a number of years occupied a pastorate in the Reformed Church at Nîmes. His most important publication, so far as we know, is a volume of sermons, which gives us a favourable idea of his general ability as a thinker and a writer. In his theological views he is what may be called a Liberal Orthodox. On becoming a candidate for the professorship, he issued a circular containing a summary confession of faith and a statement of the principles and course which he thought should be adopted by the occupant of so important a post. This document is now before us, and we may say of it, that if in certain details it is not so explicit as might be desired, it is very widely indeed removed from such a profession of faith as could be made by the Rationalistic party. Perhaps the most conclusive and decisive mode of showing M. Monod's position in relation to doctrine will be to extract that part of his circular which embodies what he holds to be the cardinal points:—

A personal and Holy God, the Hearer and Answerer of prayer; the Creator God, and His free intervention in the world and in history;—the fall of the human race, the tragical reality of the overthrow of our relations with God; the condemnation of the sinner, and his natural inability either to practise the good, or to discover the true;—Divine grace, the bases of the great Christian supernatural, the first and only cause of salvation, gradually revealed to men in history and fully manifested in Jesus Christ;—Jesus Christ God with us, the Word made flesh, miraculously given to the world to seek and to save that which was lost, the only Son of God, the object of adoration in His perfect union with the Father, and true Son of Man, in all things like unto His brethren, Creator and Head of a new human race, which is the Church; God, in Christ, reconciling men with himself; and Jesus Christ, our Saviour and our Master, restoring men to God, by His voluntary abasement, by His absolutely perfect life, by His teaching, which is truth itself, by His miracles, the sign of the power of God which wrought in Him, by His conflicts and prayers, by His temptations and sufferings, above all, by His redeeming (rédemptrice) death, the last limit, and the supreme crowning of His obedience, a satisfying (réparateur) sacrifice for sin, the condition and pledge of pardon; finally, by His resurrection, the Divine sanction of His work;—justification by faith in Jesus Christ;—the Holy Spirit regenerating, then sanctifying souls, and giving us, henceforth the earnest of the life eternal which Jesus Christ has acquired for us;—Holy Scripture, the history of the Divine revelation and the means of knowing Jesus Christ, the pure source of truth, and the sovereign rule of faith, offering us, in its entirety, the Word of God spoken by men of God.

We could point out omissions in this enumeration, but our object is not to criticize so much as to let our readers learn from M. Monod himself, what he considers the topics in Christian doctrine which most claim to be insisted upon.

SWITZERLAND.

THE SWISS PASTORAL SOCIETY AT NEUCHÂTEL.

The annual Conference of the Swiss Pastoral Society was held this year at Neuchâtel, and occupied, as usual, two days. Two hundred and fifty pastors were present. The proceedings commenced with a very able discourse by M. Pastor Godet, of Neuchâtel, displaying at once profundity and freshness of thought, in which he unfolded the significance of the song of the seraphim, "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of Hosts" (Isa. vi. 3), and applied it to the wants of the age. An elevated tone thus marked the opening engagements which was maintained throughout the Conference.

After this discourse, M. Pastor James Pasquier, President of the Society for the year, welcomed the brethren from other cantons, and called their attention to the position of the Church of Neuchâtel, which, without any confession of faith, has hitherto had the rare privilege of seeing all its pastors preserved from the errors of modern rationalism.

The first subject for discussion brought under the notice of the Conference was opened by a paper which had been prepared by Professor Chappuis, of the Free Church College, Lausanne, and which was read in his unavoidable absence by M. Bridel. The professor maintained, in the first division of his subject, the result of a thorough and searching examination of the New Testament, the absolute deity of Jesus Christ, displayed in His incarnation as it had been previously in His mission. This thesis, which was powerfully and elaborately handled, occupied the larger part of the paper. In the second division of his subject, M. Chappuis dwelt upon the practical importance of this doctrine, laying it, among other propositions, the following: the doctrine of Christ glorified presents to man as a personal and living being. His incarnation is the pledge of ours. It puts a new term to progress—a precise aim for our faith and aspirations. Without it, the sacraments wholly lose their significance and the Lord's Supper is nothing more than a festal honour of a dead man."

Several speakers then addressed the Conference, all of whom did homage to the greatness of the deity of our Lord, with the exception of a pastor from the canton of Geneva, who had the hardihood to declare himself against this universal belief of the church—but, happily, without finding his arguments responded to by those around him. The subject discussed on the second day couched in these terms: "What are the causes of the deficiency in the number of ministers now generally felt, and what means should be adopted to remedy it?" M. Pastor Ad, of Neuchatel, read the opening paper on his topic. As causes of the deficiency in mission, he indicated—first, the general spirit and character of the present age, as displayed especially in materialistic tendencies, in scepticism, and in external social progress—that is to say, in scientific, industrial, and commercial pursuits, which present to young men more lucrative and brilliant prospects; next, subordinately, the difficult position of the clergy; and, lastly, the twofold crisis, ecclesiastical and theological, through which the Church of Christ is now passing. As to the remedies, they might be found in—1, prayer; 2, the desire of families to be enabled to devote their sons to the Lord's service; 3, the efforts of pastors in their intercourse with their respective flocks; and, 4, the special efforts of the Church having in view this end; in other words, by increasing the number of theological colleges—by assistance, even pecuniary, judiciously granted; and by the selection of divines, entrusted with the training of youth in view of the ministry.

We must pass over the discussion which followed, to mention that, besides these public sessions of the Conference, there were other and varied engagements of a more private character, in which these 250 pastors, from all parts of Switzerland, shared—cheering devotional exercises, fraternal réunions, and social meetings amid rich rural and forest scenery. The concluding session was thus held in the Museum Garden of Neuchatel, on which occasion, besides the interchange of mutual farewells, the Sabbath question was brought under discussion. It was resolved to write to all the sections of the Swiss Pastoral Society, in order to recommend this subject to their notice, and thus to lead to a sort of confederation among the various local societies labouring to re-establish the observance of the day of rest.

ITALY.

Florence, October 18, 1864.

ALL PROSPECTS AND PROTESTANT DUTIES IN VIEW OF THE NEW TREATY.

The convention of the 15th ult., between France and Italy, for the evacuation of Rome by French troops between this and the year 1866, has occupied the incessant attention of European journalism ever since the news of this important event transpired. It was intended to be kept secret till the official document itself should see the light, but a blunder in the Italian end of the telegraphic wire leaked the startling intelligence. A few days elapsed before the event was credited.

THE XVIII.—V. NEW SERIES.—NOVEMBER.

It seemed too good news to be true, though all Italy had been looking and longing for some decisive measure of this nature, in order to stifle a growing discontent and avoid a general insurrection. It is understood that the refusal on the part of the Pope to allow the Archbishop of Paris to baptize the two children of Prince Napoleon, on the recent visit of Prince Humbert to France, quickened the decision of the head of the French Government. Be that as it may, all the steps taken during the past few years, leading to this Imperial act, are completely forgotten in calculations as to the possible working and probable issue of the arrangement. The

X X

1863. This, very naturally, excited the wrath of the priests, and for many months he was marked out as an object of contempt and vengeance. He was called "Cain," "Judas," "Barabbas," "Antichrist," "Demon," "Beast," and so on, by turns, in the streets. Stones occasionally thrown at his person either struck him on the back or passed close to him. Threats of the knife and pistol made him keep at home or wander in the woods adjoining the town. On the fiesta of St. Euphemia, in September, 1863, "while walking up and down the pavement in front of my own house," he says, "meditating on the pagan revels with which the people thought to honour a saint who loved his own life for the sake of the Gospel, that blessed code so opposed to every superstition and imposture, there came and planted herself in the middle of the street a drunken woman, carrying in a box a greasy doll, which, for the sake of gain, she represented as a miracle-working Madonna, healing all kinds of diseases and granting indulgences to all who offered alms. When candles had been lighted before the image, the woman expatiated on the virtues of the Virgin, and drew her silly hearers into acts of idolatry. As I stood by, my spirit was moved within me, when I saw some of these ignorant people giving money, offering up prayers, beating their breasts, and worshipping the little figure, which could only raise a smile on the part of sensible persons and of many good Catholics. When I thought that these disgraceful scenes were permitted, while the mouth of every one was closed who would lead the people to the light, truth, and love of the Gospel, I was filled with a righteous and irrepressible anger, and ordered the impudent charlatan to go away. Then turning to the worshipping crowd, I exclaimed, 'Oh, brethren, you should adore God only, who lives and reigns in heaven, and sends rain upon your fields, and despise these lying vanities;' and I continued thus to harangue them till the crowd grew so large, that the whole of the authorities in a body interfered, and the city was in an uproar." The charlatan went from the parish priest to the police-office, and thence to the tribunals, where she stated that her daily income was five or six florins. A process was immediately begun against Domenico, for having openly asserted that Evangelical ministers and rites were far superior to those of Rome; that it was better to confess to that great Being who fed the lily of the field than to priests, who sought their personal interests in the ignorance of the people; that it was foolish to abstain from food on Fridays and Saturdays, seeing that God noticeth more that which proceedeth forth from the mouth, than that which entereth, and so on with regard to all the other tenets of the Papacy. After four months of inquiry, Domenico was cited to appear before the court on 13th of January last. His written defence is a very elaborate paper, exhibiting a thorough acquaintance with Scripture. A skilful lawyer was also employed in his behalf, but nothing could avert an adverse decision, given in April—not even the sympathy and applause of the public who listened to the trial, in which Domenico took every opportunity of speaking for Christ. He was condemned to two weeks' imprisonment for the crime of speaking against the religion of the State. You will easily believe that, as soon as he had undergone this punishment, he returned with greater zeal than ever to the reading and circulation of the Bible and religious books, with which he was supplied from afar. But the most interesting circumstance remains to be told; for several other heads of families have written to Domenico, in letters which are now before me, that they too have abandoned the Church of Rome, and are ready to confess Christ before men, at whatever cost. These letters are long and every way remarkable, but especially so for the clear insight into and fervent expression of Evangelical doctrine they contain. These believers have set themselves to diffuse the light of the Gospel which they have received in every possible way in their native town.

PROTESTANT MOVEMENT IN GUASTALLA.

Since I last wrote to you a religious movement has begun in Guastalla, a town of Emilia, lying about half way between Parma and Padua. The bishop of the diocese is a red-hot Papist, and so violent an opponent of the Government, that he lives at a distance from his people, who insist on his praying, in the public services of the Church, for the King and the country. By some recent alterations in the seminary, the bishop had injured the house of the adjoining proprietor, Signor Micali, who, obtaining no answer to private letters addressed to the bishop, proceeded by way of law. In the meantime, Signor Micali let a part of his property to the Evangelicals of the town, and was at once pounced upon by the bishop, who fulminated the major excommunication against Micali and all who attended Gospel ordinances, as well as against all who should receive into their houses, or in any way protect, the evangelist. This was a strong measure to adopt, but the bishop thought thereby to arrest the progress of the truth. In this he has been entirely disappointed. The Waldensian evangelist from Milan found 600 auditors, night after night, waiting upon his preaching. After spending a week at Guastalla, he returned home, but was only allowed to do so on condition that he would revisit them in a day or two. This he did not fail to do, when he found 120 persons desirous of giving in their adhesion to Evangelical principles, and thirty young people asking for catechetical instruction after the public services were finished. As it was noised abroad that the priests had withdrawn a weekly allowance from the aged mother of a person who attended the meetings, although the infirm old woman was entirely ignorant that such réunions were being held, a large and influential committee was at once formed to collect the gifts of the assembled brethren for this particular case, and also to watch over the interests of the cause. The inhibition of the bishop, and the many letters he sends to various parties, calling upon them to obey him as they would the Pope, or St. Peter, or Jesus Christ, proclaiming every one eternally lost who goes near the Gospel preacher, have excited general curiosity and increased the number of adherents. The bishop deals in all sorts of false accusations, in order to discredit the movement. The letters of Signor Micali and the Evangelical committee, in reply, are bold, firm, and trenchant.

Among other charges, the bishop was foolish enough to say that these Evangelical ministers always make their escape from discussion with any one who knows a little Latin. His Evangelical correspondents thereupon earnestly challenge him, in the name of the evangelist, to a public and honourable controversy upon the vital points of the Evangelical faith.

The bishop, however, though vaunting that he was the first to provoke the discussion, prefers to conduct it through the medium of the Difensore, a Modenese Church paper, instead of viva voce, which has greatly disappointed the inhabitants of Guastalla. Dr. De Sanctis has opened the pages of the Eco della Verità for the Evangelical defence, and himself undertaken the whole responsibility of the case. The excitement is very great, as the merits of the question are being expounded on both sides. The Guastalla people are subscribing in large numbers to the Evangelical organ, their friend in need. Signor Comba has been transferred from Pavia to settled pastor, and while Dr. De S the newspaper, is bringing all his lea piety to bear, he has also felt bound, to the special accusation that Diodati of the Bible was a false translation, to the special accusation that Diodati lunge the bishop to a personal ar encounter anywhere, and at any t only the Diodati Bible and the He Greek originals in their hands. In so much worldly indifference, it is a thankfulness that the attention of th should be called to the religious through the authoritative voice of t Bishop of Guastalla.

GENERAL SURVEY OF PROTESTANT

Amid scattered notices of the Italy, it is useful at times to lay b readers a synoptical account of the accomplished over the whole field. first number of a monthly Evangelic printed at Milan, and which has jus hand, there is an excellent and corre—from the pen, I believe, of the Piggott—of the combined operat being carried on throughout the j for scattering the good seed of the p of God, which I cannot do better tl late for your pages. It will show y in how many places the seed is : well-prepared ground, and bringing some thirty, in some sixty, and in hundred-fold. "It would be sup says the writer, "to speak of the W Valleys, where, from times anterie Roman apostacy, the sacred deposit tian doctrine has been preserve Suffice it presently to remember t valleys belong to the kingdom of l that the numerous Evangelical chur schools there instituted form a pai statistics of Italian evangelization. ing from these Alpine retreats to vinces which but lately formed Sardinian kingdom, we come to t Turin. Here we find the beautiful sian temple, with well-frequented annexed, and a workshop, where b sans are taught their various trades.

"In the same city there is anoth of evangelization (that of Signor l and worthy of honourable mention schools in Via dell' Accademia (those of Mrs. De Sanctis), attended 200 children, admirably organised nently popular.

"In Genoa we find three locales Gospel is preached in the langua country, and two elementary Evangelical schools; whilst at a little distance from the walls, in the very centre of the operative industry of San Pier d'Arena, there has lately been opened another centre of evangelization, with a school alongside.

"Besides these two principal cities, there are Evangelical réunions in Alessandria, Asti, Casale, Vercelli, and Pietra Marazzi; nor must we forget the Evangelical lighthouses which are burning in the different villages along the whole Valley of Aosta, nor the little churches of Graglia and Piverone, in the province of Biella, which have been founded and built up amidst the most unrelenting persecution, and though isolated, conserve their vitality and zeal.

"Journeying southward from Genoa along the shore, we see, scattered over the Gulf of Spezia—in Spezia itself, in Sarzana, in Lerici, and in Arcola—little assemblies of Evangelical Christians, who meet together from time to time to edify one another with the Word of life. Leaving the old provinces and crossing the Lombard frontier, we stop first at the free and patriotic city of Milan. Here, in five places of worship, the Gospel is preached to a very numerous auditory, which would be still more numerous if larger locales could be had. The attention of the Milanese public is fixed in an extraordinary manner upon the question of a religious reformation, indicating evidently a most intelligent activity in the search after truth. Three elementary schools for boys, and a boarding-school for girls, show the efforts made by the Evangelicals of that city in the educational department. From Milan the Word of God has been radiated forth, as from a centre, to the adjacent cities and villages, among which we may cite Monza (which Monsignore Caccia would have made the focus of Lombard clerical reaction, if he had met with less patriotism on the part of its inhabitants), Paria, a university town, Varazze and Caravaggio.

"In this last town, under the very shade of the famous sanctuary of the Madonna, the Evangelical Church is flourishing, as full of zeal and courage as our hearts could wish; and the sons and daughters of these good Christians have schools for their instruction, commenced and supported by the Evangelicals themselves.

"The town of Intra, situated on the sunny shore of Lake Maggiore, in a country side of great commercial enterprise, and the most important of the cities of Verbano, has also become a centre of Evangelical light, and its schools, well-directed and flourishing, merit special notice. To Bergamo an evangelist has lately gone, and he reports the joyous reception of his message, so that we have much hope for the future of this thriving place. Brescia counts two centres of evangelization, which have existed for some time. Here, too, there are elementary schools at work. The city of Cremona has received the heralds of the cross with great cordiality and simplicity, and though the congregation has had to undergo severe trials both from within and without, the constant attendance raise our hopes for the future success of the work there. In the town of Assola, destitute for the moment of a resident evangelist, a few Christian people are wont to meet together for mutual edification; and the neighbouring village, Acquanegra, has been occasionally visited by a preacher, and with the most promising results.

"In Como also two halls have been opened for Evangelical preaching, and the various journeys made by colporteurs and evangelists along the shores of the lake of that name, and beyond, as far as Sondrio and the whole of the Vattellina, have shown clearly how fertile and ripe for the harvest are those fields of labour.

"Leaving the Lombard provinces, and holding on our way towards the east, we reach Piacenza, where a Christian labourer a short time back commenced a mission with fair promise of success, but was soon compelled, by the breaking down of his health, to abandon the work so happily commenced.

"From Piacenza we pass on to Parma, a city of known liberal sentiments, where the Word of the Lord has been received with joy, and where is found one of the most numerous and flourishing congregations in Italy. Its good example has encouraged Guastalla, in which town a large proportion of the inhabitants, in spite of the episcopal anathema, have openly declared themselves in favour of the Gospel. From Parma our brethren have also visited Mezzano, and in this large village a remarkable enthusiasm has been manifested in the reception of the messengers of the truth. Passing by way of Modena, a city in which a few faithful souls meet weekly to encourage one another in the way Zionward, we arrive at Bologna, so lately a part of the Papal dominions, where a flourishing congregation, with its complement of schools, bears testimony to the power of the truth.

"In Ferrara, the city of Calvin and Reformation mementoes, a church is also in existence.

"Continuing our course along the eastern coast, the towns of Pesaro, Ancona, and Chieti assure us how, little by little, the light of the truth is spreading, though Chieti is still wanting in a settled ministry.

"We now cross the Apennines and enter Tuscany, the land of Dante and Niccolini. We pause at Florence, one of the earliest centres of Evangelical influence, where, even in the time of the Grand-Ducal despotism, there existed another Church of the Catacombs, notwithstanding clerical rage and Government persecution. Here there are three large meeting-houses open to the public, where the truth in Jesus is proclaimed; also the Palace Salvati, acquired by purchase for the Waldenses, has been converted into a theological college, where the future preachers of Italy are trained; under the same roof is found the Claudian Printing-office, already well known throughout the country for its numerous useful publications connected with the present movement, and three elementary schools, in which Evangelical children receive an excellent education.

"There is also, under the admirable direction of Signor Ferretti, a day and evening school, noted for zealous and practised teachers, an industrial school for teaching the older boys suitable trades, and an orphan asylum, where the helpless and uncared-for youth of the churches are trained to a life of activity and usefulness.

"From beautiful Florence we speed to Leghorn, where there is a flourishing and crowded Evangelical church, with day, night, and Sabbath-schools, and a mutual-aid society.

"Pistoia has signalled herself by accepting the Gospel with acclamation, despite the most foolish and furious persecution carried on by priests, who, if they would only read history, would find in the history of the famous council held in their own town a clear indication from of old of the necessity of a religious reformation.

"Schools and churches in Pisa; schools and churches in Lucca, the country of the generous but unhappy Burlamacchi; réunions in Sienna, in Carrara, in Grosseto, in Volterra—such is the fruit of the Gospel in Tuscany.

"Leave with us the port of Leghorn, and cross the sea to Elba, and there already you see a church built at Rio Marina, locales in Longone and Porto Ferrain, and schools for the young.

"Still onwards, and we are in the Neapolitan provinces. In the metropolis of this vast region a work has sprung up which is almost entirely educational. The Gospel is proclaimed in three crowded places of meeting, and no pains are spared in cultivating the waste ground. The most notable feature of this southern part of the vineyard is, that men of study and intelligence take part in the religious movement, and aid it with all their might. A promising school has been begun at Caserta; an evangelist has been settled at Palermo, in Sicily, and has already opened several schools; in Barletta and in Messina companies of brethren are found, who ask for spiritual teachers at our hands. The rest of this immense district of Italy has not yet heard the Gospel, not because of aversion, but because the evangelistic work has so rapidly extended, that the limited number of preachers has been exhausted.

"At this hour the best efforts are put forth in the preparation of able and worthy evangelists, so that shortly we hope the Neapolitan as well as the other provinces will see their ardent wishes realised in the extension of Evangelical preaching throughout the entire peninsula.

"But what is being done in Rome, it may be asked? In Rome there is the Pope and his Court—that is, the fiercest enemies of Gospel truth. But if nothing is being done as yet in Rome, much hope is entertained for the future. We trust soon to go there and to see the people assembled in the great Church of St. Peter's, listening to a Gospel teacher expounding the doctrine of the Apostles. God can do it, and may He bring it about in His own time."

To this summary of Evangelical churches presently existing in Italy the reader should add twelve depôts of Bibles and religious books, from which not less than seventy salesmen of the Word go forth to wander over wide Italy, carrying and diffusing the truth not only in the large cities, but in distant localities and small country villages. Among notably Evangelical journals we may mention The Echo of the Truth, a weekly organ of correspondence and controversy, the Sabbath School, a monthly sheet, and the Family Readings, published twice a month. How much yet remains to be done, and yet what a marvellous progress do the above statistics show to have taken place during the last five years!

VISITORS TO ITALY.

The Society of Friends lately sent a deputation to Italy in the persons of the Rev. Mr. Robson, of Huddersfield, and Mr. Fox, of Falmouth, who have been everywhere kindly received, and spoken, through interpreters, the pure word of the Gospel in great sim-plivity to our infant churches. The Rev. Mr. Davis, one of the secretaries of the Evangelical Alliance, has also visited us lately, and warmly encouraged the brethren in the formation of a branch of the Alliance in Italy.

GERMANY.

547

The Italians have also been greatly amused by several large parties of Cook's excursionists wandering over the country this summer. It is a fortunate circumstance that the manager of these monster expeditions is himself a Christian man, and not only arranges for a service on the Lord's-day, but sets the excellent example of attendance upon Christian ordinances, and enlisting the sympathies of his mind in the religious movements of the country through which they pass.

FROM FLORENCE, PALERMO, AND ELBA. The Waldensian College has this month opened for the winter session with thirty students of theology from all parts of Italy. Their names are: Messrs. C. Malan, G. Baret, De Vita, Zocco, Travers, Falletti, Bracchietto, Weitzelker, Jean Pons, Daniel Gay, and Louis Meille.

A new Evangelical journal comes to us from Palermo. It is called The Mirror of the Truth, and is edited by an ex-monk, who has joined the Evangelical congregation, and teaches in the two flourishing schools recently established by Mr. Kay. The first number gives an account of the recent interruption of the evangelist by a young man sent by the priests. He sprang up in the middle of the service, uttered such obscene statements, that the respectable hearers felt obliged to withdraw, and succeeded in producing the confusion and scandal which his employers desired.

From Elba we hear that the new cemetery supplied by the Government to the Evangelicals had just been opened, and that no fewer than forty new members had joined the Church during the first seven months of this year out of the small population of the island.

GERMANY.

Frankfort, October 15, 1864.

THE FRANCO-ITALIAN CONVENTION AND PUBLIC OPINION IN GERMANY.

The great political event of the moment, and which chiefly occupies public opinion and press in Germany, as elsewhere, is the Franco-Italian Convention, which allows us to give in a not distant future the solution of the grave Roman question. Whether Protestants or Catholics, all are equally interested in this country, inasmuch as this matter has a religious bearing, which no one can fail to recognise, and a political side which very truly concerns Austria. After the first moment of astonishment, caused by this news, which has fallen like a bomb-shell among the topics engaging attention, the Ultramontane party affected to be free from fear. Comforted itself with the thousand contingencies which may yet happen in the space of two years, in favour of the Pope's temporal power. We have also in Germany, in this Protestant Church, the offspring of the Reformation, an Ultramontane party, which in all its relations, religious, social, or political, speaks and acts in affecting harmony with Romanism. It strove, at the outset, to call in question the evident and proximate consequences of the Convention. But very soon light broke upon it. The despatch of the French Minister for Foreign Affairs to the representatives of his Government at Rome opened the eyes of all; and then some were seized with dismay, while others were filled with hope and joy. Among the latter are assuredly to be found all those who contemplate the Papacy, and especially its miserable Government, in view of the kingdom of Jesus Christ, and of the interests of His Church upon earth. They cannot suffer any illusion as to the comprehensive bearing of events in course of preparation. The determinate fall of a power which is the enemy of all light, of all liberty, and of all progress, is an occurrence to which they cannot be indifferent. They certainly do not expect from it the immediate fall of the Papacy as such, and far less that of Catholicism; but still they expect the moment when the moral power of truth shall stand alone in the presence of error, which it will be able to combat with weapons wholly spiritual, without the intrigues of politics and the brute force of earthly arms coming to mix themselves up in the struggle, and to put a false face upon every question.

At Vienna, after the first moment of surprise and agitation caused by Austrian interests in Italy, the Government has determined, so we are assured, to maintain an attitude of expectation—a very wise part certainly, but one imposed upon it by necessity and lack of power. If, in fact, Austria has decided on remaining at Venice as long as possible, the time is for ever gone by when it could have hoped to replace by its own bayonets the French battalions at Rome. It is beginning to be understood that the Italian question must be settled by Italians.

ASSEMBLY OF THE KIRCHENTAG AT ALTENBURG.

The thirteenth general meeting of the Kirchentag, of which I gave your readers notice in my last letter, was opened on the 13th of September, and the pleasant days which followed have left upon all who were present a happy and a deep impression. One of my friends, a very competent judge, has furnished an account of the meetings, and one which is well drawn up, in the Neue Evangelische Kirchenzeitung (New Evangelical Church Journal), from which I borrow the following details, confining myself, however, to the principal subject of deliberation, and the one which awakened the most serious and practical interest. That question, we are reminded, was raised by various recent writings of Renan, Strauss, and Schenkel, upon the life of Jesus; it was this: "What advantage has the Church to derive from recent expositions of the life of Jesus?"

Dr. Beyschlag, professor of theology in the University of Halle, was the first to speak upon this important topic, and he did it in such a way as to captivate the attention of his numerous hearers. How, he asked, in the first place, can we talk of the advantage which the Church may derive from the writings in question? Should we not rather speak of the harm that it has suffered from them, inasmuch as they tend to nothing less than to despoil Jesus Christ of His Divinity? If Jesus is no longer the true God, and man without sin, it is in vain for us still to lavish upon Him the fairest praise, for Christianity is wounded to the heart. And yet, if the Church really wishes it, it will have one advantage to derive from this: it may learn something from enemies, admit that there is on their side some right and some truth, and the sacred trust which has been committed to it will emerge from the fire of criticism purified, and more glorious than ever. We have not to take here the same position as Catholicism, which consists in pretending that in the Church all is true and good. Ecclesiastical history teaches us that the most fundamental errors of unbelief are always directed against those feeble points of the Church which have need to be rectified and revised. The appearance of works like those of Renan and Strauss, while they betray the infidelity of their authors, do they not reveal also more than one defect in the Church? The immense success of these false representations of the life of Jesus may come, in part, from this, that the Church has allowed us to have a complete and true representation of the very life. The scientific study of the life of Jesus is the youngest of the branches of theology; it has only been prompted by its adversaries. Instead of going thoroughly into this first object of all Christian theology, the historic fact of the Saviour's life, it has only turned its attention to the doctrine of His person. Instead of starting from the living unity of which the Gospels have sketched the image, it has always set apart from the two elements of His Divine nature and His human nature; it has added together these two units, and hence has resulted a dualism instead of an historical and a living person. How, then, are we able to comprehend and to receive in their fulness the profound teachings of the Gospel as to the gradual and personal developments of Jesus? His real temptations, and His obedience which He learned by suffering until He was made perfect? All this is to many nothing but an appearance and mere Docetism; or, indeed, they only imagine in Jesus a dual personality, with a double consciousness of himself, a double will—an impossible being in whom the Divine nature absorbs the human nature, or vice versa. What is it, then, which in this condition of our theological ideas imparts to writings such as those of Renan and Strauss such a power of attraction? It is that they appear to give a truly human history, such as is impossible on the principles which we have explained. Here is the point where the Church has something to learn. The historical humanity ought to be recognised in the life of Jesus; then alone will the image of Christ appear to the eyes of men, with a truthfulness which it has not obtained since the days of the Apostles. This will be the immense advantage which will have derived from these great discussions.

Such is the fundamental thought which Dr. Beyschlag developed, with a clearness, a depth, and a force, which often rose to the height of eloquence, whether in showing the wrong conclusions of the books which have provoked this controversy, or in rising to lofty theological considerations, in order to obtain respecting the person of Christ—that is to say, respecting the union of the Divine and human in Him—ideas more historical and more true than those which he has criticised in the traditional theology. It is evident that the views uttered by the practical and learned professor could not secure assent of all his hearers. Several freely expressed their doubts in regard to them during the discussion. But all received from his discourse the impression that it was a very lofty attempt to diffuse more of truth and harmony into the great and difficult subject of which he had to treat.

Another divine, Dr. Köslin, professor at the University of Breslau, had been charged by the committee of the Kirchentag to present a paper upon the same subject. The principal thought of this long and thorough investigation seems to have been this: The advantage which the Church is to derive from the false representations of the life of Jesus, is the fact, clearly ascertained, that in the midst of the desperate efforts made to rob the Saviour of His divinity, there remains in His life something which unbelief can neither move nor explain; and this something is sufficient to prove illogical and false the positions given by the enemies, and to restore confidence in that image which they cannot take away from the conscience of humanity.

Dr. Edmond de Pressensé, of Paris, who is still deeply influenced by the impressions produced by the great scenes of the Holy Land, which recall so vividly the life of the Saviour, spoke upon the great subject which occupies us. With the fervid eloquence which distinguishes him, he altogether riveted his audience. He also sees, even in France, unexpected fruit from the book of M. Renan, which has had such an enormous circulation: it is, that the attention of thinking men has been aroused and attracted towards the life of the Saviour, and that multitudes of men, who in the lap of Catholicism had never dreamed of reading the New Testament, procure it and study it. Now who can go through its sacred pages without receiving from them an impression which for ever blots out from the mind the unhealthy imaginings of the French manner?

The subject dealt with in these pleasant writings of the Kirchentag, the complete report of which will soon appear—and we recommend the reading of it to all thoughtful men who desire to understand the theological mind of Germany—this subject could not admit of any voting, nor even of resolutions, properly so called. Nevertheless, the assembly desired that there should emanate from it a declaration of principles, which it published; not as a new confession of faith, but as a testimony of its convictions in serious circumstances in which it finds theology and the Church. This testimony has found its expression in the following theses:—

1. Recent writings upon the life of Jesus have produced mere caricatures of that life, which have only been possible in consequence of a false historical criticism, and of a frivolous treatment of the Holy Scriptures. A critico-historical view, and a complete treatise upon the Biblical documents, can, and should, refute triumphantly these false representations.

2. The work of the Christian Church, in order to a scientific knowledge of the life of Jesus, answering to all the necessities of faith, is not yet accomplished; and it is this incomplete state of the work which has facilitated the assaults of false criticism, which, moreover, arise from false notions of God, of the world, and of the moral nature of man.

3. It is an advantage for the Church to be summoned to the point attacked, in order to the defence and the completion of the structure. This completion cannot be effected save by that true science which is, as well as faith, a gift of the Holy Spirit. It will then be found, as we are convinced, in harmony with the object towards which tend the confessions of the Christian Church, and of the Lutheran Church in particular.

4. It were an advantage for the Church, moreover, that the living portrait of its Lord and Saviour should be entirely retraced for it, in His truly historical and human nature, and in His nature eternally divine; that it should see in Jesus Christ the Divine Being in our humanity, the Son of God living in eternity, and who appeared in His own time in history; and that the knowledge of His person and His work, whereby alone we can be saved, should become the central point of all our knowledge, and the key to resolve all the questions of Christian science.

5. Another advantage to the Christian Church is found in the necessity which rests upon it to consider afresh the New Testament as a whole—the epistolary writings of the apostles, and the Gospel narratives in their inseparable harmony—and also to render more complete and more thorough its acquaintance with Holy Scripture.

6. An advantage of yet more immediate value to the Church, amid its differences of confessions, constitutions, places, and extent, is that it finds itself forcibly reassembled around its imperishable centre, the person of its Saviour, and that hearts and minds thirsting for the truth may be satisfied and fortified by a living exposition of the true image of Jesus Christ.

PROPOSED SYRIAN PROTESTANT COLLEGE AT BEYROUT.

We have already informed our readers of the project referred to in the following communication, which reaches us from an American correspondent. It affords us pleasure to bring it again under their notice, now that it is fully matured and likely soon to become an accomplished fact :—

The conviction is growing stronger in the minds of American Christians that the evangelization of heathen nations is to be accomplished mainly through the instrumentality of natives raised up in their own land to do their own work, and that natives—with adequate training and in sufficient numbers—cannot be brought forward except by means of educational institutions, especially those where the instruction is for the most part in the vernacular. This impression has aided the favourable reception here of the effort to establish "The Syrian Protestant College," an enterprise which is evidently the ripe fruit of the years of united labour in that land of British and American missions. The people of Syria are awaking from their long torpor, and the most striking sign of this new life is seen in the present almost universal desire for instruction. The schools already existing, admirable and prosperous as some of them are, have neither a course of instruction sufficiently comprehensive nor the requisite appliances to furnish such an education as the country demands. To send young men out of the country to finish their studies is too expensive for the majority, and where it can be done—with but rare exceptions—they return so puffed up with foreign ideas and habits, as to prove useless, if not actually injurious, to the community. The design of this college is to give these native youth, who have passed through the primary schools, an opportunity to obtain a thorough literary and scientific education at home, in their own tongue, and at the smallest cost. It is to be located at Beyrout, the

with the medical jugglery of the East, or with the well-nigh unlimited freedom of action and power for good enjoyed there by a skilful people. And although theology will not be taught only be from some such institution as the men to fill the ranks of a well-qualified vigorous native ministry can be largely trained here, also, will be trained the future teachers of the land and the authors of the coming and secular native literature. Its influence eventually, too, be widely felt in developing the natural resources of the country, and encouraging its industrial interests. Nor must its position be overlooked in reference to Biblical research, illustration, the study of antiquities and languages, and its future contributions to the departments of geology, botany, and astronomy.

The doors of the college will be open to the youth of the land, whatever their sect or nationality, if they will conform to its laws. It will be conducted on strictly Protestant and Evangelical principles, but be in no sense sectarian. It will also be unconnected with any of the many existing organizations, but only that it may more and efficiently co-operate with them as a local administration is to be in the hands of a board of managers, consisting of American, British missionaries and residents; the general authority, however, and the general control of the funds remain with the incorporated body of the American Board in America, the relation between the two being similar to that of any foreign missionary society to one of its missions. The president-elect, Rev. Daniel Bliss, for several years past has been missionary of the American Board in Syria. Professors will also be from this country, and their aim will be to use, as far as possible, native teachers that the people may feel the institution roughly their own, in and of the country, and not an exotic. It is not proposed to erect extensive buildings, but to rent such as work; but those who are most interested in undertaking feel that its success is vital to the progress of Protestantism in Syria and among the Arab-speaking population of the East. The enemies of Christianity are fully alive to the question is to be decided now, who are the educators of this people? They in-leave no effort untried to gain possession of the school. If they succeed, the labours of our boards for these forty years will be in vain, and but little hope will remain for the future. If such an institution as this, however, planted and vigorously supported, its influence will be felt not only throughout Syria, but, by the blessing of God, it will ultimately reach the Arabic tongue is spoken; and facts at this language is now used from the interior of Africa, eastward, into India, and China—in all, by more than one hundred millions of people. Barth, Livingston, Speke, and missionaries from Zanzibar, Abyssinia, and Liberia, have demonstrated how paths can be opened to the very heart of Africa. Let the men be raised up, the Arabic Bible printed, and the right literature created, and these channels may be made highways of the truth. And with reference to Syria and the adjacent countries—looking at their future merely from a political and commercial stand-point, and remembering their geographical position, so well understood in England, if not in America, and the results which must follow the opening of the proposed routes to develop internal trade and shorten the transit between India, Australia, China, and Europe—the question becomes one worthy of serious consideration, what type of education is to be given to this vast Arabic race—what character is to be stamped upon it?

TURKEY.

Constantinople, October 5, 1864.

IMPRISONED AND IMPRISONED "PROTESTANT" TURKS.

new steps have been taken by the Turkish Government, during the past month, in the persons of the missionaries, to close their rooms, offices, and chapels, are with spies, so that no Turk can approach them without being reported to the authorities.

The Government seem for the moment contented with the amount of insult and abuse which has been cast upon the missionaries, and believing them powerless, turning its whole attention to its own interests.

It is so difficult to obtain authentic information on any subject in Constantinople, that we do not venture to make any definite statement as to the number of persons who have been arrested here on a charge of Protestantism. It is only certain that many have been summarily arrested and thrown into prison within a few months, against whom no other charge has been made. Of these, some still remain in prison in Constantinople, and we hear of others which would be of the greatest interest if we could be sure of their correctness.

Many others have been sent into exile, some of these have been visited by missionaries residing at or near the places to which they have been sent. It is reported from Syria that some thirty or forty have been sent to Acre, where they have been consigned to the chain gangs with the lowest class of convicts. We know of the arrival of seven at a city in Asia Minor, where they enjoyed considerable liberty.

Some men have been arrested, imprisoned, and exiled as Protestants, but the missionaries have no other evidence of their Protestantism than that the police found copies of the Testament and the "Mezan-ul-Hakk" in the possession of some of them, and that all of them appear to belong to a party, said to be very numerous, which favours a reform of some kind in the Mohammedan religion. It has been surmised, but it is not known, that this party has political objects in view. Whether it has or not, the Turkish Government, as it appears, has acted against them upon religious grounds. Those who have been seen, declare that no other charge was made against them than that of favouring Christianity. There is every reason to credit the truth of this statement, and to believe that the object of the Turkish Government, in its action against these men, as well as against the missionaries and their baptized converts, has been to crush out at once, with a strong hand, all hopes of religious liberty, and all tendencies towards Christianity among the Turks. As representatives of liberal ideas and religious reform, these men are entitled to the interest and sympathy of Europe, although they cannot be classed together with those who have made an open profession of Christian faith.

THE PERSECUTED CHRISTIAN TURKS.

It was briefly stated in my last letter that two baptized Turks had been exiled, and two remained in prison. Of those exiled, one was sent to Aidin, and one to Magnesia, cities in the Pashalic of Smyrna, but noted for the fanaticism of their Turkish population. Her Britannic Majesty's consul at Smyrna immediately interested himself in their behalf, and through his efforts they were very soon brought back to the city of Smyrna, and then set at liberty, on the simple condition of reporting themselves, from time to time, to the authorities. They had received nothing from the Government, and were in the most destitute circumstances, from which they were temporarily relieved by the charity of Christian friends. Their families remain in Constantinople dependent upon charity. One of those who then remained in prison, an old man of ninety years, has since been released, and the last, whose case is more significant than any other, still remains in prison, where he has now been confined nearly three months. His case merits a full statement, as it exhibits one of the most striking instances of religious persecution of the present age.

Ahmed was born in the city of Cæsarea, in the centre of Asia Minor, of a respectable Turkish family, and is now about forty-five years old. When a young man, he was drafted into the Turkish army, and served out his time of five years, rising to the rank of lieutenant. After leaving the army, he settled in his native city, and took up the trade of a blacksmith. He acquired considerable property, owned a house with gardens, and married a wife named Fatima, a woman superior in mind and character to any Turkish woman I have ever known. They have had three children, the oldest being about twelve years of age.

About eight years ago he was led by curiosity to read the New Testament. He had considerable leisure, and he was curious to know what Christians believed. As he read he became deeply interested in the truths of Christianity, and he finally sought out the American missionaries then residing in that city. He at last became fully convinced of the truth of Christianity, and some six years ago made it known to his friends and acquaintances that he was no longer a Mussulman, but a believer in Jesus Christ.

As this fact became generally known, and at last came to the ears of the authorities, he found it impossible to remain in Cæsarea, and nearly four years ago he fled with his family, by night, from the city, to come to Constantinople.

Through the aid of the missionaries and the English consul at Samsoun, he succeeded in reaching his destination in safety, although he was, of course, obliged to abandon a portion of his property in Cæsarea. He took up his quarters in a Christian neighbourhood, and some months after he was baptized, with his wife and children, by the American missionaries.

About two years and a-half ago, his wife was decoyed away, with her children, into the house of some of her relatives. He was then arrested and taken before the court of Sheikh ul-Islam, on the charge of forcing his wife to be a Christian against her will. He then boldly professed his Christian faith before the highest court of the empire, was condemned, and imprisoned. But his wife improved the first opportunity to escape from her relatives, and take refuge in the house of a missionary. It thus became so evident that the charge was unfounded, that Henry Bulwer applied to the Porte in behalf, and he was immediately set at liberty. With this single exception, he has lived these three or four years in undisturbed peace and quiet, in the midst of a Christian quarter, and has been known and recognized as a Christian by all. He has maintained a high and consistent Christian character, which has commended him to all who have known him. During a part of that time he has been employed by the American Mission, on a small partial salary of 3*l.* a-month, as assistant. His work has been to converse with such Turks as came to his house, to receive him into their houses or places of resort or business, to direct their attention to the Bible, and to invite them to come to the house and service of the missionaries. He has never preached or harangued in any public place, or in any place whatever; has never excited any tumult, or brought himself into any personal difficulty with the Turk. He has been a quiet, peaceable, faithful subject of the Government.

On Sunday morning, July 17, he was at the house of the Rev. Mr. Herrick, in Galatia, waiting for the commencement of Divine service. He was called and informed that some one wished to see him at the door. He went down, was arrested, and immediately thrown into prison, where he has remained ever since, no other charge having been made against him than that, having been a Mussulman, he has become a Christian, in obedience to the command of Christ, he invited others to an examination of the grounds of his faith. During these three months he has been denied the use of the Bible, although repeated efforts have been made to furnish him with one. He has been kept in a state of constant suspense—no long imprisonment, or a worse fate have been kept constantly before his eyes, week after week, he has looked in vain for release, through the influence of Christian friends in England, until his heart has grown weary and sick with waiting, having nothing to relieve the tedium of the long prison hours but his own thoughts, an occasional brief visit to ne friend, who could see and speak to him ly in the presence of the officers of the son, and the constant advice of his keepers fellow - prisoners to obtain immediate ase by declaring himself a Mussulman.

On Sunday last he was summoned before Minister of Police, for the first time, and rogated for more than two hours. No t threats were then used, but every effort made to induce him to consent to remove his family from Constantinople to ica. He was offered a good office under Government there, with a handsome y, if he would thus go into voluntary . He thanked the Pasha, but firmly ed. He knows Casarea well enough to r that he could not live there as a Chris- and he is not to be bribed to give up his

. He begged to know what his fate was ; and it was intimated that he held it in own hands. This unexpected attempt of Government to bribe him into voluntary ; where he would be forced to give up faith in Christ, corroborates the view we already expressed, that the object of this ement is to extinguish every spark of stianity among the Turks in Constan- ple, and make it plain to all that con- sions from Islam to Protestantism will not olerated by the Government. This poor has been detained in prison three months, r such circumstances as we have narrated, then, when the Government suppose him e wearied out, they adopt this roundabout od of bringing him back to Islam. In- uite imprisonment, or some other worse , is before him on the one hand ; and e, wealth, honour, on the other.

t is strange, under these trying circum- ces, that his health, which is not strong, not broken down completely ; and it is strange that, when his wife and children ed him last Saturday, he told her, while ggling to keep down his emotion, that this ht be their last interview, that he no r had any hope of release, and that thought it very probable that he might alled to suffer death, in the end, for his i in Christ, in accordance with that kiah law which is still in force. But under these trials and temptations he remains and unshaken in his faith, and this is oubtedly his great crime in the eyes of Government. This is the reason why Aali he says that "he is the worst of all those sted." His wife, too, who suffers, not only him, but from constant fear for her ren and herself, bears her trials in a commendable Christian spirit. She desires the prayers and sympathy of all Chris- tian wives and mothers throughout the world.

Why has not this man been set at liberty?

We have already intimated the reason why the Turkish Government retain this man in prison. They hope to weary him out, and then bribe him to go back to Moham- medanism. But why has not the Govern- ment been forced to act in accordance with the Hatti-houmayoun in this case, as in similar cases in past years? Where is that English influence which, in past time, has saved men from prison and death, even in distant provinces, but which now allows this innocent man to linger all these months in prison, in sight of the British Embassy in Constantinople?

Various answers have been given to these questions here and in England. Sir Henry Bulwer has intimated that if this matter were pushed, it would injure English influence with the Turkish Government, and increase the already excessive and constantly-growing influence of France ; or, in other words, Eng- lish influence is no longer strong enough in Constantinople to compel respect for the Hatti-houmayoun. If this be true, the cause of this state of things should certainly be found out and removed ; but my own impres- sion is, that a decided word from England would have released all these men at any time since their arrest. The Levant Herald suggests that the whole affair is a matter of very little consequence, especially now that only one man remains in prison. Why should Europe trouble itself about the fate of one man? Simply because this one man is just now the embodiment of the great principle of religious liberty. Why was the Christian world so moved by the case of Mortara at Rome, of the Mudiai at Florence, of Matamoros in Spain? Why did Lord Stratford, sustained by the English Government and the Chris- tian world, compel the Sultan to declare that he would never again enforce the Mo- hammedan law upon renegades. It was not because ten thousand Christian Turks had been slaughtered ; only one man, and he a poor Greek, who had changed his religion twice, had been secretly beheaded in a pro- vincial town.

In all these cases it was not the individual, but the great principle which he happened to represent, which excited the attention of the world. And in this present case, we do not appeal to the Christian world simply because Ahmed of Casarea deserves its respect and sympathy as an individual suffering for Christ's sake, but because he is now the re-representative of religious liberty in Turkey. The other Protestant powers have realised this fact, and the Prussian, Dutch, and American Embassies have earnestly remonstrated with the Porte; but they can accomplish little when England, the great representative of Protestantism, is either silent or against them. The real reason why Ahmed remains in prison seems to be that the English Government has so far changed its policy in reference to Turkey, that it no longer desires to be recognised as the protector of Protestantism or of the principle of religious liberty in this empire. It is capable of demonstration that such is the policy of the present Ambassador, and the Levant Herald states that he has received a complimentary despatch from the Foreign-office, fully endorsing all his action.

We have already discussed at length, in a previous letter, his action in respect to the missionaries, and the correspondence between him and them has been published in full by the Evangelical Alliance. It seems desirable that I should add here a very brief statement of his relations to the imprisoned Turks, so far as these are publicly and positively known. When first applied to in their behalf, he replied that he would interest himself for them with the Government. A week later he informed the public, through the Levant Herald, that they would be "exiled for their own safety" to some English consular station. After several other appeals, he informed the missionaries (August 28th) that two, who could not safely remain here, would be exiled to the Pashalic of Smyrna, under the eye of Cabouli Pasha; and the others would be speedily released. He also requested that they be left entirely in his hands, and that the missionaries make no further stir about these matters; a request which he subsequently repeated. He was then requested to inform the prisoners what their fate would be, that their minds might be put at rest. He promised to do so, but no such message from him ever reached them. Soon after, two were exiled to Aidin and Magnesia, and several were released on their own declaration that they were faithful Mussulmans. Only two remained in prison; and of these we have given a full account. At the request of Sir Henry, the chaplain of the Embassy, the Rev. Mr. Gribble, once visited the prison; and other officers have visited them once or twice to inquire into their treatment, which, so far as room and food is concerned, has been satisfactory since the first week or ten days of their confinement. The most striking feature of the case will occur at once to all. Sir Henry desired and claimed that the fate of the prisoners should be left in his hands; and except those who have recanted, all are in prison or exile still, except the simple-minded old man mentioned above.

THE QUESTION AT ISSUE BETWEEN SIR HENRY BULWER AND THE MISSIONARIES.

I understand that Sir Henry denies some of the facts stated by the missionaries in their published letters. So far as I have read these letters, the facts stated are capable of proof. As to what has been stated in my letters to Evangelical Christendom, I am prepared to prove, either publicly or privately, every fact stated, to the satisfaction of any unprejudiced man; or, anything can be disproved, which I do not believe, to make a public acknowledgment of my error. But the real and fundamental question at issue is a very simple one: Did Sir Henry Bulwer sustain and defend the principle of religious liberty in Turkey, or did he not? Is he prepared to assert that he has? The missionaries can demonstrate that he has utterly failed to do so, not only in this case, but in nearly every other case where his aid has been requested, during the past two years. They can show that he has been less and less inclined to listen to the representations ever since he came to Turkey until his policy has culminated in the present state of things. This fact is as well known among Turks, Greeks, Catholics, Armenians and native Protestants, in Constantinople, as it is to the missionaries. It is notorious.

The missionaries ask nothing more from the Embassy than the honest defence of the principle of religious liberty. They have appealed to the English public simply because this principle has been cast aside. If Sir Henry is ready to sustain it as Lord Stratford did, they will ask nothing more of him. Is it possible for them to content themselves with anything less?

POSTSCRIPT.

Constantinople, October 10, 1864.

Some weeks ago representations were made to Hon. M. Stuart, Her Britannic Majesty's chargé d'affaires, through the kindness of Dr. M. Gribble, Chaplain of the Embassy, to the effect that the officers of the prison had refused to permit Ahmed, the Protestant Turk, to have a copy of the Bible. No reply had been received to this communication, it having been informal and unofficial, but on Friday last it became known accidentally to ies that an officer had been sent before to the Minister of Police, British Embassy, to inquire into the this statement. The Pasha replied statement was untrue, that Ahmed we any books which he desired. advantage of this reply, Rev. Mr. on Saturday, carried to him his own t, and the same officer, the superin- of the prison, who had before refused Mr. Herrick to give Ahmed a Testa- 7 gave his permission without any . After three months of imprison- h no work, with no books, with to occupy his time, without any ty to refresh his spirit with the and the consolations of the Gospel be imagined what a blessed Sabbath 1 yesterday, even within the walls rison, in communion with Christ his own New Testament.

an example of a class of cases serve especial notice, and which, erstood, explain some of the contra- between the statements of Sir Henry d those of the missionaries. They he Embassy, and to the world, that denied the Bible. They do so ng tried in various ways to place hands, after the refusal of a formal y, made in person by Rev. M. o the superintendent of the prison. bassy sends a dragoman to the of Police, to inquire if this statement is true, and he replies that it is not. Immediate advantage is taken of this denial, and that is accomplished without opposition which was before impossible.

In the same way the missionaries reported to the Embassy at the first, that access to the prisoners was refused them. Also that when the prisoners were suffering from want of warmer clothing, they were not allowed to receive anything from their homes. These statements were true, and could be proved any day, but Sir Henry sent to the Minister of Police, and was informed that they were false. From that moment free access was granted, and the condition of the prisoners made satisfactory. Sir Henry concludes that the missionaries have deceived him, and reproves them in the sharpest language. He also reports the same to the Foreign-office, and it appears to the public that the two statements are irreconcilable.

All of these statements made by the missionaries were literally true, when they were made, and would probably have been true to this day, had they not been reported to the Embassy, and had not these reports prompted official inquiries, which led the Turkish officials not only to abandon their former positions, but to deny that they had ever held them.

I think this explanation is due both to Sir Henry Bulwer and to the missionaries, as it is most desirable that there should be no appearance on either side of unfounded accusation.

INDIA.

A NEW MISSION IN THE HIMALAYAS.

tory of the introduction of Chris- o any country is an event of suferest and importance to deserve a itself, but its introduction into the t province of Chumba has been y features so remarkable as to rticular notice.

itory of Chumba lies in the depths alayah, with Cashmere on one side t on the other. Every variety of ad every kind of climate, as also sity of fruit and flower, are to be n this mountain district. Here are mountains covered with perpetual there lofty grassy slopes, like the England, clad with everlasting ver- the valleys and gorges, or among f these hills, scenery quite Alpine r is to be met with, while abun- mountain torrents, forming cascades hills as they run their race, and wayside temples picturesquely situated in the midst of the sacred cedars, or forts and castles perched on lofty crags, the retreat of many a robber chief, add beauty and interest to the scenery. The people who inhabit this hilly region are frank and independent in their character, but very poor, and till lately much oppressed by the priestly Brahmins, or ministers of the court. It is only now while we write that the present civil officer, Donald M'Nabb, Esq., the superintendent of Chumba, following out the reforms introduced by the first superintendent, Major Reid, has brought in a law for the emancipation, gradually and by steps easy to the proprietors, of the slaves of Chumba. During the minority of the present Rajah, and the rapacity and oppression of the hangers-on of the court, the kingdom was almost reduced to bankruptcy, and as neither life, property, nor female virtue was safe, not a few emigrated to other places. It was at this crisis that the present Rajah, an amiable young man, partial to Europeans, and really anxious for the improvement of his country, applied for, and obtained the services of, a British officer as superintendent, and under his management, prosperity and law have been restored in a great degree to this smiling land.

Chumba itself is an ancient city pleasantly situated on the sloping side of one hill, and surrounded on all sides by others, on the banks of the noisy Ravee, which rolls its turbid and rapid waters some 300 feet below. The city is the residence of the Rajah and a corrupt court, and as luxury and vice, with superstition, too often go together, it is the seat of numerous temples dedicated to the goddess Devi or Kalee, richly endowed out of the lands of the Rajah, and swarming with a lazy, ignorant, and profligate priesthood. The inhabitants of the city, the hill and valley, are in caste and character much like those who are to be met with in the plains. Having come less into contact with European civilization, they are more natural and less spoilt than our own subjects.

One tribe peculiar to these hills deserves a more particular notice. The Guddees, a nomadic shepherd race, driven by the Mohammedan invasion, according to their accounts, into the hills, have here settled, but both in address, appearance, and manner, are very much altered from their brethren of the plains. They belong to no particular caste, having amongst them representatives of every class. With a nice discrimination they wander from place to place for pasture according to the seasons, in the cold weather residing with their flocks and herds and households, in real patriarchal state, in the low lands which lie at the foot of the higher hills, and seeking cooler and less rainy districts as the hot weather approaches. We have never met with any natives so pleasant to deal with as these Guddees, nor any so much like the inhabitants of European countries. Such is a brief sketch of the province of Chumba in its physical and moral aspects.

When the Rev. Mr. Ferguson first thought of commencing a mission there, the superintendent, Major Reid, rather discouraged the project, wishing at least that the introduction might be deferred. Major Reid had found it necessary on his first appointment to use measures for the restoration of justice and order, which could not but be distasteful to a corrupt court and its hangers-on. A Rance dissolute beyond even the custom of Eastern princes, whose lands had been forfeited for gross misconduct, and Brahmins mulcted of more than half their usual gains, were not people the most likely to welcome the missionary, and the superintendent not unnaturally thought that the advent of the missionary at such a time, taken in connexion with his own reforms, would seem to the people, ever ready to misconstrue our policy and take alarm, as part of a set plan for the annexation or conversion of the country. Notwithstanding this discouragement on the part of the civil officer which the missionary met with, and which was a clear gain to the cause, disconnecting it from the Government, the missionary went over to see the Rajah in October last, and met with a very kind reception. Quarters were temporarily allotted to him in the old palace, ground and materials promised for building a house, church, and school, and in a word every facility offered for the promotion of the cause. To say that the whole city lay in idolatry, while a corrupt court and profligate priesthood fattened on the labours of the people, would only be to tell half the truth. The people themselves were wholly dissolute, chastity and virtue being qualities almost unknown in Chumba. Such briefly was the state of affairs when the Rev. Mr. Ferguson, Presbyterian chaplain of Her Majesty's 71st Regiment, set his foot on the soil of that lovely country, and determined to plant the cross of Christ in its midst. As might have been expected of a chaplain, the reverend gentleman was little acquainted with the language of Hindostan, and was altogether ignorant of the patois of Chumba, and to some it seemed as if he was unsuited to missionary work, both from this cause and the difficulty which he found in acquiring the language. But if he was feeble in speech, his earnestness and his love were great. It seems as if his whole being was consumed by a great desire to make Christ known. His eye kindled with light and intelligence, and his whole frame was moved within him, as he spake of the darkness of superstition, and his intense desire to set forth Christ crucified. No doubt some of his notions were crude, no doubt his method of evangelization seemed peculiar, but men of his stamp are not to be measured by the ordinary rules of human life. He felt himself to be an apostle. To his mind it was clear, by repeated self-searchings, that he was called to devote himself to missionary work, and difficulties and obstacles were cleared away before him. To this fervour and apostolic earnestness must be added another recommendation, which to our minds he possesses as a missionary to the heathens of India.

etarian and teetotaler, living a herbs and water, and realising the idea of a Christian faqueer. With some knowledge of the properties and herbs as medicine, he is a in homœopathy, and goes forth the bedside of the lowest, to ad-e healing draught. His fame as a n has no doubt added not a little as a missionary. In appearance gentleman is not less remarkable views he holds. Tall and well maintenance bespeaks the attention the beholder by its singularly benevolent expression, while his l gives dignity to his appearance. ot a footing in the province, and of the Rajah secured, the reve-an dressed himself in his gown, by two catechists, one speaking the other Oordoo, sallied forth to mation through the streets and umba. Advanced into the middle r before some native house, the e halted, when the missionary in repeated a well-known text of which in its turn was uttered by hists successively. The text the, "Glory to God in the highest, peace, goodwill towards men;" 7, "God so loved the world that only begotten son, that whosoever him should not perish, but have life." Having made the procla-out any exposition or commentary, n moved on, and thus for four-arched through the city, till the matter of the preacher were well gh and low, rich and poor. One he history of this strange proces-e mentioned. Arrived at the the Rajah's palace, the procession again made proclamation, when rrounded by his ministers, came profound salaam, and offered in the God of Chumba a year's pro- missionary.

From that day the mission may be said to have been established, and success speedily followed. Members regularly attended the services of the Church or the Bible readings of the catechist, and three whole families were soon baptized. Up to this date the thirteen persons who have been baptized have remained firm not only to their profession, but to their trade, and do not desire to leave Chumba or to alter their mode of life. By the last accounts the work was going on well, and some fifty families had signified their intention to seek baptism.

Nearly all the converts have been among the lowest castes, Chumars. This was the case also in Tinnivelly, and more lately still among the conversions of Agra. But what of this? "To the poor," said the great preacher, "the Gospel is preached." It is one of the peculiarities of the Rev. Mr. Ferguson's mission, that as soon as any man asks for baptism, and understands what he asks for, few inquiries are made into his motives, and he is immediately baptized and received into the Church, while the work is carried on not by controversial preaching in the bazaars, but by house to house visitation, and daily Bible readings, first in one place and then in another. Such briefly is an account of the introduction of Christ into Chumba; clearly an attentive hearing has been gained, and a footing made. Clearly, the deep earnestness and conviction of the man, and his skill as medicine man, have won him respect.

[A correspondent in the Punjab, to whom we are indebted for this interesting narrative, which originally appeared in the Allahabad Observer, adds: "Since the article was written, the whole body of Chumars, with one solitary exception, have resolved to pull down their Gooroo's building, and to have a Christian place of worship erected instead. They have received the Rajah's permission, in writing, to do this, and to become Christians, all of them, if they like, without the fear of his displeasure."]

AMERICA.

"CHRISTIAN PATRIOTISM" FROM AN AMERICAN POINT OF VIEW.

Following article is directly addressed to British Christians, especially the the Evangelical Alliance, and suggested by certain remarks of it seems but courteous to our the United States to give it such may be obtained by its trans-ference to these pages. We quote from the New York Independent:—

The June number of the Evangelical Christendom, of London, contains, among its leading articles, an essay on "Christian Patriotism," written from the English standpoint, and adapted to English readers. The Christian World, of New York, is so well pleased with the article, that it copies almost the whole, only making "some alterations, adapting it to our own land." We have not taken the trouble to make a comparison of the two, for the purpose of ascertaining the extent of the amendments deemed necessary in order to fit the language of British patriotism to the use of American Christians; but we observe that the hymn beginning—

Shine, mighty God, on Britain shine,
is made in the American copy to read

Shine, mighty God, on Zion shine.

The alteration is decidedly for the worse, both as to poetry and sentiment, and is a plain departure from the drift of the piece, as well as from the original conception of the hymn, which was a pure emanation of Christian patriotism as it burned in the soul of the sainted Watts, as is shown by the second stanza, which our American copyist was obliged to omit entirely:—

Amidst our isle, exalted high,
Do thou the glory stand;
And, like a wall of guardian fire,
Surround the favoured land.

All which may well be taken to show that it would be more appropriate to have an American expression of the spirit of American patriotism, whether in verse or prose. Such an utterance we do not propose now to attempt, but suggest it to those loyal Americans whom God has endowed with the prophetic fire, as a theme worthy of their highest eloquence. The Book of Psalms, if read and comprehended as among the scenes for which it was written, appears to be throughout but little else than a pouring forth of the thoughts and aspirations of religious patriotism. Those magic words which set the Psalmist aglow with heavenly fervour—Jacob, Israel, Jerusalem, Zion, and the rest—are but poetic synonyms for the civil state of the Jewish people. It is by a sort of perversion that we, in modern times, have applied those psalms to the general religious interests of the whole world. Any person comparing the Psalms, one by one, as they stand in the Bible, with Watts' or any other modern evangelised version, will be struck with the continually-recurring awkwardnesses which the adaptation renders necessary.

We refer to the article now mainly for the purpose of asking our British brethren of the Evangelical Alliance to admit for a moment that the obligations and motives of Christian patriotism may be rightfully received by their American brethren with the same pertinency and with equal force as by the favoured inhabitants of the British Islands. Will they not, for once, admit that we, too, have a country, which God himself has given to us, and which He thus has made it our duty to love and cherish? Is it not a good land, and may it not be made "a contribution to the world's welfare," as well as yours? Would it not hold true with our country, as with yours, that "All the world is the better for it when a nation earns a great name and a good one?" We think that it is as right for us as for you to say, not in pride, but with conscientious truth and soberness, that "God is now inviting our country to do in all meekness what the builders of Babel attempted in their arrogance;" that He is giving to America also, as well as to "Britain, opportunity to make itself a name in the earth—a name for which the world will be the better till the race has run its career and earthly existence has ended." Perhaps, if the following sentences of the English article had been first put forth by an American journal, some of our brethren would have started a query whether this was exactly an exhibition of the "all meekness" spoken of above; and possibly some British eyes might have discerned at least a shadow of exclusiveness, if not arrogance, in the language used. But, leaving out all that is below the highest level of Christian thought, if there is any, we wish every Christian in the United States of America to read and ponder the quotation just as if it had been written in New York, for the purpose of giving at once a religious sanction to the aspirations of patriotism, and an earnest impression of the religious responsibilities which Christian patriotism implies and imposes:—

"Even better than a great name is a great presence; and well it is for the world if at any time there is present amidst its peoples a nation strong and free, calm, wise, unselfish. Well was it for Europe when the United Provinces, fresh from their successful struggle, threw their weight into the scale of national independence and religious liberty, and offered an impregnable asylum to the exiles of England, France, and Spain. And well for mankind will it be if, in the forthcoming conflicts within the Old World and the New, there should be at least one nation fair and firm, temperate, self-possessed, magnanimous, looking not only on its own things, but on the things of others—magnanimous enough to wish the general welfare, and itself so pure and happy as to begot in each beholder the desire, 'Oh that we were only such another!' A result so glorious can only be attained by a very general diffusion of Christianity throughout the masses of our people. Under our representative constitution we can hope for any continuance of a generous, high-toned public policy on the one condition only that we be a virtuous, self-denying, God-fearing community. Let the [THIRTY-ONE MILLIONS OF THE UNITED STATES] twenty millions of England and the three millions of Scotland sink into irreligion and selfishness, with all the consequent rapacity and recklessness—with all the consequent cowardice and slavishness—and no statesmanship will make our national position noble; but let the Christian Church, with God's blessing on well-directed effort raise the community in moral worth and religious principle—let the Gospel make us a people sober, truthful, self-mastering—a people who take as their rule of conduct the will of God, and who, in their calculations, include the great hereafter—people truly Christian, and amidst their distresses and perplexities—it would comfort other countries to know that there is such a nation. The city as on a hill could not be hid, and, like the star from the Pharos, shooting far forth through the storm 'Ye are the light of the world,' there would be news in its shining—news of a haven for people as well as persons in that kingdom which cannot be moved."

After further lengthened quotations, the New York Independent proceeds:—

To argue from all this the pressing need of "a religious revival at home," so that "our attitude and action as a nation may be a commendation to our Christianity," is as obvious as it is pertinent and is not only as appropriate here as there, but we submit, is as likely to be appreciated in its proper force in this land, where for more than a century "religious revivals" have been reckoned dition of the churches. And if our bear with us, we will remind them, nce, nor yet in shamefacedness, of the at are suggested by a cursory review of e years that have passed since the civil power of England "evacuated" of what God has done for us, and what e for Him and for ourselves, in the ligious advancement of those trampled ard making of them a nation equal to its capabilities for good to mankind.

y, will not our British brethren allow, mand, that Christian citizens of these e should cherish a Christian patriot-h-toned and as pious as their own?
ould they not encourage and exhort ristians to do as much for our counhemselves would feel might be wor-r theirs? If the "name" of a worthy so great value to the world, why may icans be jealous for the honour of our l quick to repel unjust censure, with-proached by our brethren for being so ? Could we have acquiesced in the f American slaveholders and European o "take away our name and nation," this glorious Union into its elements, ted States of America should be no uld not a tame submission to the ion have been an act of treason against a of Christ, that would have made us ad a hissing to all the world? Would it have been gratifying to the sober, honest heart of British Christians, say of the Evangelical Alliance, had their kindred and posterity on this continent thus written their name on the historic page, along with Egypt, as "the basest of king-doms?"

We appeal to the unbiased opinion of mankind —nay, rather, let God be our judge—that when we saw this civil war coming upon us, for the extinction of our nationality, in order to perpetuate the institution of slavery, we truly and conscientiously decided that the preservation of such a country, with such institutions and such capabilities for serving God and humanity, was our most imperative duty, to be performed by any and every means and at any and every sacrifice possible to man.
And we have acted upon that persuasion—how imperfectly, none are more sensible than we are, but yet—honestly and earnestly, as our conduct and present condition prove. What is hoarded wealth?—what are a hundred thousand lives?—
what are millions of lives—of men that must die in a few years in their beds, if they do not die now on the battle-field—in competition with the loss it would have been to the world had this republic been blotted out, as it was threatened? So we reasoned, and so we have acted, and so we hope to continue, at a cost, if required, immeasurably greater than all that has yet occurred. Why should any British or any European Christian withhold from us the meed of their cordial approval—the cheer of their earnest "God bless you and give you success!"

Home Intelligence.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER, 1865.

retaries of the Evangelical Alliance us their circular invitation for the rayer in January next, with a re-those who propose unity in this concert of prayer will make aras early as possible for holding their respective neighbourhoods.

WEEK OF SPECIAL PRAYER THROUGH-
THE WORLD.—JANUARY 1—8, 1865.

has again arrived to invite Christians ies to make arrangements for observing ecial and united prayer at the beginning g year.

ements of the Church of Christ have wned and honoured of the Lord than al seasons of united supplication.
dical Alliance, therefore, feel impera-to renew their invitation, in the hope a yet larger response than in former of obtaining still more abundant spiri-poral blessings.

for prayer are loud and urgent; the a perishing world increasing as they the readiness everywhere apparent to truth; the assaults made against the th by a revived Romanism, and by ms of infidelity; the war spirit ex-g nations professedly Christian; these considerations urge upon true believers, vering in zealous, active effort, to draw Throne of Grace, and, by united, cond faithful prayer, to "prove God" according to His own Word—"If I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it."—Malachi iii. 10.

"I WILL THAT MEN PRAY EVERYWHERE, LIFTING UP HOLY HANDS, WITHOUT WRATH AND DOUBTING."—1 Tim. ii. 8.

The following topics, amongst others, are suggested as suitable for exhortation and intercession on the successive days of meeting:—

Sunday, Jan. 1.—SERMONS on the Agency of the Holy Spirit in the Present Dispensation.

Monday, Jan. 2.—THANKSGIVING for Blessings upon Individuals, Nations, and Churches; together with Confession of Sins.

Tuesday, Jan. 3.—PASTORS, TEACHERS, EVAN-GELISTS, and MISSIONARIES.

Wednesday, Jan. 4.—THE CHILDREN of Christian Parents, Congregations, and Schools.

Thursday, Jan. 5.—SUNDAY-SCHOOLS, and all actively engaged in Christian Work.

Friday, Jan. 6.—THE ABOLITION OF SLAVERY AND CESSATION OF WAR.

Saturday, Jan. 7.—THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH:
For increased Holiness, Activity, and Harmony among its several sections.

Sunday, Jan. 8.—SERMONS: The Visible Unity of the Church—"That they all may be one, as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us, that the world may believe that thou hast sent me."—John xvii. 21.

JAMES DAVIS,
HERMANN SCHMETTAU, Secretaries of the British Branch of the Evangelical Alliance.

The last month was one of unusual activity among our ecclesiastical bodies. In the course of it several bishops held their visitations and delivered their charges; the Church Congress met in Bristol, the Congregational Union in Hull, the Baptist Union in Birmingham, and the United Presbyterian Synod in London. With so much variety and activity of movement, we can only spare room for a few slight notices of the more salient points in each; and we give priority, as right is, to

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY'S PRIMARY VISITATION CHARGE.

Among the topics to which his Grace referred, was a question that has excited some discussion of late—an alleged decrease in the number of candidates for holy orders in the present, as compared with former times. The Archbishop did not think the falling off had been shown in any appreciable degree. There had been an increase, he said, in the actual number of clergymen within the ten years from 1850 to 1860 of more than 1,800. This showed no symptom of a growing indisposition to embrace the clerical life as a profession. He did not mean to deny but that the additional number of poor and scantily-endowed livings in the Church, contrasted with the new and brilliant openings in secular life which now offered themselves to young men, might operate, to some extent, in reducing the number of candidates, but he believed the difficulty felt in obtaining them was rather owing to the increased demand caused by the new churches, than to any deficiency in the supply. He expressed himself unfavourably towards any alteration in the Burial Service, believing that alteration on one point would lead to great dissatisfaction, and would provoke a demand for changes in other parts of the Liturgy. But he had already expressed his willingness to consent to the issuing of a Royal Commission to revise the Table of Lessons, and he thought it probable that such a Commission would be issued on the meeting of Parliament. His Grace then turned to the great questions of the day; and while he thought too much alarm had been felt at the recent discussion of the Privy Council, he had no hesitation in stating that the new school of negative theology struck at the root of all fixed doctrine as deducible from Scripture, and left each man at liberty to obliterate from the Bible every passage that might be repugnant to his own feelings. His views on inspiration his Grace thus defined:—

It seemed good to Almighty God that men should be the instrument and channel by which the revelation of himself and His counsels towards men should be imparted, and in entrusting the prophets and apostles with that commission. He did not divest each individual of his peculiarities of temperament and talent. Thus far we must be prepared to allow the human element, and to acknowledge that those who were appointed channels of communication were not mere machines. There was a wide difference between the authority which teaches the very heart of an inspired writer and the absolute dictation of every word by the Holy Spirit. All we ought to maintain was the absolute and universal authority of every portion of Scripture as written under the Divine superintendence, which guarded the writer from error—the exact words in some cases being dictated, as in the case of the Decalogue. The theory of complete verbal inspiration was not necessary to the maintenance of the position held by the Church, that the canon of Scripture not only contains God's Word, but God's Word written; nor were the teachers of the Church called upon to lay down any new theory of inspiration, but rather to invite her sons to adopt the declaration of unfeigned belief in all the canonical Scriptures of the Old and New Testament as the written Word of God, and to teach the people from it as having that Divine authority. It was satisfactory to him to find that this view of inspiration was in accordance with the opinion expressed by his predecessor seven years ago.

THE BISHOP OF LINCOLN'S CHARGE.

It may be remembered that the Bishop of Lincoln voted in the minority when the Upper House of Convocation resolved to pass a vote of condemnation on "Essays and Reviews." He explained his reason for this course when giving his vote, arguing that the time for action had passed, that the book had gone into oblivion, which Synodical condemnation would only now tend to revive, and that the principles contained in that book required to be refuted rather than condemned. He restated these governing principles of his conduct in the charge he recently delivered to the clergy of his diocese, at the same time making it abundantly clear—if, indeed, that were at all necessary—that he in no degree sympathised in the scepticism which appeared in the pages of that volume. He also referred to the more daring attack made on the foundations of the faith by Bishop Colenso, pointing out that where the Essayists had wrapped up their meaning in vague generalities, the bishop had stated his opinions, and the grounds for them, with startling clearness. At the same time, he did not anticipate that either the one attack or the other would have much lasting influence. In a short time they would be consigned to the shelves where the volumes of Chubb and Tindal—from whom the objections had been shown to have been derived—reposed undisturbed.

He also referred to the judgment of the Privy Council, and showed how much importance of that sentence had been. The Court did not profess to denigrate, or at all, in matters of its sole province was limited to this, certain extracts, isolated from their lid or did not expressly contradict of the articles. The unsatisfactory judgment resulted almost as a necessity from this limited view of it, and from the composition of the high regarded the offices and end of the clergy more in the light of than of trusts, and jealously pre-empt in their enjoyment unless some as brought against them, which could with all the clearness that would be in trying a penal question. But led his clergy that there was an in- which God had put into their hands red them to use—greater diligence, in the reading of the Holy Scrip- ture patient and assiduous inculcation of gospel on their people, and in the y of their inner and outer lives to standard.

CHARGE OF GLOUCESTER AND BRISTOL'S CHARGE.

as the first visitation of his united by Dr. Ellicott. His charge was, as might be expected, an elaborate rustic one. Its main feature, as charges of his brethren, was the e of scepticism, as manifested in the of the present day, but he prefaced ks on this subject by calling atten- he many tokens for good in the life of the Church that meet the ery side. With regard to the doubt ristian verities that was now so rife orld, the bishop divided it into four onest doubt, immoral doubt, worldly d corrupt doubt. The first of these expected, but the bishop has no pity hers. He differs from the Bishop of in anticipating much good from al condemnation of "Essays and" by the Convocation, and with the constitution of the Court of uncil, he takes a different view as of those that have been put y Churchmen. He acquiesces in the of lawyers deciding all the points re brought before the Committee il to determine. And he would om the Court the bare supposition s intended to settle points of faith, by prohibiting any ecclesiastic from sitting on its tribunal, but confining the members entirely to lawyers, whose province would then be clearly seen to be what it really is—the grammatical construction of the extracts from suspected books brought before them, and the determining whether or not those extracts, so construed, were a departure from the formularies of the Church. From certain passages in his charge, it would appear that the bishop holds pre-millennial views, and anticipates the speedy personal coming of our Lord.

The Bishop of Rochester also delivered a charge to his clergy in the course of the month; but as the greater part of it was occupied with the growing scepticism of the day, which he regarded from much the same point of view as the other bishops, it is unnecessary to refer to it at length.

THE CHURCH CONGRESS.

Convocation having been found too narrow and rigid to give free action to the new activities with which the Church is stirred, a new assembly has been devised called the Church Congress, where laymen have an equal right to be heard with clergymen. The second meeting of this body, which comprises all shades of opinion in the Establishment, was held about the middle of last month, in the city of Bristol, and under the presidency of the bishop. It would be difficult to give an outline of the proceedings, for they were of the most varied description. There were members there who came to vent some pet ecclesiastical scheme; there were others who made, and were felt to have made, the most valuable suggestions. Among this latter we cannot forbear noticing some admirable papers relating to the training of clergymen in composition and in elocution read by Dean Alford, Dr. Goulburn, and others of equal eminence. Mr. Beresford Hope put forth a scheme antagonistic to the modern practice of cutting up overgrown parishes into more manageable but miserably poor districts. He proposed, in preference, that each parish should have its rector and its mother church; that the rector should have a collegiate staff of curates under him, and the church should have attached to it chapels of ease, oratories, schools, &c. The curates to be under the rector's directions, but practically to be as irremovable by him as if they shared his right to the parochial freehold. This paper was under discussion when the Congress was startled by the appearance on the platform of the Rev. Mr. Lyne, better known as Brother Ignatius. He was habited in the full costume of a Benedictine monk, with his tonsured head, his ample flowing cloak, and his bare sandalled feet. His entrance, and still more his attempt to address the meeting, was the signal for great commotion. Most of the audience rose to their feet, and there were general cries of "Off, off!" mingled with others demanding for him a hearing. At the suggestion of the bishop of the diocese, who presided, Mr. Lyne sat down for a moment, and then his lordship appealed to the meeting, as large-hearted Christian men, to give Mr. Lyne a hearing, to which he was fully entitled, as he was a member of the Church of England, and had complied with all the conditions implying membership in the Congress. The appeal had the desired effect; and Mr. Lyne was heard in comparative quiet for the full term allowed to members, immediately after which he left the hall. The Earl of Harrowby then rose, and happily catching up the prevalent tone of feeling, soothed and quieted it by his judicious counsels, at the same time ridiculing the notion that the spirit or principles of the most beneficent and pious men could not be followed, unless we wore the fac-simile of their outer garb. It need not be added this opposition put a damper on the project developed in Mr. Hope's paper.

Another sensation was produced by Mr. Hoare, one of the members of the banking firm in Lombard-street, and owning some property in Kent. Mr. Hoare represented himself to be chairman of the Churchwardens' Association, and developed a scheme to render the House of Commons an assembly of Churchmen, by bringing the influence of all the churchwardens in the kingdom to bear upon the elections. At the same time, he strongly urged that no tenderness should be shown to Dissenters who refused to pay their Church-rates, and related, with evident relish, that he had ten men "in limbo" in the parish of which he is churchwarden for refusal to pay their Church-rates, and that he expected he would have to enter their houses and seize their furniture. The Congress showed, however, that it had no sympathy with this mode of upholding the Church, and Canon Girdlestone, amidst loud cheers, denounced the tyrannical folly of the plan which Mr. Hoare evidently expected to win the gratitude of the Congress by adopting.

The only other topic that excited a display of feeling was a coarse speech of Archdeacon Denison against the Council of Education and their minutes, especially those which related to the "conscience clause" in trust deeds. He had no hesitation in avowing his opinion that the benefits of education as imparted in the Church schools should be conferred on those only who were members of the Church of England—an opinion in which he was at least more consistent than those who maintained that the children of Dissenters might be admitted, but that they must all learn the Church Catechism.

It must not be supposed, however, that the proceedings of Congress were wholly taken up with questions in which the members of the Congress were at issue with each other or the whole body at issue with those beyond its pale. The increase in the Episcopal Synodical action—the relations between the Churches of England and Ireland—foreign missions—the peculiar difficulties of great towns—were all treated, in turn, with more or less of fulness. The attendance of bishops was scanty; only the Bishops of Chichester and of Bath and Wells attended to support the president, and they took no part in the discussions. We have already referred to the address of the Dean of Canterbury; we may also notice that Dr. Goulburn, Dean of Cork, the Dean of Ely, and others took a prominent part in the proceedings; we may add that though all parties in the Church had their representative men present there could be no mistake that the High Church element predominated.

THE UNITED PRESBYTERIAN SYNOD.

The second annual Synod of the United Presbyterian Church in England was held in Albion Chapel, London, from the 10th to the 13th ult. The opening sermon was preached by Dr. Crighton, the retiring Moderator, and the Rev. Robert Redpath, A.M., was the appointed Moderator for the ensuing year.

Church extension was one of the first subjects that engaged the attention of the Synod. Mr. Stitt, of Cloughton, who first addressed the meeting upon the subject, remarked that they had been favoured by God, during the last few years, with a very large measure of success in their efforts in that direction, especially in London and Lancashire. What had been thus done in particular districts might be accomplished in England generally, and upon a larger scale. The question was as to the mode in which it should be effected. He then submitted a proposal for modifying the Home Mission Board of the Church—which at present must be chosen from among those who reside within fifty miles of Edinburgh or Glasgow—so as to include in it sixteen men bers from the southern part of the kingdom. A long discussion followed the motion submitted by Mr. Stitt, in the course of which the Rev. H. Macgill (secretary of the Home Mission Board) expressed his personal opinion that England must be represented in any work to be done in England, and that there must be one board, and not two boards. He added that every day was showing more and more clearly that if they did not in some form address themselves with more energy to Church extension in England, they would lose—in fact, they were losing—a great opportunity which God had put into their hands. Ultimately the subject was referred to the consideration of a committee.

The propriety of inquiring into the state of vital religion in United Presbyterian churches and their neighbourhoods, formed another topic of discussion, and a schedule of questions was adopted for transmission to the various congregations, which it was thought would elicit valuable information, and form the basis of a useful report.

At an evening meeting for the exposition of United Presbyterian principles, Dr. Cairns delivered an address upon certain theological points of current interest, in reference to which the doctrines of the United Presbyterian Church, in common with those of other Evangelical bodies, come in as correcting prevailing errors, or as protesting against doubtful and dangerous tendencies. Dr. Skinner, who spoke next, explained and defended the discipline and polity of the United Presbyterian Church. The meeting was also addressed by Dr. Edmond and Mr. McLeod.

Another public meeting was devoted to giving information on the missions of the Church, and to the advocacy of their claims. The speakers were the Rev. H. Macgill, the Home Missionary secretary; Rev. Dr. Somerville, Foreign Missionary secretary; Rev. Mr. Bell, Mr. Stitt, and Rev. Mr. Dickie.

The desirableness of union with other Evangelical bodies of kindred views was repeatedly adverted to in the course of the proceedings, especially with reference to the English Presbyterian Church. A committee was appointed upon the subject, in its bearing upon this latter denomination, which sent a deputation, consisting of Dr. McCre, Rev. T. Alexander, and Mr. A. Gillespie, who, after being introduced by Dr. Cairns, addressed the Synod in acknowledgment of the warm greeting which they received; and the desire found unanimous and emphatic utterance, that the United Presbyterians and the English Presbyterians might speedily form one Church. A deputation was also received from the Welsh Calvinistic Methodists, and a strong wish was expressed that some means might be found for securing a similar union with that denomination. Kindly references were also made to other communions by different speakers; and the Evangelical body in the Church of England, the Congregationalists, and the Wesleyan Methodists, were severally mentioned in terms of fraternal recognition. In fact, the entire proceedings were pervaded by a truly catholic spirit.

THE CONGREGATIONAL UNION.

The Autumnal Meeting of the Congregational Union was held, during the third week in last month, at Hull. Upwards of 400 ministers and delegates were present, who were welcomed with true Yorkshire hospitality, some of the guests, in the absence of sufficient accommodation among the Congregationalists, finding a temporary home in the households of Churchmen, Wesleyan Methodists, &c. The Rev. H. Allon, the chairman, in his opening address, aimed at "completing the circle of thought" which he had marked out on occasion of the meeting of the Union in May (Evangelical Christian, 1864, p. 305). He had then spoken of Christ and the Book; he would now refer to the Church, the organised body of Christ's disciples, upon the condition of which vital religion must ever largely depend. Glancing rapidly at the quickened religious life, and other characteristics of the universal Church, which are common at the present time, he went on to speak in detail of that particular section of it to which he and his brethren belonged. He first affirmed their own ecclesiastical validity, and went on to prove their right to be regarded as a legitimate part of the true visible Church of Christ. He then defined their position relatively to the Church of England. Their popular designation—"Dissenters" or "Nonconformists," the expression of a mere accident in their relations to the Established Church—was, from their rapid growth and relative magnitude, becoming daily more incongruous. They would be called "Free Churches." He then proceeded to distinguish between the Establishment and the Episcopal Church, urging the well-known objections of Dissenters to the former, but disavowing all hostility to the latter, and under this head of his subject made some admissions which we observe that a Congregational journalist thinks were hardly warranted. "Against brotherhood of Protestant churches. Great in numbers, in wealth, and in social power, eminent in learning and in piety, hallowed by great historical achievements and associations, rich in literature and in illustrious names, foremost in zeal and in good works, it is to be honoured as the mother and chief of all the British churches. In every prosperity of its spiritual life, in the growing munificence and consecration of its members, in the large success of its Evangelical efforts, we unfeignedly rejoice. Very earnestly do we pray the great Head of the Church that in all that constitutes the spiritual prosperity and greatness of a church, He would multiply both the Episcopal and every other Church of Jesus Christ a thousandfold.

In the concluding portion of his address, the delivery of which occupied nearly two hours, the reverend gentleman applied himself to the consideration of the evils incidental to the Congregational system and their appropriate remedies.

Among the more important business which engaged the attention of the Assembly was the construction of trust-deeds, so as to secure the preaching of sound doctrine in chapels built by the denomination, and the safe custody of those documents; the erection of a Bicentenary Memorial Hall, for which it is difficult at present to secure a site; the constitution of the Union—whether, it being a representative body, additional facilities should be afforded for personal membership—the further consideration of which was adjourned till May next; chapel extension; the retiring fund for pastors, which now amounts to rather more than 35,000*l.*; the promotion of Christianity among the Jews; and the progress of religion in Wales. On one evening a public meeting was held for the illustration and population in England would be eager prospered. Representatives from the gregational Unions of Scotland and I were also present.

In addition to those named above, t^l Dr. Vaughan, Rev. James Parsons, of Revs. G. W. and E. Conder, Rev. Mr. Mr. S. Morley, and other gentlemen o known reputation, took part in the p ings. It was remarked, however, tha was but a small representation of I Independency.

THE BAPTIST UNION.

For the first time in its histo Baptist Union has held an Autumnal ; thus giving another proof of the ne more influential position which it h year taken up, in relation to the der tion generally, to which we advert its meeting in May last (p. 305). The was held at Birmingham, on the 12 13th ult. Some four hundred minist delegates were present, who were I over by the Rev. J. P. Mursell, of La the chairman for the present year Mursell delivered a powerful address bore marks of careful preparation, a reference mainly to the external rela the Baptist body, its spiritual welfa economical questions which arise in cor with the affairs of its congregations, propriety of a union between the two b of the denomination now separate—the and the Particular Baptists. He clos an eloquent peroration on the eternal secured to ministerial fidelity holdin denomination: its Past History, Dis-Peculiarities, and Present Position." The paper went to show that little real exists between the two branches Baptist body, and was followed by a, from which it appeared that they ually coming closer and closer to- The "Relations of Church and rmed the topic of a paper by the Robinson, of Cambridge, who pro- adoption of a petition to the House ons, praying for inquiry into the of National Ecclesiastical Esta- s. After some debate, it was re- at the petition, after being revised by a committee appointed for that purpose, should be adopted, and that the Congrega- tional Union should be requested to concur in its presentation to Parliament. Papers were also read by the Rev. C. M. Birrell, on "The Influence of the Present Time on Per- sonal Religion;" by the Rev. J. P. Chown, on "Church Work in Large Towns;" and by the Hon and Rev. Baptist Noel, on "Indi- vidual Effort for the Conversion of Sinners." Dinner and tea were gratuitously provided for the delegates both days; and "these free and festive réunions," we are told, "added much to the exhilarating influence of the conven- tion."

Miscellaneous.

MISSIONARY MATTERS.

INDIA.

Palmyra climbing is the chief occupation of the inhabitants of the Christian town of in Tinnevely. A missionary of the Propagation Society thus describes a custom prevails there :—

Palmyra harvest commences in January, before which there is a special service in the church, the Christian climbers attend, each individual depositing his palmyra knife and instruments at church door. After the service, the missionary goes out and delivers the instruments to a living him some good counsel appropriate to the occasion; whereon the climber ascends a tree to the church and cuts the spadix, when he descends and places a piece of it in the climber's hands. The harvest is then considered as having been opened, and climbing is then begun. I have known even heathen refuse to climb the trees until this service had taken place. A heathen once told me that he looked on the man who climbed his tree before this service place as a "Thústan," which, for the benefit of my English readers, I translate "a black-

Rev. R. R. Meadows, of the Sivagasi district, in Tinnevely, refers to some half-congregations in which the revival movement of 1860 was most remarkably expe- He says he has watched them very closely ever since, and has made particular of the native pastors and catechists in charge. In one of the congregations, there is any trace of the revival; in another four of the converts have fallen away. But—these few exceptions, time has proved the reality of the revival; the converts are adorning mission, the baptized are becoming communicants, the communicants have been growing in knowledge. . . . The congregation at Pudhur, a distinct fruit of the revival, and number- 61 persons, is going on most satisfactorily. I think, therefore, that we cannot but 1 for His favour to us in 1860, and the continuation of it now.

North Tinnevely, the congregations have doubled since 1860, and there are many catechists watching over small bodies of inquirers here and there, who prove very evangelists. The sales of tracts and Scriptures, last year, were 2,800, being nearly as many as the year before. In the South, this encouraging feature was still more the sales, after having risen in the previous three years from 28 to 250 and 780, up, last year, to more than 6,000.

The agents of the Church Missionary Society continue to inculcate upon the native in Tinnevely, with no small measure of success, the duty of self-support and of ing to the extension of the Gospel. A meeting has been held at Mengnanapuram, it was agreed by the headmen of congregations, native clergy and others, that congregations should be forthwith supplied with catechists, to be paid out of the church fund. Similar meetings have been held at two other stations.

In the Mundakayam district of the Travancore Church Mission, the Rev. H. Baker in a brief period baptized 256 souls, Palayries, Paraans, and the higher caste of all well instructed, and who had been connected with the mission for some two t.

Attending the London Mission Institution at Madras lately was a youth of eighteen belonging to the Chetty or merchant caste. Brought under the influence of Divine grace, he refused to worship the idols in his father's house, would no longer wear the sacred thread, and cut off the sacred lock of hair at the back of his head. His father attempted to chain him, and bought a chain to chain him up. He managed to escape, and besought the missionaries to afford him an asylum. This, after repeated entreaties, they did. The father, who is a wealthy man, collected a mob, who tried to force an entrance into the mission premises; this, however, was prevented. The father was admitted; but the police intervened and the mob was kept outside. The missionaries, in his presence and that of other relatives, told the young man to go with them if he wished, but all the entreaties and arguments of his former friends were in vain. He decided to remain where he was, and still confirm in the faith.

"The public mind is beginning to be stirred not merely on the surface," writes Rev. G. Fryar, of the Negapatam Wesleyan Mission; "there are upheavings from its depth. These betoken a change such as Hindooism has never seen. The waves which have borne it for ages shall soon roll over its head." Mr. Fryar narrates a conversation which took place at a recent festival. One Brahmin asked—

"Did you hear about this letter which has come from Madras calling us to correspond? What letter?" said they. "What is it about?"

"Listen," said he, "I will tell you. There is in Calcutta a society called the Tattwa Sabha. It has now a branch in Madras, and the agent there is writing letters asking the Christians in all the Tamil towns to join it. He says that it is high time for us to bestir ourselves; the missionaries are teaching their Bible to all classes, both in our own language and in their own; we are getting our books and examining them, and contradicting and printing them, and laughing at them, and teaching our people to despise them—all because the people do not know the books do not teach them. Let us therefore rise up, and set aside the objectionable parts, and teach the true parts with explanations, and then will our people consider and understand, and be content with our own religion, says he. However, no wonder at them forsaking our temples while we show such neglect, and the Christians show them such attention. So God is exalting the Christians above us. See how the Christians have gone everywhere and preached, and printed, and built schools, till their Bible is in all languages, and all kinds of men go after them. But what are we doing all the time? &c., &c., &c.—so he writes."

"But what would he have us to do?"

"He would have us examine our books and customs, cast out the corruptions that have crept in, acknowledge and worship the supreme Brahma as the only God, spread abroad his praise by the meaning of the Veythams, preach discourses and print moral precepts in the living language, build schools that all may learn, bring about the remarriage of widows, and so on."

"Ayoh! ayoh!" exclaimed one of the party; "deceit! deceit! Those Madras fellows—trust them. They have mixed up with the English, and left off worship, and now that they are in all manner of wickedness, they will try to make us as bad as themselves. It is all the English have got the Government in these evil times."

Then spake a grey-haired man, "Vain talk—vain talk. Why do you blame the Government and why call the English our enemies? I am an old man: I think I know the difference between a friend and an enemy. I have mixed with the English in my time, and though I do not know their language, I know some of them know ours. I do not know that I have learned any wickedness from them, and I will tell you why I think they are not our enemies. Some time ago, when the Mohammedans had power in Mysore, they seized the Brahmins, cut off their hair, cut off their cords, they eat beef, circumcised them, took away the most beautiful of their women, and everything was dearest to them. That was the Mohammedan Government! Now look at the English. Have they done anything of the kind? Will you say they have not power? Pshaw! The Government of Madras rules over twenty-four countries: the Mohammedan of Mysore only ruled over one; and the most devoted Brahmin may perform his vows, the most beautiful woman may pass along before the very eyes of the English Governor without any fear or molestation of any kind. But the English are our enemies! They have given our country peace, safety, education, the post-office, the telegraph, the railway, and taught us many things we never knew before. And these are our enemies! I will tell you. God prospers the English because they please Him, but He could not endure the wickedness of the Mohammedans, and so He took their power away."

In conclusion, the aged Brahmin echoed the advice of the Madras Reformers, urging further inquiry before becoming identified with their society; and his remarks were followed by cries of "Right, right! Reason itself!"

The native church at Nagpore has received an addition to its numbers, by baptizing eight adults. Two of these had been Romanists, the rest were from among the heathens.

The Brahma Sumaj, or deistical sect, of Northern India now numbers forty societies and 2,000 adherents. The whole society meet every Wednesday evening, at least for public worship in Calcutta. There are thus collected, week after week, some five hundred young men:—

The place is well provided with seats, and is lighted with gas. On a marble platform are the teachers of the assembly; prayers are read; another prayer is chanted by all present; discourses are read or spoken; finally hymns are sung by a professional choir, and the assembly breaks up. Though a great advance on the prevailing system of Hindoo idolatry, Brahminism itself is very deficient. It greatly wants power. Its doctrine is not deep; its bonds of union are few and feeble; it lacks special motives to faith and practice. With justice, therefore, do its leaders complain that its disciples are deficient in moral earnestness. Large numbers remain in the system a very short

CEYLON.

A Church missionary mentions having, while itinerating with an American brother and two native assistants, held a most interesting meeting in a temple which was in course of erection in the Jaffna district. Speaking of the result of their preaching, he says, "I have seldom witnessed such an effect as appears to have been produced. Some said, even with tears, 'This is just what we have wanted.' I think, if we had taken the sense of the thing, they would have handed over the building to us."

CHINA.

In and around the city of Amoy, preaching, for a long time, was without any apparent success. Now, in two of the stations at least, such a state of things exists as (we are told by missionaries of the London Society) altogether exceed the most sanguine expectations formed. Persecution has not in any degree diminished the number of converts, but the number of professed worshippers continue to increase. On one Sunday there was baptized at one of these stations (Kwan-K'an) six converts. In Amoy, during the half-year, persons were baptized by the London Society missionaries. The case of a man lately admitted into the church of Chioh-lo is thus narrated:—

He formerly got his living by making gambling-cards. He had for many years been a hearer of the Gospel, but never could be induced to give up a trade which was deemed inconsistent with the mission of Christianity. Living in the neighbourhood of the chapel, he became a regular attendant at the services, and always professed his belief in Christ. For a great number of years he given up the worship of idols. His heart was at length touched by the Holy Spirit, and he manifested his willingness to abandon his trade for a more lawful one. In order to show his sincerity, he determined to burn the instruments he had used in the manufacture of the cards, publicly, and in front of the chapel, which he did, in the presence of the Christians and a number of his heathen neighbours. The loss must have been very considerable. Had he been willing, he could, with the least ease, have sold the things he burnt to great advantage.

From the English Presbyterian mission at Swatow, the Rev. H. L. Mackenzie writes, stating the circumstances under which two women had been baptized there:—

One of them especially has been much persecuted by her husband, at times beaten even to the effusion of blood, and on one or two occasions obliged, for a day or two at a time, to take refuge from her rage in the house of one of the Christians in that village. The sole reason of his thus cruelly treating her was that she had refused to help in preparing offerings for the worship of idols of the annual tablets. For many months neither of the women ventured to come forward for admission, being themselves aware that they still had, through fear, in some measure taken a sinful part in the atonement. But lately, led, as we trust, and strengthened by the grace of the Saviour, they both expressed their earnest desire to be baptized, saying that, by the Lord's help, they would no more take part whatever in idolatry, and one of them saying that, though she were beaten even to death, she would abide by this decision.

In portions of the field, the missionaries have been much tried by the inconsistent conduct of a number of the professed converts, some of whom they were about to suspend from membership; others, who had been suspended for a considerable time, unhappily gave no indication whatever of penitence.

WEST AFRICA.

Sierra Leone has been reached by Bishop Crowther on his way to the Niger. He received a warm welcome, and the scene presented on his landing is described by the local press as "majestic."

From Abbeokuta, the Rev. G. F. Bühler, of the Church Missionary Society, expresses the hope that there will be a large opening for the Gospel, especially also in the Ijebu country, which has been shut up hitherto entirely. Mr. Bühler goes on to say:—

Our Christians in the camp are highly esteemed by the Ijebus; the Christian captain (Balogan) is very high in the estimation of all. He shares dangers and fatigue with his soldiers, unlike other war-chiefs; and having learned from Mr. Mann, in Ijaye, to extract balls and perform the duties of a petty doctor, his help is everywhere sought and found. He is an excellent Christian, of a true congregation. The heathen chiefs and people told him that he had received some medicine from the white man, so that no ball could hit him. To which he replied, "Yes; come, I will give you that medicine;" and showed them the Word of God, and read to them portions of the Bible. He said, "It is my medicine and my food daily."

The principal chief of Old Town, Old Calabar (Ekpenyong Etim), having died, the

"blood men" of the plantations demanded that the poison-bean should be given to one of his wives, on the ground that she had killed her husband, their master, by witchcraft. The Rev. Mr. Edgerley, of the United Presbyterian Mission, describes the successful opposition which was made to this cruel design. At the death of the former chief, frightful excitement and horrid butcheries took place; but on this occasion, owing to the change wrought by the mission, the people remained quietly in the town, the school and Sabbath meetings were well attended, and there is reason to believe that not one person was killed. The "blood men," however, in order to effect their object, went to the house of the deceased chief, and under the pretext that the supposed witch was wanted for an innocent purpose, had her called out to them:—

When she came, they hurried her off to the market-place, forced some of the beans into her mouth, and told her she must eat them. She, however, took them out of her mouth, and put them on the ground, refusing to eat them. John Anderson, the son of Ekpenyong, hearing what had taken place, went out to the rabble, drew his sword on them, led her into the house, and placing her behind him, stood on the defensive. They said they wanted her to take the esere, that it might be seen if she had bewitched her husband. He dared them to give her the esere. They said they would chop her to pieces. He replied they must chop him first, for she was behind him, and he would like to see them try any such thing as long as his sword was in his hand. There, single-handed, he stood and defied them until the chiefs of the town came to his rescue, and the other wives of his father took the poor woman back to her room. They were indignant at the plantation people, and highly praised John for his humanity and courage.

During the following night another and stronger party of "blood people" from the plantations entered the town, having heard of the failure of their friends, and being determined to give the ordeal bean, and as they said, to drive the town people into the river, if they offered opposition. Again, however, they were disappointed, and retired without effecting their cruel design. This was largely due to the remonstrances of the missionary.

SOUTH AFRICA.

The mission to the Matebele has been the subject of several communications, addressed to Christendom by the Rev. J. S. Moffat, the latest of which appeared in August last (p. 398). The Rev. T. M. Thomas, writing to the Directors of the London Missionary Society, confirms our correspondent's representations as to the improved state of feeling upon the part of the cruel chief, Moselekatse, towards the missionaries. Six years ago, when the mission commenced, not only were they denied liberty to preach and to move from place to place, which they now enjoy, but—

Then, we were annoyed and insulted many times daily, and that by all; we were suspected as enemies. Now, we are treated with respect and confidence by all; while we have many faithful friends. Then, the doctrines taught being so new, and the want of means whereby to convey thoughts to the native mind so great, it was impossible to do much. Now, hundreds having so often heard the Gospel preached in their own language, and two small books printed in the same language, we may, humanly and naturally speaking, expect much more to be done.

Moselekatse's subjects are made up, it is supposed, of forty or fifty different tribes:—

Some the elephant worshippers, some the rhinoceros worshippers, others the eland, buffalo, lion, or crocodile worshippers, and others there are who worship different kinds of snakes. The few real Zulus in the country seem to worship their king and the spirits of their ancestors more than any other object; but such worship consists in endeavouring to appease more than revere and trust. For instance, should the king, who is said to be the ruler of the skies as well as of the lower regions, not pour down the longed-for and precious contents of the clouds as usual, his heart is said to be sore and black, or angry, and, until these feelings shall have been replaced by others more agreeable, no rain will fall. Hence, to bring about this end, they will endeavour to find out the cause of this great misfortune, which, when revealed, will generally be that some town or towns have offended. This will occasion the murder of all the chief men, the scattering of women and children, and the complete destruction of such town or towns; and thus the king's mind will be appeased.

The career of Moselekatse has been marked by some sanguinary deeds. For a slight offence he may, without hesitation, murder hundreds. And should he take it into his head, he can be as kind as any earthly parent. When leaving his country, the missionary, according to custom, called at his kraal to wish him good-bye. Mr. Thomas says:—

I found him surrounded by several of his wives and chief men. Seeing my two little boys, he cried out, in a pitiful, feeling tone, "Take the poor, motherless, dear ones to the waggon, for I cannot bear the sight." Turning his face towards me, he said, "My child, I am very sorry for you. She who is no more was lovely and beloved; all we loved her, and are sad after her. But go, my son, and may your journey be a pleasant and prosperous one. May you find favour in the sight of all you meet, until the day we shall welcome you back again. Do not be long;" and presenting me with an ox, a sheep, and a goat, he said, "Take these as meat for the road." The next day a man overtook me again, bringing another sheep and another goat sent by him. What a joy to us, and glory to the blessed Saviour, would it be to see this wonderful man at the feet of Jesus!

Thirteen adults were lately baptized by the Rev. Mr. Laing, of the Free Church Mission, at Burns-hill, Kaffraria. Connected with them were thirteen children, who were baptized with one or both of their parents.

Some notice of a five months' journey of the Rev. Joseph Ludorf, of the Wesleyan Mission, the persecuted Christians and the heathen of the Khalagari Desert, as related in his own words, has already appeared in these pages (Evangelical Christendom, 1864, p. 37). Mr. Ludorf has now sent the conclusion of his narrative, which is one of the most remarkable we have met for some time. His engagements were most diversified—travel, preaching, pastoral visitation, consulting with chiefs and others, and medical and surgical practice—but it is interesting to see how, amid all these in the heart of the desert, he kept up his acquaintance with the nature of the day. He had an eye for whatever was noticeable in the scenery or the productions of the country through which he passed, but the moral and religious welfare of the people was, of course, his chief concern. As the result of his observation, he tells us that “a wide door of usefulness is opened; thousands of souls stretch out their hands, crying for God; and beseech us to come to the wilderness to help them.” After a long consultation with Molema, the leading man among the Christian Khalagari, the conclusion arrived at that—

If two or three European missionaries could take up this district, having a good school for the training of youths for native teachers, a network of efficient native agency might be spread in all directions among the many tribes of Bechuana, where, during some parts of the year, the lives of the men are in danger from fever. Thus, if from the north, south, east, and west, the Gospel were pushed onward, we should soon have the pleasure of shaking hands in the centre of Africa with other servants of the cross of Christ. Ten youths were at once called by Molema, children of members, and they were delighted at the question whether they liked to go with me to be trained as teachers. It was no use to remonstrate; I was obliged to promise to find a school for them in the day, and I trust I shall succeed.

On one occasion—

Scarcely had we planted our tent under a mahogany tree, when some 200 people surrounded us, being more or less suffering from divers maladies, begging for help. We first had morning surgery. I then ordered all those who suffered from sore eyes on one side. It is astonishing how many their sight destroyed from cataract. Doubtless the strong sun, the fierce reflection from the sand rocks, and the immoderate use of snuff, are the principal causes. I operated upon several of a both by extraction and by the needle. The sun set, and the other half of the invalids occupied time, so that I had not a moment to take food.

The next day there was a repetition of the same scene. This was at Kanye, upon which there came a message from the chief, warning the missionary of lions which were reason to believe were on the road before him. As he proceeded he found it was in every direction with their ominous traces.

On another occasion, he had performed many surgical operations, when, he says:—

I received a letter from one of the Hermannsburg missionaries, who live at an hour's walk once behind the hill, begging me to come over and see them, as some of them had been laid up all months with obstinate ague. I dismissed the waiting people and walked over. I found their situation in a basin; underground is stagnant water; the almost vertical sun disengages continually fever miasmata; and, as the air is confined to the basin, the inhabitants must perish. The miseries gave me a very hearty welcome. The patient was low in body and mind. I gave him a few large doses of quinine and camomile, and the fever only once returned. Poor people! they have had nine members of the mission family behind their house within two years! They left the Hermannsburg Society on account of the eccentric Mr. H., and have for some time carried on trade to provide for their subsistence, whilst on the Lord's-day they hold Divine service for the Bakuena, as they are not ill. But both the missionaries and the people feel that to trade and to preach are incompatible, at least in this country.

One Lord's-day, during the morning service—

The alarm was sounded: “He he tau e ya khomu!” “Up, up, the lion devours an ox!” the chief said: “A khomo e ye tau.” “Let the ox eat the lion.” All males flew to arms and ran to spot. But it had entered the thickets, and could not be got at.

A fight with crocodiles forms the topic of one entry in Mr. Ludorf's journal, but it is in curious juxtaposition with other matters:—

Finished Bushnell on Natural and Supernatural. Walking across a patch of bush, suddenly two snakes, a species of crocodile (smaller), started up and came towards us. At first I thought it was a constrictor or pythoness, of which there are many hereabout. I had nothing to defend myself, so I took up stones; the dog also came to help. I battled a quarter of an hour. One of the beasts off into the bush, the other into a hole. Then I fetched my gun, and succeeded in killing the

My boy skinned and stuffed it. It is an ugly beast! Class-meeting. Writing.

On his homeward journey one Sunday afternoon, “two lions,” he writes, “paid us a visit. After much difficulty, one was killed; the other escaped. Mr. Ludorf, “in the name of everything that is holy and true," entreats that the cry of the souls in the Khals Desert may be heard, and that missionaries may be sent thither.

MISSIONARY MATTERS.

MAURITIUS.

Four missionaries for Madagascar were ordained by the Bishop of Mauritius on ninth anniversary of that excellent prelate's arrival in the island. Two are connected with the Church Missionary and two with the Propagation Society. They afterwards left Mauritius for their field of labour on the Madagascar coast.

The work of education in Mauritius is pursued under great difficulties. Before open school two hours are occupied by the master in going from house to house to collect children; for the parents will not trust the children alone. When school is over, two hours are occupied in taking the children home:—

The parents deem it a favour conferred by them when they send their children. Very few indeed care about them learning, and even those often make numberless excuses for not sending them. Some parents will dictate the nature and character of the studies for their children. One says, "My child must be taught nothing but Tamil; if he is taught any English I remove him." Another, "To my boy these songs [shockingly indecent Tamil songs], or I remove him." To my knowledge boys were removed because this request was refused. Another interferes with the discipline of school—giving directions as regards the punishments, hours of meals, &c.; others, again, come and sit in the schoolroom if they have nothing to do, and annoy the master by dictating to him. Thwarted in any of their opinions or proceedings they remove their children.

MADAGASCAR.

The adherents to the cause of Christ in Madagascar continue to increase, but they receive from the Queen increasing public recognition and homage. Among the people, on the other hand, they are regarded with growing indifference. There are rumours of a change in the Government, the Prime Minister (according to accounts received through a French channel) having been dismissed, on account, it is said, of his insolent bearing towards colleagues and the Queen, when under the influence of habitual intemperance. His brother, the commander-in-chief, has been appointed his successor; he is known to entertain more liberal views, in relation both to intercourse with foreigners and the improvement of the people, and the change, therefore, is likely to advance the interests of the country. The increase in the number of Christians is not confined to the capital; it extends to the surrounding province, and especially the Betsileo country. From Fianarantsoa, a military station in that territory, eight days' journey to the south, the brother of the governor and a number of the people waited on Mr. Ellis, to ask for a missionary. There are already at this place forty-six converts united in Christian fellowship, and more than two hundred attendants on public worship. The Betsileo, now politically united with the Hovas (to which latter, the ruling tribe, the missionaries have been chiefly in contact) are spoken of as a docile people. Mr. Ellis has visited that part of their country from which the deputation came, in order to ascertain if it would form a suitable spot for missionary operations.

WEST INDIES.

Several conversions in Hayti are reported by the Rev. W. H. Webley, of the Baptist Society. An awful case of cannibalism had been discovered in connexion with the practice of the Vaudoux:—

At Bizoton, about two miles from Port-au-Prince, there resided two wretches, a man and a woman, who stole one of their own nieces, a girl of about eight years of age, for a human sacrifice to their god, the Snake; strangled her, flayed her, cut her up, cooked her, and then devoured her, drinking the blood to their god! Happily, another girl of fourteen, stolen from the high road to Port-au-Prince, and destined for another similar feast on Twelfth-day, escaped from them, and getting to Port-au-Prince, divulged the whole affair. The uncle and aunt, and six accomplices, four men and four women, have therefore been arrested, tried, condemned, and shot, and their dwellings have been burnt to the ground.

POLYNESIA.

We regret to hear of the loss of the missionary ship, John Williams. She struck on a reef off Danger Island, and soon afterwards became a total wreck, and disappeared. Happily no lives were lost. There were forty-one souls on board, of whom twenty-four were passengers. The John Williams was built by the contributions of the juvenile friends of the London Missionary Society.

Rotumah, one of the Fiji Islands, has been visited by the Rev. J. Calvert, of the Wesleyan Mission. He found that the persecution from which the Christians there had greatly suffered had subsided. For five years the native church had been left wholly to its own resources, but the missionary found that its teachers had not been unmindful of their charge. There are now eleven chapels in the islands, besides four houses used and there are 230 members and about 1,200 professed Christians. Heathen dying out in Rotumah.

BRITISH AMERICA.

respondent in Canada writes hopefully as to the interests of vital godliness still in that country, though more slowly than at some former periods. He adds :— Much reliance has been placed on protracted meetings, and special efforts to promote religion. It appears to be very successful, a reaction is sure to ensue, which tends greatly to neutralise the good. The country in which I live contains about 25,000 inhabitants. I am persuaded that more than half the adult population are professors of religion. The Sabbath is kept and the school generally well attended. From reliable information it is evident that the Sabbath is so well observed in the adjacent parts of the United States.

Literature.

THE LIFE OF THE LORD JESUS CHRIST.*

The translation of this elaborate work will place within the reach of the English reader a book which has for a number of years held an honourable position among German students. Since it is at our disposal is necessarily limited, we shall at once endeavour to indicate the scope of the work, that our readers may see in general what it is about. A preface by Dr. Lange gives some account of some of the books on the life of Christ which have been written since that of Dr. Lange, a few observations upon the work of Dr. Lange, and upon the method which he (the editor) has pursued. Dr. Lange's own preface follows, and its date, 1854, reminds us that the Strauss controversy was then vigorously proceeding. The work is in three main divisions or books—of these, book i. is introductory, comprising 24, and about thirty sections upon separate topics. The leading questions in this book are the fundamental ideas of the Gospel history; the more general records of the life of Jesus; the historic records of the life of Jesus; criticism of the testimonies of the Gospel history; the authenticity of the four Gospels; the origin of the four Gospels; the relation of the four Gospels to the Gospel history. Amid all this there is much of great value, but it must not be denied that it requires a large amount of patient labour to get well through it. The second book opens with a preliminary discussion. Its subject is the historical delineation of the life of Jesus. It is divided into nine parts, and a number of sections, and constitutes the bulk of the work. We give the titles of the chief parts: The historical sphere of Christ's life; the history of the birth and childhood of the Lord Jesus; the announcement and character of Christ's public ministry; the appearance and enthusiastic reception of Christ; the time of Jesus' appearing and peering amid the persecutions of His mortal enemies; the final surrender of Christ to the Jewish authorities; the Jewish enthusiasm of His people; the treason of the people of Israel against the Messiah; the decision of the Sanhedrim, the Paschal Lamb, and the Lord's Supper; the trial, the passion, death, and burial of Jesus, and the reconciling of the world; Jesus' resurrection, or glorification; the eternal glory of Jesus Christ. The investigation of this portion of the work are pursued in chronological order, and comprehend every incident related in the Gospels, as well as questions arising out of them. The investigations are conducted with diligent perseverance, and in a spirit which can seldom be faulted. Difficulties are recognised where they occur, and possibly the author in his capacity sometimes makes concessions which are more common in Germany than in England. Although a believer in the divinity of Our Lord, he gives to the man Christ the prominence which we cannot help noticing from time to time where we should look for it. On some speculative or metaphysical points, too, we do not always see that his conclusions. To these observations we will add, that of necessity the chronology in which some incidents are ranged is open to consideration. It must be confessed that the form and order of events is not the same in all the Gospels, and that this difference, and the special details peculiar to the individual Gospels create a serious difficulty in the way of a distinctly chronological treatment. If the chronological order is indisputable, neither is the treatment which certain passages receive always satisfactory. Yet we do not believe for a moment that Dr. Lange has intentionally waived a Life of the Lord Jesus Christ: a complete Critical Examination of the Origin, Contents, and of the Gospels. Translated from the German of J. P. Lange, D.D., Professor of Divinity in the University of Bonn. Edited, with Additional Notes, by the Rev. Marcus Dods, A.M. Six Volumes. London: T. and T. Clark.

difficulty, or in any case made a timid concession to critics of a hostile school. perception, and a somewhat lively imagination, occasionally lead him to hint at which is plain to himself, rather than to spend words in its minute statement. There is not merely an apparently defective mode of expression sometimes, but positively obscure. But what is plain everywhere, is the reverential spirit of the extensive learning, his deep thoughtfulness, and his earnest purpose. No one can read the work without feeling that the author's words must not be hastily passed over; is dark may contain precious truth, that what is clear may sometimes call for reflection that what is striking may need to be modified. To illustrate the last point, take from the passage upon the finding of Jesus in the temple, when He said, "How is sought me? Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" Here ἐν τοῖς τοῦ πατρὸς μου, are paraphrased. "I must be in those (things, places, that are my Father's," and we may admit the paraphrase; but what of the sentence follows it? "How childlike is the assumption, that this being in the Father's is identical with a sojourn in the temple!" If this is the correct representation of they cease to be the sublime utterance which we have been wont to think them.

Leaving criticism, let us say that the author shows a large acquaintance literature of his subject, and that in this respect the notes of Mr. Dods are valuable editor's notes are valuable also on other accounts, and if we do not in all instances with them, we generally accept them as both interesting and useful. We feel obliged to Mr. Dods for taking the pains to insert so many additional references think his editorial notes are a fitting accompaniment to an English edition of work. By means of the references, he has called attention to more recent writings and, above all, to English works; while by his remarks he has presented some from a more English point of view.

The third book still remains unspeakable of. It is headed "The Life of the I unfolded in its fulness, according to the various representations of the four Evangelists. After some introductory remarks on the differences of the four Gospels, the author to Part i., "The Gospel according to Matthew; or, the representation of the life of Christ, symbolized by the sacrificial bullock." Part ii. is, "The Gospel according to Mark, or, the representation of the life of Jesus Christ symbolized by the lion." Part iii. Gospel according to Luke; or, the representation of the life of Jesus Christ symbolized the form of a man." Part iv. is, "The Gospel according to John; or, the representation the life of Jesus Christ symbolized by the eagle." These headings are fanciful, and not see any advantage gained by reviving the old symbols of the evangelists in a critical work like this. The titles are, however, a secondary consideration; we find subordinate sections discussions of deep interest and importance upon subjects from the individual Gospels. Although these discussions are distinct and complete in themselves they involve a certain amount of repetition which could not by any possibility be

On looking back over the 2,800 pages of which this work consists, we feel that the excellent author has performed an immense task, and that its English editor is right in it "the most complete Life of our Lord." He truly says: "There is no single work all these various branches (the authenticity, chronological difficulties, and exegesis) are so fully attended to, or in which so much matter bearing on the main subject brought together, or in which so many points are elucidated." It is, as the same gentleman has described it, a comprehensive and masterly work. It is a magnificent specimen of diligent learning and perseverance, as will appear even from the scanty summary of we have given. It is a remarkable contrast to such a brilliant but superficial work of Renan, who skims the surface and glides along with only furtive glances at great and ad captandum judgments upon them. Even where we differ from our author in form or substance of his treatise, we respect his candour, sincerity, and religious beliefs. If the play of his fancy appears in flashes of eccentric phraseology, while we wish it otherwise, we cannot be offended. And so, whatever exceptions of detail we discover, they are too small to counterbalance the excellence and utility of the work.

The translators and editor have done their part well; and the publishers merit credit and gratitude for the enterprise to which we are indebted for so well got up and so cheap a set of volumes, by one of the leading theological critics of our time, and the great questions of the day. Glorious as the Gospels are, and precious to the reader, we have cause to be thankful that God raises up for their defence and better standing men to produce such learned and powerful works as that before us.

Monthly Retrospect.

FOREIGN.

NO proof of the immense consequences attached to the late convention for the Pope of Rome by the French troops, is furnished by the fact that our correspondents in all parts of the world make allusion to it as affecting, in a greater or less degree, the peace of Europe. It is everywhere felt to be one of those rare events which influence the progress of humanity at large, and give a new direction to the history of the world. With the exception of a very few of the immediate dependents and flatterers of the Pope, no one affects to believe that the Pope can remain at Rome unsustained by French troops. The idea of forming a Papal army is a dream repudiated by friends and foes alike. They are awake to the stern realities of things, and whether they desire the event or not, they agree in the fact, that the departure of the last French soldier will be the signal for the departure of the Pope too. Beyond that event their speculations do not reach; politicians, having their minds filled with the idea of the unity of Italy, care not to speculate on the future of the head of the Romish religion. The friends of the Pope, on the other hand, appear overwhelmed with dismay, and are incapable of forming any idea how the Pope can exist out of Rome. To them the event seems to be synonymous with the breaking up of society and the end of the world. To sober-minded Protestants, the event will appear in a different light. While we rejoice in the downfall of the temporal power of the Man of Sin, we cannot forget that the exile of the Pope may, and probably will, tend to a temporary outburst of sympathy for his person, and a revival of interest in the use of which he is the representative. He will be industriously represented as a martyr, and we know the effect of such representations on ardent minds. That feeling will vary, but we may expect it to come. It behoves all Protestants to be on their guard against its influence.

The Italian convention, which excites so profound an interest in all other countries, has reached its culminating point of excitement in Italy. The letter of our correspondent contains a vivid and graphic picture of the emotions it has produced, the hopes it has raised, the anxious and uncertain future which it brings almost within Italian grasp. At the same time, anxiety and apprehension abound. The Italians have been so little accustomed to straightforward dealing, that the part of the French Emperor, they are so well aware of the subtlety and the mystery of the Papal power, that their disquietude is only natural. Two whole years' delay, given of the intention to withdraw the French troops from Rome—two years thus afforded for the indulgence of all manner of intrigues by men whose lives have been devoted to intrigues, and who have the means of bringing the most sinister influences to bear upon the mind of the French Emperor, and to induce him, even at the eleventh hour, to promise! It is an anxious period, and the friends of liberty, both religious and civil, are fully alive to the importance of the crisis. But in the main their hopes predominate over their fears; and it must be said for both, that they are taking every precaution to realise their hopes, and to give their adversaries no advantage from any false step they may take. The French leaders show great prudence; there is a wonderful harmony of action among a people so divided; Turin has become reconciled to the loss of prestige which attended her as the capital of Italy, and none of the other municipalities envy Florence the honour conferred upon her. All believe that it is only temporary, and that the King of Italy must eventually re-establish his capital in Rome. The friends of Evangelical religion share with the politicians the opinion that something may occur to mar the realisation of the convention; but, in spite of this, they have a fear which is peculiar to themselves. What if, in the prospect of being abandoned by all foreign Powers, the Pope should come to be reconciled with the King, and agree to share Rome with him, as the united capital of the Italian kingdom and the centre of the Roman Catholic world? Such a union, cemented as it certainly would be by an agreement to make the Romish religion once more rampant in the land, would, of course, usher in a new era for the Protestant communities. Without absolutely believing in this danger, the friends of Protestantism are alive to the possibility of its occurrence, and they take characteristic steps to meet it. It is a stimulus to them to labour more earnestly while the door is open, and so to shine with light, that no future obscuration shall avail to extinguish it. The old quarrels which once filled so large a space in our correspondent's letters appear to be hushed for the present ; and we are glad to see that the writings of Dr. De Sanctis are widely read, and appear likely to play an important part in the new movement. The survey which our correspondent gives of the ground that has already been won will be found full of interest.

From France we have heard little of late respecting the spread of Protestant truth. This is not surprising. The Reformed Church in France is rent and torn by divisions respecting the most vital articles of faith ; and it is not possible that a Church so divided should gather converts from any other faith, however corrupt. There is hope, however, that the living stream will work itself pure, and purge off the base matter which has defiled its clearness and sweetness. In the letter of our correspondent will be found some interesting details respecting that process. It is a curious commentary on the loud professions of the so-called Rationalists for free discussion and untrammelled thought, that at the recent conference at Nismes they objected, and, we regret to say, objected successfully, to the laity having the right to vote. The Orthodox party felt this to be such a violation of their Presbyterian constitution, that they withdrew from the conference, and agreed to form another, in which the supernatural element in the Scriptures, and the rights of the Christian laity, should be the bases of their union. Here is the germ of a secession which may have important consequences in the future. The elections for the Consistory, to be held in January next, also excite deep interest, and a curious question has arisen respecting them. Are those Protestants who belong to churches not salaried by the State to have a vote in the elections, or not ? Surely, say the friends of Evangelical truth, they have as much right to vote on the one side as infidels, indifferentists, and men who never enter a place of worship, have on the other. It is not, of course, for us to decide.

Germany is still too much agitated with political events to allow room for the growth of Church matters. The treaty of peace with Denmark still lingers, and matters have become complicated by a wish expressed by the inhabitants of Lauenburg to become united with Prussia—a request with which Prussia would gladly comply, if she could obtain the consent of Austria. A new arrangement of the international customs duties, well known as the Zollverein, is also occupying much of public attention. Still, in the midst of these political and fiscal janglings, the meeting of the great German Church Union, the Kirchentag, comes with refreshing influence. This body has no secular influence ; it abstains from clothing its decisions in formal resolutions, and the opinions expressed have therefore nothing beyond a moral weight ; but, perhaps on account of this, its free and untrammelled action, it is supported by some of the best and most cultivated minds in Germany. The question before the late meeting was the effect produced by the late attempts to depict the life of the Saviour, and the conclusion arrived at was that those caricatures of Christ—they are no more—had hit a blot in Christian literature, which was deficient in that one branch of theological study that the Renans and Strausses endeavoured so wretchedly to fill. We may therefore expect that the subject will be taken up with all the profundity and erudition of the German mind. May that erudition be accompanied with as profound and fervent piety !

According to the most recent accounts, the success which waited on the arms of the Federals in America during former months had at last failed them. They have not sustained any serious reverses, but they make no farther progress ; and in the various skirmishes and actions reported the advantage is generally found on the side of their opponents. The war, however, hardly excites so much attention as the approaching election for President, which takes place this month. There are only two candidates in the field. Mr. Lincoln is supported by the Republicans for re-election ; General McClellan is the candidate for the Democrats. Both candidates profess to be in favour of continuing the war. The difference lies in the mode in which it ought to be carried on, and in the terms that ought to be accepted as the basis of a lasting peace. There is little doubt but that Mr. Lincoln will have a majority. Indeed, this is virtually confessed by his opponents, who are already beginning to cry out against foul play and violations of the Constitution—and that may have some reality, but which are more likely to proceed from conscious weakness and the prescience of a coming defeat. While on this subject, we may remark that the New York Independent, which it is well known is the organ of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, has done us the honour not only to quote some remarks we made in our June number respecting British politics—a compliment which was also paid us by the New York Christian t to comment on them. The Editor asks why, if it be a right thing for England to rejoice in and to strive to maintain the integrity of the English Monarchy, it is wrong thing for Americans to do the same by the American Republic? We are not prepared to state any reason why. The influence of a country in the world is a precious deposit which every citizen ought first to preserve, and next to turn it to good account. We desire to do this for England. We cannot regret Americans for desiring to do this for America. On the end to be gained we are all Englishmen cannot be thankful enough that they are spared all temptation to use American means.

Latest intelligence from New Zealand describes the submission of one portion of the Maoris, who laid down their arms, and made an unconditional surrender of their arms to the Governor. There are still certain tribes that hold out, but it was hoped that news of the submission of their brethren, and of the leniency with which they were treated, reached them, they would abandon the unavailing strife. It is interesting to know that the tribes which have submitted are those who had most profited by missionary work, and that the influence of Christianity, though it did not restrain them from war, was still enough to make them carry it on in a humane spirit. The Governor expressly stated that they had not robbed, nor plundered, nor ill-treated the wounded who fell into their hands; and in consideration of their humanity, he restored them three-fourths of the land they had surrendered, leaving it to them to fix the sites, and he promised them seed and implements to cultivate it, with temporary provision for themselves and their families.

H O M E.

The buoyant tendency which the manufacturing industry of Lancashire showed in recovering from the abyss of 1862, received an unpleasant check lately. It does not appear that there has been any diminution in the supply of the raw material, but men's minds have been troubled with rumours of an approaching termination of the war in America—rumours which died away as suddenly as they arose—and this, combined with the scarcity and high price of money in the market, deterred the manufacturers from entering upon new schemes, and induced them in many instances to close their but newly-opened mills, to the distress of the labouring population. But the privations arising out of this temporary difficulty are slight and manageable, as compared with the great crisis which was so nobly surmounted the other year; and we are happy to be able to record that the patience and fortitude of the sufferers continues to be as exemplary as ever. Their obedience to law in the midst of their privations received a noble encomium from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, during a sort of semi-political tour through Lancashire in the course of the month. The object of Mr. Gladstone's visit was to inaugurate the opening of a park for the amusement of Bolton and Farnsworth, the munificent gift to the public of Mr. Barnes, a manufacturer in the district. Gifts like these, we may notice, so princely and so generous for the health and recreation of the labouring poor, are absolutely new features in our life, and testify, more strongly than anything else, to the kindly feeling that now prevails between the different classes in our social state.

The past month has been a month of ecclesiastical meetings. In our Home Intelligence we have given brief summaries of the proceedings at the Church Congress, the meeting at the Congregational and the Baptist Unions, and the session in London of the Wesleyan Methodist Synod. To each of these meetings we would gladly have accorded more space, had our limits allowed. We may record of them all that they showed manifold tokens of spiritual life, each in their own sphere; a growing sense of the obstacles that lie in the way of the evangelization of the world; and a more vigorous determination to rely on Divine help, to overcome them. The position of the Church of England is, indeed, a somewhat painful one; threatened on the one hand by the growth of infidelity, and on the other by superstition—the latter proceeding so far, that a recognised deacon of the Church appeared on the platform of the Congress in the habiliments of a Papist, and urging the adoption of the discipline of a Popish Church. The representatives of scepticism were not so audacious—they kept aloof from the main body. By the great body of Churchmen, however, the latter is rightly regarded as the evil of the two; and the judgment of the Privy Council has wounded so many of them, that the propriety of a separation between the Church and the State, or, failing that, of a large secession of members, and the formation of a Free Church, after the fashion of Scotland, is now openly canvassed in ecclesiastical journals.

In the din of these controversies, we are carried back almost to the origin of them, to the announcement of the death of Father—not Brother—Ignatius, the Hon. and Rev. George Spencer, whose conversion to the Romish faith about thirty years ago was the first of those perversions of which there has since been such a melancholy catalogue in the ranks of the English clergy. Mr. Spencer is said to have been a sincere, well-meaning man, simple almost to childishness; so weak, indeed, that, with the best will in the world on his part, to undertake the conversion of his brethren in the Establishment, the Romish authorities were too wise to trust him, and made no use of the influence which his rank and wealth would have given them, but condemned him to obscurity. He acquiesced uncomplainingly, and beyond an occasional appearance in his ascetic garb in the streets of London, the world was allowed to forget all about him, till the memory of his secession was revived by his death.

Among the episodes which the Colenso controversy has called forth, an epistolary correspondence between the Bishop of Natal and the Archbishop of York deserves a notice. "The Layman" undertook to reply to the criticism of the Bishop, and was permitted, in consequence of the ability and orthodoxy displayed in a previous volume, to dedicate this work to the Archbishop of York. But when the volume was published it was found that it made large and dangerous concessions, which the friends of orthodoxy were by no means disposed to accept. The Archbishop's attention was called to this matter by a clergyman in his province; but beyond a letter to the Times, giving a general disclaimer to the effect that he coincided in the "Layman's" opinions, no step was taken. Bishop Colenso seized on this point, and, in a pamphlet he afterwards issued, he contrived to represent the Archbishop as not opposed—at least not very severely—to his views. On this the Archbishop sent a rather warm note to the Bishop, repudiating his inferences and disclaiming all sympathy with his opinions. The Bishop replied in a long epistle, accepting the denial, while at the same time he endeavours to show that there is something in his first opinion after all. Of course some allowance is to be made for a man who finds himself rejected on every side, and is endeavouring to find support in any quarter, however slight. But there are limits even to that mode of defence, and most persons will be of opinion that those limits Bishop Colenso has in this instance transgressed.

As we are going to press, we learn the result of the deputation from the Evangelical Alliance to the Foreign Secretary on the subject of the persecutions in Turkey. The memorial which was presented embodied the views of the Alliance on the proper conduct of the Hatti-humayoun, in opposition to those put forward by the Sublime Porte and Ambassador, Sir Henry Bulwer. According to these functionaries, the edict allows every man to enjoy his own religion, so long as he keeps it to himself; but punishes every attempt at propagation, whether made in public or private, as a crime. The memorial, on the contrary, set forth with great force and clearness, that this was in reality no privilege, and contended that every Protestant had the right, under it, to advocate his own views, so long as he did not do so in an offensive manner, calculated to lead to a breach of the peace. It also vindicated the conduct of the missionaries and the Turkish converts, challenging their opponents to show any instance in which they had transgressed the limits of discussion. The reply of Lord Russell was, on the whole, satisfactory. He spoke, of course with all official reserve, but that did not prevent him from expressing his surprise at the construction put upon the edict by the Turkish Ministers, and his own concurrence in the views of it entertained by the deputation. It was stated at the interview, that a Turkish convert whose case is so interestingly told by our Constantinople correspondent, had been released from prison since our correspondent's letter was written, and that he too has been banished from the capital, along with the other converts. We take this opportunity of directing the attention of our readers specially to our correspondent's letter for a full and impartial account of the present state of the question. Holding strong views of his own, he is yet most anxious to do justice to the arguments and motives of those who differ from him. Sir Henry Bulwer may not agree with the writer's conclusions, but he must admit that no greater allowance could be made for the difficulties of his position by the most strenuous defender of his conduct.

Evangelical Christendom.

SPIRITUAL FORCE.*

ON is so far complete. Unless it be the occasional descent of a meteorite, there are no accessions making to the materials of the globe, and all the resources of the soil cannot add a new substance to the soil, or a new species to the animals that move on the surface.

But in a certain sense the creating process continues. The Father worketh, and the Son also worketh, and not only is every spring a new birth of life, but we delight to watch those forces and energies which in their perpetual motion peak the present Deity: the stirring breeze, the plunging tide, the throbbing heart, the vapour going up and the rain coming down, and all those manifold phenomena by which thoughts of the Most High, ancient as eternity, are carried into completion, and in which HE never leaves himself without a witness, in which we live and move and have our being.

Life is what we love, for it is in life that the living God draws near; and when such life is rounded off and limited within a definite personality—the human plant, the living moving creature. God is in this great wilderness, but the traveller sees Him not in the grim rocks nor in the shadowy flitting of the clouds; but the moment that this tiny moss arrests his eye, his spirit is lifted in that little gleam the living God shines forth, through this crevice so close and his Father in heaven are looking at one another. The Lord's voice comes from the waters, the God of glory thundereth, but as from the measureless main comes the murmur to the murky sky, the patriarch's spirit is oppressed by the angry dirge of the crowded world's sepulchre; and it is not till the dove and olive-twigs come to the window, that at sight of these living signs—these tokens of life which shall again be vocal—the heart of Noah goes up in joyful sacrifice. This is life we love, and of all life what we love most is the life which comes from our own. Alexander Selkirk—"monarch of all he surveyed"—was the first of his own small world, but, among all the creatures, there was no help found for him:—

beasts that roam over the plain,
form with indifference see;
are so unacquainted with man, their tameness is shocking to me.

Society, friendship, and love,
Divinely bestowed upon man,
O, had I the wings of a dove,
How soon would I taste you again!

And whilst we go up in worship to the Life which is above our own, we also long for some point or other at which it comes close to us, quite down to our level, so that it may understand us and feel with us, and not disdain us. And therefore is our love to the Saviour so great. "I am the Way, the Truth, the Life:" from the signed as a conclusion to the Papers, "Finality and Progress," "The True Word in the age," and "The Mind of the Master," which will be found at pp. 313, 372, and 473 of this cradle He makes it but one step to the Throne of the Eternal, and encourages build our clay cottages under the very eaves of God's temple, thus making Father's house and the present home conterminous, He ennobles earthly existence by a Divine companionship, and teaches us to the awe of the worshipper to share the affection of the child.

In a lone room [near Bloomsbury, London], at the top of one of the houses where every dwelling of a family, there dwelt an aged woman, whose scanty pittance of half-a-week was scarcely enough for her bare livelihood. The visitor observed, with some surprise, a strawberry plant growing and flourishing in a broken teapot that stood on the window-sill. He had from time to time how it grew, and with what care it was tended and watched. At a day he said to the poor woman, 'Your plant does well; you will soon have some strawberries from it.' 'It's not for the sake of the fruit I do it,' replied the woman. 'Then why do you so much care of it?' he asked. 'Well, Sir,' she replied, 'I am very poor, too poor to have any living creature; but it's a great comfort to me to have that living plant, for I know it is only live by the power of God; and as I see it live and grow from day to day, it tells me that life is near.'—Parkes's Window Gardens.

Yes, man redeemed has again, through Christ, recovered something of the God, and may rise to much more. Already is the forecast come in a mind which wanders through immensity, and which, though it cannot grasp the infinite, longs to commune with it; in a mind which rests neither day nor night, and seeks not except varying exertion; in a mind which, vexed at its own ignorance, and aware of its own weakness, cries, "O wretched man," and which in the sighs that mark the bondage of corruption and the impatient flutterings which beat the prison walls shows some dim reminiscence of a larger life now lost, and a surer presence of glorious liberty not seen as yet.

Christ is the life of souls. It is in union to Him that our spirits attain distinct and definite. It is by much communion with Him that we come to life abundantly.

This fountain fringed with ferns, the white pebbles and silvery mica in its crystal depths—it was even thus it leaped and gushed a thousand years ago and though you and a whole caravan of pilgrims were to stop and drink, that you will drink it dry. True, that great stone would cover it, and hold but a few gallons at a time. Still, as it has that mountain for its magazine, that mountain again has the whole firmament for its feeder, it is practically inexhaustible and however deep you draw, the next visitor will find it brimming over, and again, till the long procession ends and life's highway is no longer trod by travellers.

The Sermon on the Mount, the Farewell Discourse, the tenth of John, and the passages, are a fountain of living water; and there is not a Zionward traveller some time or other he has drunk of that brook by the way. But the strong current flows full and exuberant as ever; for, although the outlet be limited, the source is high up among the hills of immortality—its feeder is constant and unchanging as the heart of Immanuel. Reader, Christ loves you. Sinful as you are, He loves you, and says, "Take the water of life—take it freely. Be under His protection; be happy in God's friendship." And if you let these sayings sink into your heart, they will make you most blessed. They will make you feel, not as a saint, but the next best thing, as a sinner who has found a Saviour. They will take the guilt from your conscience and the gloom from your future, they will send you on your way strong and elastic, from strength still onward unto strength, and long after your footprints have disappeared from the dusty path, and when your godly predecessors you have been promoted to drink the river which makes glad the celestial city, this fountain will draw to its verdant brink poor pilgrims of this world who shall there in turn quench the fever in their veins and quaff the hope of immortality.

"Spirit and life," they are the words of Jesus which have set our world agoing. To their softening influence we owe it that there is now no slavery; to their expanding, elevating influence we owe the gradual rise of nations and the consequent breaking up of despotisms. To these words, so holy, so full of such tracts of equity, of truth, and openness, as may now be seen on the face of Christendom; all the homes so pure and happy, so pleasant and harmonious may this day be found in Europe and America. To these words, so full of their quiet strength—so irresistible in their gentle omnipotence—do we owe overturn of idolatry, and that destruction of caste, now so imminent. Even as in the track of these words and the adorable Speaker, though by a way which it knows not, God's Spirit is bringing a long-blinded world to recognise the Fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of man; the brotherhood so wickedly broken and so wildly blood-imbrued; the Fatherhood which to the sinning children hands back, filled with costly blessing, the cup which on their behalf the Sinless One received a cup of trembling, and, exhausting all its agony, has passed it on, the pledge of an amazing friendship and the memorial of a deathless love.

The words of Jesus are "life." Just as the sun is the great source of dynamic force or energy to our globe, so, of all moral power, all holy spiritual energy, the true source is the Incarnate Word, the Sun of Righteousness. And, just as light, sound, motion, electricity, are all so many equivalents of heat—so much translated sunshine*—so clear believing insight, fervent worship, benevolent activity, the charm which attracts others and blesses whilst it binds—they are all so many outcomes of that vital warmth which radiates from the healing wings, so many manifestations of that holy energy of which the fountain remaineth in Jesus evermore.

If we remembered this—how variously the selfsame vital force may develop—there would perhaps be a little more facility in recognising our personal Christianity, and a little more comprehensiveness in our Christian charity.

The Lord Jesus is the Master, the Centre, the Sun: attachment and amenableness to Him make the Christian, the disciple, the subject soul. But the energy He imparts, the spirit and life of His indwelling words, may come out in different ways.

The body of one is full of light. (Matt. vi. 22.) He loves to muse and meditate. He is drawn towards those high themes which are impenetrable in their own excessive brilliancy, and fain would dwell with Uriel in the sun; but withal so silent and sequestered, that the world knows him not—aye, the very Church knows him not—and it is only the shining track of the angel speeding home which tells how bright the spirit that has passed away.

The heart of another is full of fire: concerned for the world's salvation, unable to forget his prodigious debt to redeeming grace, to the casual company or the great congregation he is ever ready to exclaim, "Come, and I will tell what he hath done for my soul;" or like Israel wrestling at Jabbok the livelong night, he is a prince, and prevails—in importunate personal energy prevails with the unawakened careless sinner, in urgency no less personal and importunate prevails with a prayer-hearing God. Like Luther, of whom Melancthon mentions, "I have often found him in tears, praying for the Church;" like Rutherford, who says to his Anwoth parishioners, "Your heaven would be two heavens to me;" like Isaiah, who ejaculates, "O that mine eyes were waters, and my head a fountain of tears, that I might weep day and night for the sins of my people;" like Paul, "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of Christ:" "For I could wish that myself were anathema for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh."

A third is a man of action. With him the life comes out in motion—in hardy feats or herculean enterprise, or perhaps in busy services, minute and manifold. He collects the money, builds the almshouse, gets the fatherless child into the orphan school, or the wanderer into the refuge; organises the rural excursion for a Sunday-school, or, mayhap, for the whole of a town-pent parish; teaches the class, hunts up the truant scholar, trots to and fro in search of some faithless promiser who has failed to come to the district meeting, and with tracts and coal-tickets climbs as many stairs and dives into as many cellars as would walk off his feet a member of the Athletic Club; and, in reply to the monitor who warns him against over much bustle and dangers of self-righteousness, he is apt to reply with the homely and downy Apostle, "If a brother or sister be naked, and destitute of daily food; and one of you say, Depart in peace, be warmed and filled; giving him, notwithstanding, not those things which are needful for the body—what doth it profit?"

* "Ruhmkorff's induction coil is a beautiful instance of varied transformations of energy. While it is in action we have light, sound, heat, electricity, and motion of gross matter, all simultaneously produced, and representing separate portions of the potential energy which is disappearing in the battery. Ultimately, in this case also, the whole energy which thus disappears takes the final form of heat."—North British Review, June, 1864, p. 361.

Whilst with others still the same vital energy, the same living force, come in general worth, in commanding excellence or a sweet attractiveness. They are mirrors that reflect the sun, but magnets which draw us with mysterious power. They do not flame away like those living sacrifices of self-devotion whom we mentioned second, nor do they fill their sphere with that assiduous and beneficence which we noticed last; but somehow or other, they keep their hold and keep it, for they apprehend that for which they are apprehended of Christ. In their solidity and seriousness, or it may be in their kindly fellow-feeling, their tender tact and bright-hearted upbearings, their integrity amidst temptation, in their solicitude for others less confirmed strong, in their desire to prevent evil and promote goodwill, they show whose children they are, and by whose spirit they are animated. Neither notable nor demonstrative, like the active Martha, Mary's reverential docility still helps to draw spirits towards the Master; and to those who are not sons of thunder, it is a comfort to know that good service may be done by sons of consolation. And the more we speak of, though neither men of rapt devotion nor outspoken feeling, though neither eloquent nor conspicuously active, if full of faith, are still men of power, their solid, God-fearing worth a salutary and welcome presence in our midst, as of the great central life in as far as they are full of goodness.

Here, then, is a test of personal Christianity. We cannot borrow a neighborly temperament; but if we have any true knowledge of Christ and any right attitude towards Him, the result will be seen—the result which such knowledge should have upon a mind like ours.

Paul's fervour a phlegmatic spirit cannot copy, and John's sphere, so far as the earth, a homely nature cannot occupy; but Paul's Saviour and John's Saviour are needful to every sinner. Is He a Saviour to us? Were there no Christ, would the sun of our existence set? By taking the best motive from our efforts and the comfort from our sorrow, would it take the lustre out of life, and leave it hollow in our heart as nothing else could supply?

And even as we judge of ourselves, so we judge of others. Speaking of "The True Word in the Right Tone," we have already seen that Christianity is more than a creed—the words which Jesus speaks are spirit and life; and we see that in different members the same central life may have different manifestations—in different characters or circumstances the same ultimate power or energy may have different developments. Let not the benevolent and uncondemn the devout and the meditative, and let not the fervid condemn the calm and unimpassioned. Let not the man of definitions and demonstrations condemn the man of intuitions and emotions, and let not the man whose heart is ever at hand condemn the brother who has pored over deep problems in divinity till his brow is furrowed and his brain is dry. It needs many men to make a world; it needs many Christians to make a Church. And although that would be the richest and rarest which most closely copied and most correctly repeated One rather than the children of men—a Christianity comprehensive of all the man, consecrating every taste and hallowing every affection, and giving to its possessor the heri-

EARL RUSSELL ON THE MORAL ELEMENTS OF NATIONAL LIFE. 581

earth, the whole glorious birthright of redeemed humanity—let us be thankful ever we see aught of Christ's spirit or aught of Christ's life, and let us hail as a hero, whosoever he be, the man who shows aught of the mind of the Master.

J. H.

EARL RUSSELL ON THE MORAL ELEMENTS OF NATIONAL LIFE.

As the character of British statesmen is, we are not often called by one of our men to the consideration of questions pertaining to the more elevated regions of morals and philosophy. It is the mistake of vulgar minds to regard all questions as abstract as unimportant, and to conclude that all dealing with principles is impractical; but the mistake is so common, that it required an exertion of courage for which Earl Russell is famous to lead him to throw out for public discussion a subject so far beyond the range of ordinary speculation as that which formed the principal theme of the address delivered by him the other day, at Aberdeen, in his capacity of Lord Rector of the Aberdeen University. "Is there," asked his lordship, any law or general rule by which the decline of States is governed?" The reply given in his address is not so definite or precise as it might have been if Earl Russell had not been under the necessity of accommodating himself to the laws of political oratory, but its general import is sufficiently clear, and is highly suggestive of his thought. It is from no necessity, he argues, implanted in the nature of things—it is in virtue of no mysterious and irresistible ordinance of fate—that States die; the effect in this, as in other provinces, arises from its cause, and in the case of the present we may see in operation those agencies or influences to which States owe their decline and fall. To take the case of the Roman empire, we behold luxury, vice, and irreligion conspiring to the overthrow of that magnificent empire. On the other hand, when the tide of religious earnestness swelled up throughout western Europe in the sixteenth century, the energies of nations revived and the vigour of youth reappeared. We understand his lordship, on the whole, to say that while many causes contribute to national decay, those which are of a moral or religious character are more powerful than any other. The national conscience and national heart are, he would say, the main seats of national vitality. It may be possible to carry out, in one or two directions, the train of reflection to which Earl Russell introduces us.

First of all, we must look somewhat more closely into the initial fact on which the discussion proceeds—the fact, namely, of national decay. Earl Russell casts aside, as frivolous or absurd, the idea that nations are subject to an inexorable decline; but there are, we should think, few students of history on whose minds this idea, or one resembling it, has not been borne home with melancholy impressive weight. Man would fain exempt himself from the sway of that law of change which is visibly inscribed on the universe around him, and if his ingenuity is never exhausted in framing devices to shield him from the thought of personal decay, still less familiar is he generally found to shake the thought that nations too have their youth and manhood, their growth and death. Yet, when we look down the vista of ages, the question presses itself on our notice is, not whether nations decline and fall, but in any form of national life, any association of mankind in social and political organization, any system of polity and civilisation, can endure. Forms of civilisation have risen out in strength and splendour, and have faded like the grass or fallen like the reed. "Assyria, Greece, Rome, Egypt," we ask with the poet, "where are ye?"

The most renowned and glorious cities of the ancient world, what are they but headstones marking the graves of nations? The traveller sees, rising over the desert sand, or gleaming through softened light from beneath Italian foliage, a range of massive and stately pillars, but the very language of the men who fix their bases or sculptured their capitals is no more. What form of ancient civilisation continues to exist? Not one. It may occur to some of our readers that the civilisation of the Hebrews is an exception, but a second thought must reveal that though the Jewish race survives, the form of national life which flourished of old in the green valleys of Palestine, and had its central point in the mountain of Zion, has passed away as completely as that of Tyre or that of Nineveh. Others may remind us of what has been alleged respecting China, and bid us acknowledge that her teeming millions have set decay at defiance. But the early periods of Chinese history are involved in obscurity and fable, and the civilisation of China, as known to the nations of modern Europe, attests the validity of the general law by its profound and, to all appearance, incurable decrepitude. If the law of national decline and fall can be escaped, the method by which this result is to be obtained remains to be discovered. The rule is established by all the precedents of the past; for exception we have still to look. This it is which gives practical and startling interest to the inquiries suggested by Earl Russell. Are we sure that we shall bow before this decree of mutation—this terrible ordinance by which empires and civilisations vanish like the architecture of the clouds or the imagery of a dream? Have we any guarantee that the height to which modern civilisation has attained will not serve merely to render its fall more conspicuous? Is Christian civilisation proof against those influences which operated fatally upon pagan civilisation? The questions are not to be answered in an easy, offhand manner. Even if it were conceded—and we are by no means sure that it can be conceded—that there are yet no symptoms of decay in our national life, the fact would be no sufficient pledge of permanence. The fall of nations has generally been as sudden as it was irretrievable, and the light has appeared to shine with the greatest splendour before being enveloped in night. Never were the poetry and the statuary of Greece more beautiful than at the time when Greek genius was about to sink into a state of paralysis from which it has not yet recovered. It was when the wisdom and valour of Rome had overpowered all nations, and when we might have expected a period of majestic repose and pacific achievement to succeed the long centuries of effort and turmoil, that the conquerors and lawmakers of the world grovelled into Sybarites and slaves. Appalled by a difficulty far more serious than Earl Russell imagines, the student of history is apt to turn from the survey of the past in hopelessness and dismay, and to exclaim, with Mr. Carlyle, "Alas! nothing will continue."

582 EARL RUSSELL ON THE MORAL ELEMENTS OF NATIONAL LIFE.

Lord Russell errs in classing the moral causes which contribute to national decline along with those of a general character. To make any practical progress in the inquiry, we must signalise the former as standing to the latter in the relation of a fountain to its streams. If a nation is morally sound, it is sound in all respects, but if this taproot of the national tree has been eaten, the strength fails from every branch and from every leaf. The lights of culture have often been the omens of national death; the Greeks of the lower empire were spinning philosophical theories, and prosecuting the various arts of loquacity, when the true life of the people was all but extinct; and Roman youth flocked to the universities of Greece and Egypt when the strength of the Roman Commonwealth was crumbling away. History, on the other hand, can point to no people which, while strong in faith, in reverence, in truthfulness, in chastity, in frugality, in the virtues of the temple and of the hearth, has sunk into atrophy and decline. We may decide, therefore, that, so long as moral energy fails not, the life of the nation will not fail; and the question of the permanence of Christi-civilisation will resolve itself into this prior question, whether Christian civilisation can guarantee moral soundness to nations.

It were unfair to apply to Earl Russell's discourse tests which it was not intended to bear; but we cannot help stating that it exhibits one defect which tends greatly to diminish its practical value. It presents religion to us in the abstract, the word being applied indifferently to that of the classic nations and to that which we know as Christians. But, for all practical purposes, the religion of Greece and Rome must be regarded as something essentially different from the Christian religion. Paganism did not retain its hold on the mind of nations, and the virtues over which it exercised a precarious guardianship were discarded along with it; but Paganism may have been so defective as to compel the advancing human mind to cast it away, and as to render this, whatever its results, a consummation not to be regretted. Let us set down briefly, and almost without comment, certain of those characteristics which mark out Christianity as pre-eminently fitted to secure the national life against the ravages of decay.

The principle of Christian virtue, in the first place, is fundamentally different from that of ancient ethics. Ancient virtue was based on pride; the root of Christian virtue is humility. This fundamental distinction might be traced in many particulars. Pride is self-asserting and aggressive—its law is conquest; humility is just, pacific, contented with its own—its law is growth. Pride courts display, and rejoices in the splendours of an artificial existence; humility loves what is simple, sinks at the lowly wells, reposes peacefully in the lap of nature. Hence that unvariable satisfaction with the beauties of the external world which has been an increasing characteristic of Christian nations. Hence, as Baron Humboldt, in his cosmos, partially acknowledges, the intimate connexion between Christianity and modern science. Hence, we venture to add, that wildness and distempered haste of speculation by which the Darwins, the Huxleys, the Pouchets, seem to vie in their physical researches with the metaphysical visionaries who brought speculation into repute during the last generation in Germany. Science has not yet shown that it can continue in health and growth apart from that religion which taught soon the grand lesson of his philosophy—to be humble and childlike in observing and interpreting nature. It is in its essential alliance with humility, also, that we have the secret of that kinship which has ever existed between Christianity and the household joys and virtues; and we may fearlessly lay down the proposition that, long as the home is sacred, the nation is safe.

In the second place, there is afforded by Christianity an outlet for all the healthful energy of the soul. Every one is aware how human activity was cramped under the systems of Paganism. All vocations, except one or two, were proscribed; the freeman deemed them unworthy of him, and they were left contemptuously to the slave. Christianity, we need hardly say, approves and honours every species of natural and upright industry, thus providing against the risk that any part of the national energies should be consumed with sloth, or should corrupt in indolence, or should be wasted in explosions of martial energy.

Thirdly, the Christian religion proclaims the brotherhood of mankind. There are some who, in these days of reckless assertion respecting the origin of the tribes and nations into which humanity is divided, might be tempted to disguise, or to explain away, the definite scriptural statement that the Almighty has made of one blood all men on the face of the earth. But the words are plain; and while we entertain perfect confidence that science, grown to maturity, will affirm their correctness, we have at present merely to call attention to the obvious fact, that they leave a margin for the utmost social and political development of which mankind can be even conceived to be capable. Christianity excludes no one from the sublime ambition of becoming like unto Christ, and every member of the race is thus started on a path of endless advancement.

Lastly, there is set forth in the Christian revelation, and hedged round with tremendous penalties, a faultless moral law. The benefit residing in a simple, comprehensive, and definite standard of duty, applicable at once to men and nations, like the ten commandments given by God on Mount Sinai, is incalculable. This is more than a general sympathy with, or commendation of, the household virtues. It is positive and precise enactment. A moment's reflection upon the confusion and debasement introduced by polytheism into every conception of moral duty—upon the repetition, often in magnified proportions, of all human vice in the synod of the gods—upon the bewilderment with which an inexperienced mind, inclined to virtue, must have turned from one to another among these celestial patrons of lust, of avarice, and of murder—will convince us of the infinite advantage—for the progress and prosperity of nations—of an exact moral code like that given by God to Moses.

These are, of course, but points of view from which the reader must survey for himself the wide field of evidence that Christianity, if faithfully accepted and earnestly obeyed, must preserve the life of nations. But we have no warrant either from Scripture or experience to affirm that nations cannot deprive themselves of the benefits of Christianity, and leave both it and the civilisation of which it is the life-breath behind. The Jews were once in possession of the true religion, but they are so no longer, and their ancient civilisation is one of the reminiscences of history. There is much in the present state of European society, there is much even among ourselves, to warn us that the moral soundness of our civilisation is in jeopardy. That simplicity of taste and feeling which is an invariable accompaniment of natural health is giving place to excitement, restlessness, inability to enjoy natural and temperate pleasures. There is a general lowering of the sense of responsibility to a Divine Power, a diffusion of worldliness in aim and temper, a return of the true pagan pride which makes man the centre of the universe and exalts him above God himself. Reverence and humility have been passing away; entertainment is regarded as the grand end of existence; in vast regions of French, German, and Italian territory, the theatre and opera have taken the place of the Christian temple, the novel has supplanted the Bible, godless toil for six days is followed up by godless amusement on the seventh, and universal triviality seems to be ushering in the dance of death. The nations are in a glow of intellectual enlightenment, but their hearts are cold; an atmosphere of feverish excitement broods over all lands; and feelings can be excited only by sensational stimulants. Such is a correct description of continental society; and although, owing to the reverence still subsisting in this country for God's Word, we are as yet very far from such a state of things, it is not too soon for us to take the alarm, and to recollect that it is righteousness, and righteousness alone, that exalteth nations. The religion of Christ is fitted to impart eternal freshness to civilisation, but the doom of nations will be only the more terrible if the Divine simplicity of its teaching is scorned. P. B.

THE LATE PASTOR FLIEDNER.

To those who have prayed with us, that it will please Almighty God to continue Pastor Fliedner's work on earth in the same spirit, the news may be welcome that his widow, who faithfully worked at his side for more than twenty-one years, as "Mother" of his Deaconesses, has been confirmed in her post of "Superintendent of the Kaiserwerth Deaconesses' Institution" by the committee in whose hands Pastor Fliedner had himself so wisely placed it (which committee consists of members, ecclesiastical and secular, of the Westphalian and Rhenish provinces); that his son-in-law, Pastor Disselhoff, has, in like manner, been appointed "Secretary" and member of the committee; and that his son by a former wife, George Fliedner, a young man ordained just before to rejoice his father's deathbed, has been appointed Madame Fliedner's personal assistant.

No wiser arrangement could possibly have been made, under their great loss. Yet never did the widow and the Institution more want our prayers. Quite latterly, and when Pastor Fliedner's work had spread beyond all human expectation, he was continually preaching, exhorting, teaching, mourning like Jeremiah, how little had been done. And he was not like so many who say, Go. He could say, Come, and work with us for God.

In everything, whether he had to refuse Deaconesses out of his small number institutions applying and imploring for them;—whether he had to reply to fellow workers, who almost reproached him for not sending them Deaconesses enough, "We have sent you more than we have received from you to train; we cannot make Deaconesses spring up out of the ground;"—whether he had, in the "Homes and Training Schools" for servant girls,* directed by his "Sisters" (for this was another of his works), to answer 1,600 applications for servants with 410 maids;—in all, his work was always the same, "The harvest truly is ready, but the labourers are few." In the midst of what others thought his success, his stirring voice was always heard saying, "See, the Roman Church has its thousands of thousands of Sisters of Charity, and all orders. We have but a few hundreds. No more zealous proselytisers are there than these orders. And will you, the maidens of our Church, remain like idle spectators—you who might labour with equal zeal and greater light?"

And what but this have we to say in England? There is such a chattering and noise here about "fields" wanted for women's work. Yet every training institution with one voice tells the contrary tale; of applications innumerable of trained women to fill responsible posts, of few to fill them, of living materials wanted, situations and "fields" being never wanting, of workers needed, not work.

This was all Pastor Fliedner's "lamentation." After having done so much, he said, "How little! a few hundreds, that is all." Perhaps his life and death may arouse us to do a little more.

The Sunday but one before his death, when two of his sons, after their confirmation (he had meant to have confirmed them himself, but he was dying then), came to him in his room, he rose and stood up, though he could scarcely move for dropsy, and opening his arms so as to clasp them both, he cried, "Welcome, fellow-communionists! welcome, fellow-combatants!"

When, on the very morning of his death, at half-past eight, the sister-superintendent of the hospital came in to see him, he said to her, "I ought to be ashamed of myself before you all, that here I am at half-past eight not up; but I am weary."

The poor, the noble widow, herself the very life and soul of the Institution, but with seven young children (the three older children of Pastor Fliedner are of a former life), with suffering health, and worn with over-work, wished to look upon her husband's departure from the earthly part of it as the signal that she was no longer needed by God to superintend it. But the day before his death, her husband spoke to her with all his own incisive word: "God will himself show you how long you have to work. But I wish that you may continue at it many years after me." And to his seven sons he said, as they all stood round him, "If you could all be ministers God's Word, I should like it. But He will show you your way." So strong was the spirit of his Master to the very last gasp in this good servant of God.

* Three thousand maids were received in nine years in one house of this kind. The Deaconesses visit them when sent out in their places, and receive their visits on Sundays at the Homes."

No one who knew him in his work but would have said, "This shows me what a prophet of old was like!" No one who knew him in his death but would say, "My father! my father! the chariot of Israel and the horsemen thereof!" For never, surely, were the inspired words so applicable to any man of these days.*

FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE.

London, November 21, 1864.

Foreign Intelligence.

FRANCE.

—, France, November, 1864.

PIUS IX. ON RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

While the intelligent friends of the Papacy, such as Count de Montalembert and others, counsel the Roman Court to make some concessions to the principles of modern society, Pius IX. and his Ministers persist in avowing the most antiquated and shocking maxims, as if, in their blindness of heart, they were compelled to precipitate themselves into an abyss.

Here is a new example of these strange aberrations. Count Duval de Beaulieu, hitherto unknown in the religious and literary world, has published a book entitled, Error Free in the Free State. This is the counterpart of the celebrated principle of Count Cavour, The Free Church in the Free State. The superstitious and aristocratic author indites a long philippic against the rights of conscience and religious liberty, and reproduces all the odious sophisms employed by the inquisitors of the middle ages.

This book, which is distinguished neither by the substance of its contents, nor the form in which they are presented, is quite undeserving of notice. But Pius IX. has eagerly seized the opportunity to express his real sentiments. He has dictated to a certain Francis Mercurelli, his secretary for Latin correspondence, a letter to the author, praising and congratulating him. He thanks him warmly for having maintained the immutable principles of Rome.

Among the ideas put forth in this letter are some which are really curious. Thus, Pius IX. says, in positive terms, "Freedom for error is oppression of the Church." That is clear. In England, for instance, error is free, since Protestants of all denominations have the right to celebrate their worship; consequently, the [Roman Catholic] Church is oppressed; and if the English Papists persist with this state of things, it is because they are not strong enough to overthrow it. This is the spirit and system of Pius IX.

Further on in the same letter the Pope says that Governments ought to submit to the decisions of the Holy See, not only in those which concern religion and morals, but in the institutions and government of society. And why? Because civil rulers owe obedience to the laws of justice and honor, and those laws are taught by the [Roman] Church, which is the interpreter of Scripture! Admirable arguments, in view of which kings and legislative assemblies should demand the sanction of the Pontiff for all their acts, without exception! Pope ought, in this way, to be the legislator and the supreme dictator of the entire world.

I shall not dwell upon such pretensions, as they are unworthy of being seriously refuted. But it is not superfluous, perhaps, to show, by official testimony, what are the views which still prevail at Rome. From the time of Thomas Aquinas the Popes have not learned nor forgotten anything.

PASTORAL OF THE BISHOP OF NISMES ON THE CONVENTION OF SEPTEMBER 15

The new Franco-Italian treaty, which I examined in my last letter, continues the subject of the most exciting dispute. Everybody perceives that this is the event of the present moment. In France we have the two Governments of France

* [Some additional interesting details of the last hours of Pastor Fliedner, from the pen of a Frankfort correspondent, will be found in a subsequent page.]

Italy enveloped their convention in diplomatic drapery, and promised to maintain the strictest neutrality with respect to the Papacy. The Jesuits, the priests, and their followers, see clearly what will be the issue of this affair, and proclaim beforehand an overwhelming catastrophe.

At Rome, as you are aware, the watchword for Pope and cardinals is silence, passivity, inaction. They refuse to give their opinion upon the treaty; they reply neither yes nor no to all the communications of our ambassador, and take no precautionary measures in view of future contingencies. They only say, with systematic apathy, that those contingencies will be provided for by God: this is little less than the fatalism of the Mussulmans.

But if the Supreme Pontiff thinks proper to be silent, it is not thus in the ranks of the French bishops. These prelates have been moved, in all probability, to get up an agitation, in order to intimidate the Imperial Government; and they obediently do their work.

I may mention, among others, M. Plantier, Bishop of Nismes. He is a pugnacious man, always ready to mount the breach, pouring upon his opponents the most abusive epithets, and imagining that he is forcible in proportion as he is violent. He has more than once cast bitter invectives at the Protestants of his diocese. Now he employs his vocabulary of vituperation against the Italians and the liberal writers.

M. Plantier compares the political journalists who defend the treaty of September 15 to venomous flies, whose sting is most dangerous on a stormy day. He accuses them of giving coward advice, of expressing perfidious wishes, and assuming a hypocritical sorrow, and of employing murderous language, which would kill religion, under the pretext of serving it the better. The Bishop of Nismes, you see, has not acquired habits of civility.

What makes Bishop Plantier especially indignant is the opinion entertained by certain publicists that the Pope ought to become reconciled with Italy. How? replies the ardent prelate, in substance. A reconciliation of the Pope with Italy, that is to say, of an honest man with thieves, of the victim with his executioner! The Italians have acted like barbarous companions of Attila; they are depredators, wretches, wicked men, who have committed all sorts of immoralities, robberies, and infamous deeds; and Pius IX., the just, the holy, must go to meet them, and propose terms of friendship! Did Caiaphas and Pilate request Christ to be reconciled with the Scribes, the Pharisees, and the populace, who were thirsting for his blood? No, the Jewish Pontiff and the Roman Governor at least spared the Saviour so base a proposition as that. And yet our modern Pilates dare to persuade the great Pope and martyr Pius IX. to become reconciled to the Italians! Such is the singular logic of the Bishop of Nismes.

Throughout his pastoral, M. Plantier dwells on the same idea; he compares, he identifies, in some sort, Pius IX. with Christ. Thus, for instance, the Pope is enduring, at the present time, our Lord's passion and sufferings; he is making the painful ascent of Calvary, bearing his cross, and so forth. Is it possible to institute a more false and profane comparison?

The prelate concludes by saying, that if the Italians come before the Pontiff, confessing their crimes, and promising to make reparation for them, Pius IX., in his exhaustless clemency, will be willing to pardon them, as Jesus Christ forgave His persecutors. This, according to M. Plantier, is the only possible way in which the Papacy and Italy can become reconciled!

What does a letter of this kind prove? A serious and melancholy fact—namely, that many Romish bishops have not the most rudimentary idea of the views, the wants, the men, and the events of the present age.

The Jesuit journals published in Paris—among others the Monde—display more address than M. Plantier, and preserve a little more moderation. They fear that by going further than they do, they might incur the penalties inflicted for violating the laws which regulate the press, and might excite universal derision among the liberals.

The tactics of these Ultramontane journals is to excite the apprehensions of Napoleon III. and his advisers, by making the most ominous predictions. "What will happen," say they, "if the French troops evacuate Rome? The revolutionists will carry into execution their conspiracies against the Papacy. The Pontifical throne will be overturned. Pius IX. will be compelled to go into exile." And then? "Then," add these prophets of Jesuitism, "every crown will be in danger; piety, truth, law, order, justice, everything by which human society is maintained, will be shaken, and the world will fall into chaos!"

There are good people who believe these predictions. The members of aristocratic families on the one hand, the ignorant peasants on the other, and above all a host of superstitious women, suffer themselves to be led away by this phantom ; and their false alarms, kept up by thousands of priests and monks, in the confessionals, in private conversation, and in pamphlets by the clerical faction, produce real agitation. I do not believe that there would be any attempt at insurrection in France, even though the Pope should be compelled to abandon his temporal power, and to quit Rome. But it is certain that such an event, if it were accompanied by a sentence of excommunication against those by whom it was brought about, would produce strong emotion among a great portion of the French people, and would expose the Emperor's throne to very serious peril.

This explains why Napoleon III. is so circumspect in his despatches, and studiously disclaims, beforehand, the responsibility of what may happen in Italy after the departure of the French troops. At the bottom of his heart he has little sympathy with the Pope in his attempt to retain his temporal power ; but, for his own security, it is requisite that he should bring into play the most subtle expedients.

NATIONAL EVANGELICAL CONFERENCE OF THE SOUTH.

I mentioned, in my last letter (p. 538), the National Evangelical Conferences which were to take place at Alais, in the south of France, on the 19th and 20th of October. I have indicated their spirit, character, and object. I am now able to give some details of what occurred at these memorable meetings.

About 170 pastors, elders, and deacons were present. Doubtless there existed among them some diversities of belief and doctrinal sentiment. In the present condition of human nature, this is inevitable ; it is even good, provided these diversities are confined within certain limits. Not a single Protestant asks for the complete and mechanical uniformity of the Romish clergy. But after admitting the existence of these minor diversities, it affords us pleasure to be able to add, that the members of the Evangelical Conference of Alais were perfectly agreed upon leading points. So, after some discussion, which had reference to the form in which the declaration should be drawn, rather than to the essence of doctrine, the Conference adopted, unanimously, a resolution in which are affirmed the following truths :—

1. Belief in a supernatural revelation from God, contained in the books of the Old and New Testaments, and summed up in the Apostles' Creed.

2. Belief in our Lord and Saviour Christ as true God and true man.

3. The necessity for adherence, in order to certain settled doctrines, in order to constitute a Church.

4. The right and the duty of the Church to share in whatever touches the interests of the Church.

These are the essential questions which we are maintaining against the negative school. It was required to affirm the reality of the supernatural, the divinity of Christ, the necessary confession of faith, and the rights of the Church in the French Protestant communion.

The spirit which pervaded the Conference was cheering and edifying. No violent disputes, as in other conferences of this kind ; but the desire to labour for the advancement of the kingdom of God, the hearty heart with heart, the love of the true, the good, and the evidence of a sincere desire to re-establish peace and order in the churches.

It is an interesting question to ask what will be the effects of the Evangelical Conference of Alais.

First, those who took part in its proceedings, and the entire body of the faithful at Alais, have felt themselves confirmed in their faith. They have seen and heard, and proved to them, in the most convincing manner, that sound doctrine still abounds among us numerous and valiant champions.

Secondly, this Conference has furnished a most direct reply to the assertion of the Rationalists, who pretended that a South of France had ranged themselves under their standard. No, that is false. Protestants of the southern provinces and laymen, continue, to a large extent, professing the faith of their fathers. Doubtless, in this part of our country elsewhere, there are many infidel thinkers, and indifferentists ; but they are not wanting faithful friends of the faith, and the mass of the population, we have the right to assert, are with the Orthodox rather than with the Radical Protestants.

Thirdly, the Evangelical Conference of Alais is a striking proof that Evangelicals are resolved to resist, by all legitimate means, the blighting influence of the negative school. The time for compromises and half-measures is past. The Rationalists must now see that the Orthodox can no longer be a common cause with them. There is no longer any openly-avowed division. Let the Rationalists establish their own association.

special conferences, if they can; but the friends of the Gospel will convene also their particular assemblies, and French Protestantism will judge on which side are the essential bases of the Gospel and the Church.

Lastly, the laity, who have been too much accustomed to leave to the pastoral body the care and the power of regulating everything, will better understand what are their rights in our ecclesiastical society, and will show more energy in exercising them. The great body of the laity will certainly not follow the Radicals whither these would lead them.

GREAT ACTIVITY OF THE OPPONENTS OF ORTHODOXY.

The month of January approaches. It is the period when the half of our presbyterial councils and our consistories have to undergo re-election by parochial suffrage. Never, since our laws granted to every Protestant of thirty years of age the right to vote, has our situation been so critical. The struggle will call forth a great display of feeling, especially in Paris, because there the question has to be decided whether or not M. Athanase Coquerel, jun., is to re-enter the pulpit.

So the Rationalists neglect no means, and spare no pains, to obtain a majority. They have numerous agents, who visit every family, addressing each individual, even the most unbelieving, and exhort them in the name of Liberty, toleration, and charity, and other sonorous words, to vote against the Orthodox candidates for the Presbyterial Council.

Moreover, they have established a new journal, entitled The Liberal Protestant. This weekly paper is specially intended to influence the electors, and is sent gratuitously to all the Protestants of Paris. The conductors of this journal are not well acquainted with doctrinal or ecclesiastical matters; much of what they write is false or frivolous. But what matters? The majority of the public to whom they address themselves are but ill-informed upon our religious affairs, and the Liberal Protestant does its work. The men of Evangelical principles, on the other hand, are not asleep: they are praying and working. Let us wait and hope.

DEATH OF PASTOR VERMEIL.

A word, in conclusion, upon a fresh loss sustained by French Protestantism. M. Vermeil, in his younger days one of the pastors of Bordeaux, and afterwards of Paris, has recently died, at the age of sixty-five. He was a remarkable man and an eminent preacher. He adhered to and maintained the doctrines of our fathers, though he generally abstained from taking part in our doctrinal disputes. M. Vermeil particularly distinguished himself by the establishment of the Deaconesses' House, in Paris. Animated by the same piety and in the same devoted spirit, he did in France what Pastor Fliedner did in Germany. X. X. X.

ITALY.

(From our Italian Correspondent.)

THE IMPENDING FATE OF THE PAPAL SOVEREIGNTY.

The Franco-Italian Convention, stipulating the withdrawal of foreign troops from Rome within two years, and the application of the principle of non-intervention on the part of foreign Powers in regard to the future of the Eternal City, is still the question of the day. It is no easy matter to wade through the utterances of Ministers, the orations of Parliament men, and the criticisms of newspaper friends and foes—so voluminous is the literature on the subject. The Pope alone has reserved silence, and bides his time. There are some men who pretend to have discovered a secret purpose, but they are not agreed as to what it is. One party informs us that the postumus colours have been nailed to the masthead, in the confident assurance that, though the bark of St. Peter may encounter heavy seas, the protection of Heaven forbids the thought of shipwreck. Another coterie gives out, on the best authority, that the Roman hierarchy has had its final and definitive reply from Austria and Spain; that these two Powers assert their inability to aid the Papacy with material force; and that the Papal conclave, bent upon an arrangement with the young kingdom of Italy, is now busy discussing the questions, What shall we do with a free press, with unfettered public instruction, and with liberty of conscience?

The French Government is responsible for all the ambiguity surrounding the interpretation of the treaty. Whether this ambiguity is culpable or simply clever, whether it bodes good or ill for Italy, whether it is only meant to quiet the apprehensions of a powerful clerical faction, or to cheat the hopes of the lovers of constitutional government, is a mystery which the Sphinx of the Tuileries alone can unriddle. Even on the lower ground of policy, it is supposed by many that Napoleon III. himself, who was urged to this line of action from the fearful consequences anticipated in Rome on the death of the ailing Pope, and strove to alter his tactics when his Holiness's health improved, is but yielding to the pressure of circumstances, and trusting the future of the measure to the chapter of accidents.

No Christian mind, on the loftier ground of God's governorship among the nations, can fail to ponder over the striking fact that the present ruler of France, with all his inscrutable diplomacy, personal ambition, and subserviency of thought and motive to dynastic aims, is only the menial of a higher power, for the accomplishment of purposes which he does not and cannot understand. After all the explanations which have been given on every hand of this celebrated convention, and which have only made confusion more confounded, we are led to the belief that no one knows whereunto this matter will grow, or what issues may possibly result from it. To a large extent, we must go forward to the time of its promised execution in the dark. We share, of course, in the general hopefulness of Italian and European statesmen, writers, and peoples.

PUBLIC OPINION.

The Italian Parliament, by a majority of five to one, has approved of the treaty, by voting the transference of the capital to Florence. The universal feeling of the people of Italy is that it is at least a great step in advance. Nothing could be worse than the stand-still treatment by France, during the last two years, of the Roman question, touching which their expectations have been on tiptoe. The walls of Florence and other towns are already covered with "ROMA, 1866." And the inhabitants of Rome have shown by a similar device how they understood the treaty. Some weeks ago, the Roman police, who tremble at a shadow or a chalk outline of Garibaldi or Victor Emmanuel's head, were startled by finding at the corner of every street the figures 730. The cabalistic numbers were carefully sponged out, and many a serious question was put as to what they meant. Next morning the city walls everywhere bore, as plainly written as the day before, 729. Again, and hastily, the wash was applied, but no one seemed the wiser, till, on the third day, the figures 728 showed that the time of the French occupation was being counted, and that the days of the temporal power were numbered.

It is also worthy of recollection, that Napoleon, shortly after he became Emperor, assured Tommaseo, then the deputy in of Manin and the Venetian Republic, that he considered one part of his mission to destroy the temporal power of the Pope. In the memoirs of Odillon Barrot, the Foreign Minister, it is recorded that Napoleon some time afterwards wrote to the Pope in exile at Gaeta, and without consulting him proposing to set up, on a purely temporal basis, the Papal power. In 1852, then, through the agency of Montalembert, the Emperor false, by proposing an unacceptable condition to his placing the crown of France on the Imperial head. At that time, each successive offer of money on the part of France, as with the Sicilian books, has contained fewer advantages and greater sacrifices for the Papacy, until the stern proposal is, Do or Die—accept or free Italy or quit the city of Rome.

INCREASING UNPOPULARITY OF THE PAPACY.

This historical survey seems to strengthen our belief that France will not fail to keep her promise, when her honour has pledged for its fulfilment. Two years is a long time to more persons than the impetuous Garibaldi; but while, on the one hand, all the resources of Jesuitry are brought to bear on the Emperor, to his plan and hinder his purpose, the gain which counterbalances this disadvantage is the opportunity for discussion and maturing of Italian opinion on the matter of the Papacy. More than once have I seen in the growing enlightenment of the people the characteristics of Roman Catholicism. There is presently, in connexion with these exciting questions involved in the question, a perfect shower of pamphlets, a more or less indicative of advancing liberal treatment of Papal principles. Independent press is now so active, that the Pope acknowledged the Index Expurgatorius company in Rome incapable of keeping pace with the day or stemming the torrent of obnoxious public opinion, and has thus delegated supreme anathema power to the bishops in regard to the public prints of their respective dioceses.

Among the pamphlets of note I would note "Abbasso la Tiara" (Down with the Crown), which deals like a sledge-hammer with the temporal power of the Pope, still more remarkable effusion, which appeared in the form of leading article in the Perseveranza, the most influombardy, is "La Questione Religiosa" (The Religious Question in Italy). The author, Signor Gabelli, gives a full and complete account of the principles and operations of all the religious parties in Italy—the Catholics, who strive after a "Free Church and Free State," according to Cavour's maxim; the Liberals, who aim at a reformed Church within its own pale; the Evangelical party, who desire a true reformation in discipline, worship, and doctrine; the difficulties on the part of the Papacy in the way of doing so; and the impossibility, from heretofore, of the success of such efforts. He evidently points his finger to the Bible, to the forsaking of Rome, to the establishment of a Christian leadership and an enlightened nation, of a pure scriptural Church.

GABELLI ON PRIESTCRAFT.

A noble letter of General Garibaldi to the women of Genoa, who asked the president of their Mutual Help and Society, is telling for good over all.

He is so delighted to see these citizens separating themselves from priestly domination, he opens fire upon the priests as the foes of this country:—

"The priests will say, [he continues] 'But what good priests?' My reply is, these are the others, for they cause the whole country to be polluted. A priest, to be good, must do without the unfriendly robe he wears. He is sheltered by brigandage in more than Italy. That robe is the covering of our every foe. That robe is the guide and vanguard of every evil that ever invaded our soil. The worthies who are opposing Italian progress will tell you between the temporal power and the spiritual, to put down, and the spiritual, to respect! The spiritual power!

Of Antonelli, of Chiavone, of the spiritual power should be that is into the presence of the Eternal; present yourselves before God with as many as these!

They are by not only accepting the present association, but offering to keep out the place of their meeting for such noble purposes, if they will only confer the honour upon him. This letter decided Padre Pantaleo, Garibaldi's chaplain, to renounce the priestly robe for ever.

FACTS FROM FLORENCE, LORETTO, ETC.

The Nazione, too, the leading journal of Tuscany, counsels, in articles of remarkable ability, the Pope to withdraw from all secular concerns, otherwise the wise and liberal clergy must cease to agitate in the dark, and take refuge in equivocation, by heading the masses of the people in religious reform. This same influential broad sheet, so tender but a year or two ago of vested interests, so bitter against Evangelical truth, yea, of the mooted of a religious question at all in connexion with the freedom of Italy, spoke out the other day an indignant protest against the agents of the Government who were sent to provide accommodation in Florence for the various State offices removing from Turin. The reactionary bigots in Florence exercised so much influence over these agents, that they induced them to spare the convents and monasteries, and lay out the public money on the purchase of expensive palaces. The outspoken newspaper was supported by the Florentine public, who got up huge petitions to the municipality and Government, by all means to root up these conventual nests of idleness, ignorance, and vice.

The public of Loretto, a town which I had lately occasion to call the Ephesus of Italy, owing to its superstitious worship of the Madonna shrine, has also been so roused of late by the misdeeds of the Sisters of the Sacred Heart, that 750 signatures of the most worthy citizens have been adhibited to petitions begging the Government to suppress these conventual schools, in which, under the cover of charity, the young are trained in disloyalty and evil habits.

These are a few evidences out of many that the public mind is excited on the vital question for Italy at the present moment, the probable future relationship of the Papacy to freedom and a united Italy.

GERMANY.

Frankfort, November 15, 1864.

SPECT OF POLITICAL AFFAIRS.

It is said that the peace lately signed has given no one peace: neither the spoiled and exhausted, nor the rich know not to whom they wish which are not at all consulted as to how they are to be disposed of, though they alone have the right to decide that question; nor the Germanic Confederation, whose rights over Holstein are not even mentioned in the treaty, and whose political influence is nullified; nor Austria, who perceives, somewhat tardily, that she has been used as a cat's paw to draw the chesnuts from the fire, and who has had to part with her Premier, in order to leave to him the sole responsibility of accomplished facts; nor even Prussia, if we understand thereby the immense majority of the nation, which sees its aspirations farther than ever from being realised, on account of the renewed ascendancy which Count von Bismark has secured by his victories. It is the Minister and his party only who have achieved a triumph. It is true that in the midst of his successes he will soon have an account to settle with the Parliament—a financial account for immense expenses which have not been voted, and a political account for the unconstitutional principles which he has put in practice. It is in vain that the reassembling of the Chambers is delayed as long as possible; he must come to that at last, and find himself in their presence in the same position as before the war. At one and the same time, the Prussian Parliament and the Germanic Diet will have to be brought into harmony. This last will perhaps show a little more energy, now that, on the one hand, the Cabinet at Vienna appears disposed to maintain the rights of the Confederation, and that, on the other, the first of the states of the second rank, Bavaria, has referred the direction of its affairs to a man whose character and patriotism will not disappoint Germany, Herr von der Pfordten. Be that as it may, it is clear that German politics are still the same after as before the war—in the same fogs, from which they do not seem at all ready to emerge. Here, as at the beginning of things, and as ever, there is nothing but the mighty voice of God which can pronounce the fiat lux—let there be light—which produces life at the same time as light.

DR. BAUMGARTEN AT KIEL.

We spoke just now of the Duchies of Schleswig-Holstein. There has lately occurred there an event which may serve to furnish evidence of the spirit in which they are administered by their Provisional Government. Dr. Baumgarten, the same who has for several years undergone unjust persecutions which have made the small country of Mecklenburg so sadly celebrated, has wished to avail himself of the enfranchisement of Holstein, his native land, in order to return to the country of his birth and to become professor of theology at the University of Kiel. A citizen of the province, and a man of learning and of piety, whose character has only improved amid the conflicts which he has sustained against religious despotism, it might have been expected that he would have been received with open arms at the university of his country, to which he was invited, and where everything indicated that it was his proper place. It has not been so. The civil commissioners in Holstein have interdicted his lectures. The clergy of Holstein have addressed a petition to the commissioners, praying them not to interfere with the lectures of Professor Baumgarten: "not only in order that a sincere and distinguished man may be protected in a place rightly obtained, but to dispel at once the suspicion already abroad among us, that there is an intention to favour us with the principles of Mecklenburg, from which may God preserve us by His grace!" It has been all in vain: we have not yet learned that the accomplished professor has been authorised to commence his course. If the Duchies are to be, for any long time to come, governed in this spirit, it was scarcely worth the trouble to free them from the Danish domination.

THE ROMAN CATHOLICS IN THE RHENISH PROVINCES.

The Roman Catholic world in the Rhenish Provinces is now subject to a somewhat lively agitation. On the one hand, the Bishop of Paderborn has recently published, in the form of a pastoral addressed to the Protestants of Germany, and particularly to those of his own diocese, a book of considerable size, wherein he reproduces all the old arguments urged by Romish controversialists against the Reformation. Moderate enough in form, the Bishop shows himself to be supremely unjust in most of his notions, and pretends to nothing less than to be the legitimate bishop of all the Protestants in his diocese—wandering sheep, but which belong to him, and which he hopes to gather again into his fold. So far, all this would be harmless enough. But the falsehood and injustice of a large number of his accusations against the men and the things of our time, in the Protestant Church, have provoked a hot controversy, in which whole ecclesiastical bodies take part by their protests or their refutations. The political press has got mixed up in the discussion, which has become general, and still continues.

On the other hand, the Archbishop of Cologne having recently died, the serious question of his successorship has set in motion the Roman Catholic inhabitants of these provinces. Cologne is the Rome of Western Germany. Strong in its flourishing industry, proud of its great river, and yet more so of its incomparable cathedral, which is reflected by the waters, this city gives to the archiepiscopal an immense influence, supported by a zealous clergy, and by a population which is prone even to superstition. The public voice allows that the late Archbishop, Dr. Geissel, was endowed with dignity in his ministry, was a man of learning and of an irreproachable private life; but it charges him with having done nothing in favour of those reforms which the German spirit demands of the Church, but, on the contrary, with having favoured the proceedings of the Jesuits, increased the servitude of the inferior clergy, and, in a word, with having left the Church under the complete sway of Ultramontanism. Whom will he be succeeded? This is the exciting question which disturbs men's minds, and the solution of which is placed almost exclusively in the hands of the Government of Prussia. If we may believe the public papers, one of the prelates who has the chance of ascending to this high dignity is the Baron von Kettler, Bishop of Mentz, the zealous champion of the most absolute Catholicism, an old cavalry officer, who brings to the exercise of his functions the habits of military discipline, but to whom no one can deny the possession of deep and ardent piety. They talk again of that same Bishop of Paderborn, Dr. Martin, whom we have mentioned already, in reference to his controversial tendencies. Finally, they talk of the Prince of Hohenlohe, who resides at Rome, and fills some office in connexion with the Holy See. Not one of these names promises the Catholic Church in Germany its emancipation from Ultramontanism.

THE DEATH OF DR. FLIEDNER.

In the last number of Evangelical Christendom you gave to your readers a communication signed by a hand which is venerated and loved by all the Church of God—that of Florence Nightingale—respecting Dr. Fliedner, of Kaiserswerth, whom God has recently removed to his rest. I have not the idea of adding anything to this excellent notice, in relation to the immense labours of this faithful servant of God. But I have no doubt that a few additional details concerning his moments will interest and edify many of your readers.

On Sunday, the 11th of last September, there took place at Kaiserswerth the annual festival of the institution, amid a very numerous assemblage of friends and of deaconesses, coming from different quarters to be present on that occasion. Although reduced to a very feeble condition by a long illness, which especially rendered his breathing painful, Pastor Fliedner wished once more to speak in that assembly, and, above all, to implore the blessing of God upon the new Deaconesses who were going to enter on the field of their labour, to the number of nineteen. The short but striking words which he uttered, his fatherly counsels, his pressing exhortations to the Deaconesses to engage them to abide faithful and devoted in their work—none of all these things will be forgotten by those who heard him. After these religious services, and a second meeting in the large hall, where he again took part for some minutes with all his wonted serenity of spirit, he withdrew to his residence completely exhausted. The following Wednesday his morning was entirely occupied in taking leave of the Deaconesses who were departing in different directions. He wished again to address to each one a word of advice. These exertions exceeded his strength. On Thursday morning, the 15th of September, his medical attendant advised him to retire at once to the privacy of Salem, where he had passed some weeks in summer, and had gained strength. Thither he went, accompanied by his wife and the two youngest of his sons, and spent some days there, during which he found rest, but not strength. He there took very particular interest in the recitals of the Deaconesses who had been nursing the wounded in the lazarettos of Schleswig. The night of Saturday to Sunday was spent without sleep, and at five o'clock in the morning he urgently requested to be taken back to Kaiserswerth, which was done. "Nothing is needful," said he to his wife, as he laid himself in the bed, "nothing is needful, but to be a child of God, received into favour." On Monday morning his absent children were summoned by telegraph. "Do you not," said he to his daughter, who had just come into his presence, "do you not ask of God to give me a peaceful end, if it pleases Him to call me very soon home?" And, seeing that this idea made the tears to fall from those about him, he added, quoting the words of a German hymn, "My only desire is this—

See a poor sinner who desires
By thy ransom to be saved."

During the night of Tuesday to Wednesday his ten children were all gathered under his roof. In the morning he called them, had them all ranged in a half circle, according to their age, around his armchair, and requested them to sing him a hymn, whilst his looks were radiant with joy as he saw himself thus surrounded with those he loved. Several days thus passed over amid the kind attentions of his family, and with an activity of mind which never left him to the last moment, dictating letters, thinking of everything, and encouraging those about him by his calmness and his affectionate demeanour. One day, when his two sons had brought him into the garden in his armchair, his breathing was very much oppressed, and he cried with energy, "The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth" (Exod. xxxiv. 6). During these days his family and friends indulged in the hope of a restoration. He himself did not expect it. On the 25th of September he had afresh the happiness to see two of his sons confirmed, and to take the Lord's Supper with them and the rest of the family. After this, his weakness visibly increased. He felt his end approaching, and made it known by some expressions. His soul enjoyed sweet peace, and he felt himself particularly refreshed by the thought that many were praying for him. "Oh, that sweet communion of souls!" he said, one day after a meeting for prayer.

So came the 3rd of October, the eve of his removal. Three of his sons had to set out for the school at Gütersloh. At eight o'clock he gathered them into his chamber, to take leave of them and of all. He spoke with a feeble voice, and slowly, but distinctly. (What he said specially concerning his family is here omitted.) "According to all appearance," said he, "this is the last time that I shall see you gathered around me, for I feel that I am constantly growing weaker. Do not let us deceive ourselves, for the moment is drawing nigh for me to enter into a blessed eternity. It is a serious and solemn moment. When I look back upon my life, how many subjects are there for gratitude and praise! Oh that every pulsation of the heart and every respiration were in effect a praise! How happy we are to serve such a Master, who pardons our sins, yea, who has abundantly pardoned all mine! 'The blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth us from all sin.' That is my only hope. But one thing is needful; to be saved—to enter in at the strait gate. We shall meet again above: there is eternal joy, and eternal praise. Pray for me, who have so many sins, that I may obtain grace and mercy; that God may vouchsafe unto me to depart in peace; and that I may lay down my head in the dust with firm confidence in Him who is merciful."

After having given his benediction to his children and grandchildren, he went on:

"To all my fellow-workmen and fellow-work-women a salutation of peace in the name of the Lord, who is wonderful in counsel and excellent in working. My thanks to all the friends of the work; to all its benefactors down to the very smallest children who collect contributions. The Lord will be their recompense. In particular, my thanks and my blessing to all my spiritual daughters, for their love, their obedience, and the confidence they have testified towards me. May God bless them—their and their labours, far and nigh! May He be their Friend and the Strength in battle! May God bless the King and his house, and may He fill him with His Spirit! May the Lord bless the Church! Oh, consider it as a special privilege to serve the Lord in it. May God extend His kingdom, and soon cast down Satan under our feet. Jehovah is with us. Oh how sweet it is to serve Him who has taken away our sins! What should we be without Him!"

His three sons, who had very shortly leave the house, went down upon their knees before him, and he blessed them, and repeated aloud over each one of them the word—"Peace!" He then fell back exhausted into his armchair. He felt this separation very deeply, and sighed, "Lord God, mighty God, be my consolation!" adding, in a low voice, "there is no more healing for me. But very soon peace came back to his troubled heart, and he calmly exclaimed, "Sweet Jesus!" whereupon he fell into a slumber: some hours. In the course of this last day he had sundry moments of quiet, and even activity and of pleasant joy, on hearing some hymns sung by his family and his faithful Deaconesses. The same evening his wife read to him the 90th Psalm. "How precious the Word is!" cried he. "The cross is good," added, "although it might do harm." He very soon asked again for the singing of a hymn in which are these words:—

Only yet a little courage.

And as those who were present did not for a while find the tune, he himself raised the first notes. Every one had at heart the memory of Jacob's words: "This is none other but the house of God, and this is the gate to heaven." Feeling his soul refreshed by the beautiful and pious hymns, he asked for the one which begins with the words:—

Where finds the soul its native land and rest!

During the night he experienced some delirium, caused by his weakness. His mind was absorbed with the thought of separation and his wife heard him say to her, "Poor widow!" With the return of day, calmness was fully restored to his soul. When some one offered a prayer before him, he repeated "Amen!" and added with a distinct voice, "Conqueror of death! Conqueror!" His wife having reminded him of that beautiful saying in the 23rd Psalm, "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me," he distinctly answered, "Oh, yes!"

At eleven o'clock the entire community of the institution met together in the Church to ask of God, on behalf of His servant, a tranquil and blessed deliverance. In fact, his end drew nigh. All was calmness and peace around the dying, and upon the features of his countenance. It was near two o'clock when his breathing ceased. The faithful servant had entered into the joy of his Lord. Those who remained could only repeat amid their tears, "Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ."

TURKEY.

Constantinople, November 5, 1864.

THE FATE OF AHMED OF CÆSAREA.

The converted Turk whose case I reported at length in my last letter was exiled a few days later to Rodosto, under the following circumstances: A week after the attempt, which I then reported, to induce him to go back to Cæsarea as a Government official, he was again summoned before the Pasha, and informed that he might go either to Smyrna, Adrianople, or Rodosto for two months. "Suppose I do not consent to go to either place, what then?" he asked. "Then you must remain in prison here." "Is there no other alternative?" he said. "None," was the reply. "In that case I will go to Rodosto," he said. So he was sent to Rodosto, and Aali Pasha officially informed all the Protestant Embassies that Ahmed had been set at liberty, but had gone, of his own free will (!), for awhile to Rodosto. It is due to the Government, however, to say that, while they have refused to do anything for the families of these exiled Christian Turks, they did give to Ahmed when he was sent away 25. 5s. in cash.

At Rodosto, Ahmed was received into the family of the Armenian Protestant pastor there, and until Monday last was unmolested by the Government. On that day, a telegram was received from the pastor, saying that Ahmed had been again thrown into prison, and begging that efforts might immediately be made for his release. The telegram was enclosed to the British Embassy, and Mr. Stuart, the Chargé d'Affaires, was requested to act in his behalf.

The reply to this note forms, in every respect, such a decided contrast to past communications, that, although we cannot judge fully of the results until more particulars are received, I give it in full. It certainly affords promise of better days to come:—

Therapia, November 3, 1864.

Sir,—Mr. E. Pisarie, whom I sent to the Porte yesterday, immediately after receiving your letter informing me of the arrest of Ahmed Agha at Rodosto, has reported to me that the Grand Vizier was as much surprised as I had been on hearing of that event, and that his Highness telegraphed at once to the Calimacam of Rodosto to set Ahmed immediately at liberty, and to explain the cause of his apprehension. His Highness has also telegraphed to the Governor of Adrianople, desiring that functionary to afford all due protection to Ahmed Agha, and not to molest him in any way in the event of his going to Adrianople.—I am, Sir, &c., WILLIAM STUART.

Rev. George Washburn, Pera.

A letter received to-day from the pastor at Rodosto gives the particulars of his arrest. During his stay there Ahmed had conversed freely, but in the most discreet manner, with such Turks and Christians as he met, and it finally came to the ears of the Governor that a converted Turk was in the city. He sent officers and immediately arrested him. On his appearance before him he demanded his name, his nationality, his business, &c. He refused to believe Ahmed's statement, that he had been sent there by the Government, although his passport was perfectly en règle, and ordered him to be instantly thrown into a dungeon, where he was not allowed to see any one, or even to receive a blanket. After a vain effort to see him, the pastor went to the Governor, but was driven out of his presence, after having been told that Ahmed was a Turk, with whom he, as a Christian, had no business to meddle. The pastor replied that Ahmed was his guest, and consequently it was his business to do everything for him in his power. The Governor made no reply to this, and the pastor telegraphed to Mr. Washburn, as above stated. In his letter received to-day he says that great indignation is felt in Rodosto, even among the Turks, at this unwarrantable arrest of a man against whom the Governor could bring no complaint. The telegram of the Grand Vizier probably brought the Governor to his senses.

NEW INSTRUCTIONS FROM EARL RUSSELL.

The Hon. Mr. Stuart some days ago addressed a note to the Rev. Mr. Curtis, stating that he had "been instructed by Earl Russell to represent to the Porte that Her Majesty's Government expect that the religious liberty granted by the Turkish edicts to the Greek Church and to the Roman Catholic Church should be equally enjoyed by the Protestant Church." He also requests that "a memorandum be drawn up suggesting such measures as may be best calculated to give security and quiet to Christian ministers and Christian converts, without creating disturbance amongst the fanatical Mussulman population."

The very peculiar form of these statements instantly suggests the idea that they were either designed to furnish Earl Russell with a convenient reply to questions which may be asked at the coming session of Parliament, or that they were suggested by Sir Henry Bulwer, in the belief that the missionaries would be very much puzzled to make any reply to them.

Earl Russell certainly knows that no edicts are in force in Turkey giving exclusive rights to Greeks and Catholics, and that no complaints have been made by Protestants on this point. The last question certainly implies that the measures heretofore adopted by the missionaries have created disturbances and threatened the peace of the city, although this has been emphatically denied, and is supported by no evidence whatever.

HOW THESE INSTRUCTIONS FAIL TO MEET THE WANTS OF PROTESTANTS IN TURKEY.

The Imperial edicts to which Earl Russell seems to allude owe their existence chiefly to the efforts of Her Britannic Majesty's late Ambassadors, Lord Stratford and Lord Cowley, and they recognise Protestantism as an established religion of the empire, with the same rights enjoyed by the other Christian communities. The edicts are in themselves satisfactory. The real difficulty is that, as to Protestants, these edicts have not been faithfully carried out, especially during the last few years. And now an altogether new interpretation has just been put upon them by the Turkish Government and endorsed by Sir Henry Bulwer.

The Greeks, Catholics, and Armenians are able generally to maintain all their rights, because they are numerous, powerful, and wealthy. The Porte is in a measure dependent upon them, and individuals among them hold most important and influential relations to the Turkish Government, which they are always able and ready to use for the benefit of their co-religionists; and what is more, they are always most vigorously supported by the French and Russian Embassies, who, so far from adopting Sir Henry Bulwer's policy of letting the Turks alone, were never more active in their interference than now. The Protestants, on the other hand, are as yet few and feeble. They unite against themselves the active hostility and opposition of all the other Christian communities, and of late years the aid and protection of Her Britannic Majesty's Ambassador and council has generally been withheld. Under these circumstances, they are powerless to defend themselves from wrong and oppression. They are in various places imprisoned, robbed, stoned, driven from their houses, and often even prevented from burying their dead. They are prevented in many places from building churches, they have been positively forbidden by Aali Pasha to enrol any converted Turk in their civil community, so that every Protestant Turk is legally and practically a vagabond, without protection. These are direct violations of the Turkish edicts; but who is to enforce these edicts. While, however, this want of practical protection has made Protestantism almost an impossibility in Turkey, that which causes most alarm among Protestants is the new interpretation which is now put upon these edicts by the Porte and Sir Henry Bulwer.

LORD STRATFORD VERSUS SIR HENRY BULWER ON THE HATTI HUMAYOUN.

A just understanding of the new position taken by the British Ambassador can only be obtained by reading the published correspondence with the Foreign-office. From this it will be plain at once that Sir Henry's idea of the Hatti Humayoun is the key to all the late movements against religious liberty. We have only room here for a brief extract from a despatch dated Therapia, November 16, 1860:—

The Hatti Humayoun itself was merely valuable as a declaration of principles which might serve as a landmark for future legislation; it did nothing itself in the way of legislation, and I doubt much whether, by pointing too suddenly and extensively at an entire alteration in manners and feelings, it did not give rise to many of the evils which usually follow such experiments, and actually followed those of the same kind made in France in the 18th century.

Lord Stratford's idea of the value of the Hatti Humayoun may be gathered from a single sentence in a letter to Lord Clarendon, dated February 12th, 1856 :—

I do not see what room there can possibly be for any practical persecutions in future within the limits of the Sultan's empire.

In a note addressed to the Porte a month later he says :—

The British Government distinctly demands that Mussulman who turns Christian shall be exempt from every kind of punishment on that account as the Christian who embraces the Mohammedan faith.

Lord Stratford believed that the Hatti Humayoun secured genuine religious liberty in Turkey. Sir Henry Bulwer believes that Turkey was saved from a repetition of the terrible scenes of the French Revolution by the removal of Lord Stratford and his ignoring of the Hatti Humayoun.

With such a view of this great charter of religious liberty, it is not singular that he would decline to listen to reports of persecutions and wrong suffered by Protestants during the past few years, nor that he should have improved the opportunity, last summer, to confer with the Porte in giving a new definition to religious liberty, which, if sustained, would put an end to all Protestant missions in Turkey.

NEW DEFINITION OF RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

Sir Henry Bulwer, in his letter of August 1, states the present position of the Turkish Government on religious liberty as follows :—

The Ottoman Government is willing to allow Protestants and all Christians to exercise their religion in the Ottoman dominions, in churches, or quietly at home ; but it will not permit any attempts, public or private, to assail the Mussulman religion. It will allow Mussulmans to become Christians, but it will not allow any more than it will other Christians, to speak publicly against Mohammedanism. It says its policy is to protect all religions, and not to allow persons of one religion to attack another.

This new definition of religious liberty is approved by Sir Henry in his letter of August 1, and in other documents which have been communicated to the Protestant missionaries. But it is somewhat significant that it cannot be learned that any similar announcement has been made by the Porte to any other Christian community, and that the Roman Catholic propaganda is urging on the work of proselytism with its usual zeal, and, if we may believe M. Borè, with no little success, among both Mussulmans and Christians, unmolested.

Moreover, in spite of this declaration, the Porte not only permits the grossest abuse of Protestantism on the part of Mohammedans and of the other Christian communities, but itself sets the example by publishing official communications and extracts from other papers, containing the grossest libels on Protestantism, in the Journal de Constantinople, which is owned by the Government.

Here we have, then, a new interpretation of the Hatti Humayoun, to be applied exclusively to Protestants, and its late practical application to the Turkish converts is justified on the same ground as that taken by Rifaat Pasha in his correspondence with Lord Stratford in 1843, where he excused the action of the Government in beheading a convert from Mohammedanism as a renegade.

If this interpretation is to stand, and these excuses are to be received as valid reasons for imprisoning Protestant Turks, then religious liberty no longer exists for Protestants in Turkey. The Turkish converts will have their lips for ever sealed, and if a Mohammedan desires to adopt Christianity, he must choose some other form of it than Protestantism, or suffer indefinite persecution "for his own safety" and "the peace of the city," or because there is "a smouldering excitement amongst the Ulema."

WHAT IS THE REMEDY FOR THE PRESENT DIFFICULTIES ?

Mr. Stuart wishes to know what measures are to be adopted to "secure peace and security to Christian ministers and Christian converts." We would reply, that the first and most important thing to be done is to assure the Porte that, whatever may be the opinion of his Excellency Sir Henry Bulwer, Christian Europe regards the Hatti Humayoun as something more than a shadow, and has no fear of its honest execution producing a second French Revolution. And, in the second place, the Porte should understand that this edict means now what it did when it was issued—that no new and narrow interpretation of it for Protestants will be tolerated by the great Protestant powers of Europe.

But it cannot be denied, that even if both these things are done, in the present state of this empire Protestantism needs something more to secure to her the practical enjoyment of her rights. Every one who knows anything of Turkey knows that the ecclesiastics of the old churches are always ready to persecute Protestants, and that corrupt and inefficient Turkish officials, in most cases, allow them to have their own way. For this reason, English consuls in the provinces were formerly instructed to take notice of such cases, and report them to Constantinople, when their own influence failed to secure justice; and Protestantism owes not only her legal existence, but also most of her legal triumphs over wrong and oppression, to the protection of Her Majesty's consuls and the British Embassy in Constantinople.

Since Sir Henry Bulwer came to Turkey this protection has been in a great measure withdrawn, and the British Embassy has declined to lend its influence, even when most flagrant cases of persecution have been brought before the Ambassador, by the Constantinople Branch of the Evangelical Alliance.

It should be distinctly understood, however, that Protestantism has never asked protection against the Government in any political sense, but simply against the ill-will, or caprice, or religious prejudice, of individual officers, who would deprive them of rights legally guaranteed by the Government. This is what Protestantism needs now, and it certainly would not be inconsistent with even the present policy of England in Turkey, if her consuls and her Ambassador were instructed to call the attention of the Turkish authorities to cases of manifest wrong and oppression suffered by Protestants.

Such friendly interest has been worth more to Protestantism in years past than even the edicts of the Sultan. If it is withheld, Protestantism can never stand against the Roman Catholic, Greek, and Armenian Churches, which enjoy the constant and all-powerful protection of the French and Russian Embassies.

MR. STUART'S ACTION ON EARL RUSSELL'S INSTRUCTIONS.

As we have said, on receiving instructions from Earl Russell, Mr. Stuart addressed a note to Rev. Mr. Curtis, of the Propagation Society, asking for information, and requesting him to confer with his English and American colleagues. Mr. Curtis addressed notes to them, desiring them to make such statements as they thought best, and send them to him. In accordance with this request, the American missionaries drew up a full statement of their views, and sent it to Mr. Curtis. The Church Missionary Society's agents prepared a similar paper; but at this juncture, Mr. Stuart informed Mr. Curtis that he wished a single memorial of measures agreed to by all the missionaries. As this was for many reasons impracticable, Mr. Curtis forwarded to Mr. Stuart the paper of the American missionaries, which, although not addressed to the Embassy, contained a statement of facts and of the opinions of missionaries who had been years in Turkey, which it seemed to him most desirable that Mr. Stuart should see. The English missionaries proposed to draw up a joint memorial after consultation with the Bishop of Gibraltar.

Although I have reason to believe that the English missionaries fully approved of the statement made by the American mission, it will be obvious that the peculiarity of their positions and their relations to the Bishop of Gibraltar made it proper for them to draw up a separate paper.

Mr. Stuart, after retaining the paper of the American mission a day or two, sent it back to Mr. Curtis, declining to receive it, on the ground that "it contained criticisms upon the conduct of Her Majesty's Ambassador, and upon the policy of Her Majesty's Government." I understand that it will be sent to England for publication.

THE TURKISH CONVERTS AND THE BRITISH AMBASSADOR.

The following, from the Rev. C. G. Curtis of the Propagation Society, was not received in time for insertion in our last number:—

Constantinople, October 19, 1864.

I have read in the October number of Evangelical Christendom a letter written from this city on the 13th September. The subject-matter is expressed by the title, "The Fate of the Converts, and the Conduct of the British Ambassador."

The writer will pardon me if, upon the information which I have received, I venture to say that I cannot accept his conclusion, printed in italics—viz., "the three real Protestants have had nothing done for them by Sir Henry."

1. The expression "the three real Protestants" banishes the fourth of the baptized converts at least to unreality: for there were four imprisoned. I know no proof that this man (Hadji Sali) was one of those who "obtained their liberty," as the writer says, "by professing themselves Mussulmans." Hadji Sali himself has assured us of the contrary. The account which he sent us upon his release was this: His wife sent a petition to Aali Pasha, stating her condition. Aali Pasha called the leading residents of Hadji Sali's parish, and asked them whether they had anything to say against him. They replied that formerly he was a good Mussulman, but had lately become a gkioner (infidel). The Pasha then said angrily, "That is not what I ask. That is not what I ask. Is he a liar, a thief, or disorderly?" They replied, "No." Then they were required to sign and seal a paper to that effect. This paper is in the hands of the Government. Hadji Sali was told to remain in prison another night or two, as the Pasha's guest, not as a prisoner. The parishioners were again summoned, and required to sign a second paper to the same effect. Then Hadji Sali was enjoined, "For a little while keep away from their meetings" (he meant those of the missionaries).

Further, it cannot be said that little or nothing was known of him by the missionaries before his arrest. I have visited him and his friend the Isam, who, as a father, used to receive his younger brethren into his house for the purpose of devotion.

2. A few words upon our Ambassador's conduct in regard to the prisoners. There is no proof that his Excellency has done nothing for the three: the contrary is the case. It is true that one convert was exiled to Maguesia, and one to Aidin. But the letter written to me by one of the exiles, assuring us of this fact, assured us at the same time that after three days an order came for them to return to Smyrna. Whence this hurried change?

On the 1st August the Ambassador instructed one of the Embassy interpreters to go again to the prison, in consequence of a doubt expressed by me, and invited me to accompany that gentleman, in order that we might have the opportunity of identifying our converts. The object was not gained, but the attempt was made by the Ambassador most promptly.

It is true that such exertions were not made at the beginning—the Ambassador was away, and letters to and from his residence were delayed; but it was upon a fair statement of facts that so early as the 5th August the Secretary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel wrote, "Sir Henry Bulwer seems to have exerted himself most energetically." The Secretary is not here speaking particularly about the prisoners. But on the 29th July two of us, representing the two English missions, tendered our thanks to his Excellency for his humane exertions on behalf of the imprisoned converts. No wonder, then, that we have never gainsaid what the Ambassador wrote on the 23rd July, in his reply to the English missionaries: "The Turkish converts are not British subjects, and I cannot treat the case as if they were; but I think you give me credit for having used, and for now using, my best endeavours to obtain their release."

I hope my comments may be received in the spirit in which they are written, and answer the purpose for which they are sent; but unhappily, they will reach (as all that we write must) too late to prevent the effect of a wrong impression.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

CHARLES GEORGE CURTIS,
Missionary S. P. G.

THE ARMENIAN CONVERTS OF THE AMERICAN MISSION AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

We have received from the Rev. Dr. Wood, Secretary to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, the following letter, in reply to that by the Rev. Dr. Koelle, printed in our October number (p. 406). It may be remembered that Dr. Wood formerly occupied a post in the Constantinople mission, and therefore that he does not speak without a personal knowledge of the facts to which he refers. Whatever misapprehensions may have arisen with respect to those facts, upon which we are sorry to occupy our space, there is a question of principle to which they are subordinate, and which claims the attention of every friend to missions. Hence, irrespective of the merits of the particular case under discussion, the latter part of Dr. Wood's letter deserves the special notice of our readers:—

New York, October 13, 1864.

Please accept my thanks for your courtesy in sending me a copy of the letter from Rev. Dr. Koelle, of Constantinople, controverting statements from my pen which appeared in the July number of Evangelical Christendom. I have read it with surprise, and am deeply pained that the necessity is imposed upon me of defending, against his imputation, my account of facts, which I have had the best opportunities of learning, and with which the strictures of this honoured brother show that he is very imperfectly acquainted. I beg to observe—

1. That the communication from which you gave certain extracts was written, in February last, from Constantinople, to the executive officers of the American Board of Foreign Missions, and was inserted by them in the May number of our monthly periodical—the Missionary Herald—to give to the patrons of our missions the information which it contained bearing on our missionary work in Turkey. The passages criticised by Dr. Koelle came in incidentally, and form but a small part of the document. The republication of portions of it in England was without my knowledge or desire.

2. It now appears that in making allusion to advice which I was informed had been given to the Pera seceders from co-operation with our mission, I ought to have qualified the form of expression. I have to confess that I had no personal intercourse with Dr. Koelle on the topic referred to, though I had that which was very pleasant with his respected colleagues; and that in the remark which I made specially on the authority of the "esteemed lay missionary in connexion with the Church Missionary Society," of whom Dr. Koelle speaks as one of the leaders in what he calls the "Episcopal movement" among the fruits of the labours of the American missionaries, I gave it a wider application than he probably intended by the form of expression which he used to me. This mistake I regret.

3. There are several particulars in Dr. Koelle's letter in regard to which I am not careful to defend myself against his imputations. I leave his objections and affirmations on those points to be judged in their own light or from a comparison with what I actually said, and proceed to the only issues that can be of the least interest to any readers of our communications.

4. In furnishing a portraiture of the Protestantism which exists in Constantinople, as a result of the labours of our missionaries among the Armenians, and of difficulties and trials connected with their work, I allude in my letter to a "long controversy respecting the mutual relations of missionaries and native pastors and churches in the system of operations carried on by the funds of the American Board and the Turkish Missions Aid Society," and add in the next sentence: "The subject of disagreement [i. e., between the parties in this controversy] has not been forms of Church order or worship, but how far and in what form, there should be a taking of the native element into the councils of the missionaries, in determining the use of funds committed to their hands for disbursement." I then refer to recent avowals in favour of another mode of organization and worship and easier terms of communion at the Lord's Table; speak of a religious service set up by the ex-priest Vertanes, designed to lead on to the formation of a "Reformed Armenian Church;" acknowledge that the pastor and some of the members of the Church in Pera, though then annoyed by his (individual and separate) action, "confess sympathy with his avowed object;" and say that "if they do not succeed in their present plan of getting foreign aid," it is possible that they may, as advised by some whom they have consulted, turn again to the source from which they first received their knowledge of the truth, "but they are not prepared to do it now."

To my amazement, Dr. Koelle assumes to hold me up before the Christian public as not an ineffectual, but a real misrepresenter of facts in the above statement, because in January last (one month before that in which I wrote) the pastor and certain members of the Pera congregation solemnly declared that "in matters of form they [then] differed much from the American missionaries," and "were strongly convinced that the only sound principle for them to act upon was to reform the old Armenian Church, in the very manner which my letter sets forth; and he undertakes to give a history of the previous relations of those persons with the American missionaries, in which he betrays a total ignorance of a painful controversy which had occurred between them, and of other facts in regard to which the testimony of the missionaries is decisive. A critic so minute as my assailant has shown himself to be ought not to commence an attempted correction of me by saying that an important event occurred "six or seven years ago," when it took place at the beginning of 1860, and then declare that "from that period the disagreement between the missionaries and this new church dates," which disagreement was a result of differing views relating to Church organization, and a revision begun by that Church of its ecclesiastical constitution, when the missionaries know and testify that there was an earlier agitating conflict, and that the questions of Episcopacy versus Congregationalism or Presbyterianism, and liturgical or extempore prayer, formed no part of it or of subsequent discussions between themselves and their native brethren, down to the period when the latter made application for pecuniary patronage, first to Germany, and then to parties connected with the Church of England.

Abundant evidence exists in the written correspondence between the missionaries and those who carried on the controversy with them as to the subjects of disagreement. I could easily fill several pages with conclusive citations from copies in my possession; but the following from Rev. Drs. Schautfler, Goodell, and Riggs, written in May last, in the name and with the sanction of the whole body of American missionaries in Western Turkey, will, I trust, be deemed sufficient corroboration of my testimony.

"In respect to the management of matters pertaining to the missionary work . . . it has always been our desire to secure the advice and co-operation of our native brethren. In the hope of securing these objects, a plan of co-operation was drawn up during the lifetime of our lamented brother Dwight, in accordance with which a mixed committee, composed of an equal number of missionaries and native brethren, was to give its advice respecting the missionary work in general, the mission reserving to itself the right of final decision in all appropriations of funds committed to it. This reservation (the principle of which is justly insisted on by our Board, and, so far as we know, by all other missionary societies) was the only point of difference; but the plan failed solely through the opposition of the Pera pastor. In all the discussions on this topic, which continued through two or three years, no desire was ever expressed on the part of either the Pera pastor or any of the native brethren for any change in the Church government or modes of worship actually existing in the Evangelical Armenian Churches."

5. Dr. Koelle will find that no evidence is available to him to disprove the representation of facts which I have given. What opinions and desires the Pera seceders may, or may not, have expressed to other parties from whom they were seeking aid to enable them to stand in a position of independence of the American Mission, and what third parties may have been led to believe and say, orally or in print, are matters not relevant to the question, "What were the disagreements brought out in their intercourse with the American missionaries?" The latter is the point on which I spoke, and on which my statements have been opposed. The case is incontrovertible, as I put it; but I do not agree with Dr. Koelle in the sweeping inference which he draws from it, if admitted. I was the teacher in theology of the pastor of the Pera congregation; I assisted in ordaining him to the work of the ministry; and notwithstanding the things in his conduct which have grieved me, he has a place in my confidence and love far higher than Dr. Koelle intimates that he can give him, if my statements are correct. I regard him and his followers as grievously misled in the policy which they have finally come to avow, and which they professed they had not thought of adopting at a time when its ultimate adoption by them was predicted by others. I think that they are actuated by a spirit of which they are not conscious, a desire to enter upon a path the end of which they do not see; but I look upon them as mistaken brethren, and not "base" deceivers. I have not arraigned, and do not now arraign, their motives. I simply state undeniable facts.*

6. No one can be more ready to recognise the rights of conscience than I am; but when Dr. Koelle says that he "could not advise a body of Christian men to return to forms to which they profess the strongest conscientious objections, yet which I have myself seen them use in their regular Sabbath worship in the Prussian chapel, since that solemn declaration, in January last, which made so strong an impression on Dr. Koelle's mind, what am I to understand by his language! Again; do they conscientiously differ from us re-

* For the use of at least one phrase criticised by Dr. Koelle, Dr. Wood is not responsible. In the document from which our quotations were made, he spoke of the connexion of Vertanes with the American Board as having existed for "many years." That those precise words were not reproduced by us, was owing to the fact, that we were giving only the general purport of that portion of his letter. This was plainly indicated by the change of type from that in which the preceding sentences were printed.—Ede.

g the constitution of the Christian ministry? all. The venerated fathers of our mis-ferred to above, say also in the document hich I have quoted: "They have all along d to agree with our view of ministerial and it is not two months since their pastor one of the undersigned, that they had no admitting any other principle." It is that their proposed action is based only diency, and not on conscientious convic-any other sense.

my letter I made no "suggestion to with- reign aid" from the Pera congregation; he matter is now up, I will suggest a view uestion for the consideration of those who e progress of spiritual reform and personal tion more than they do of a particular Church order. The American Board has n its operations among the Armenians for of a century, and extended them over the rmenian field in Turkey. Its labours have eally blessed. About fifty local churches y more congregations have been gathered; e expected that many others will soon be

It is of vital importance that these in- mmunities be kept as much as possible tracting controversies on questions which the members of Christ's spiritual body; ir purity be guarded by sound teaching hful discipline; that they be united in a ions co-operation; and that they be brought as rapidly as possible to support their own schools, and other institutions. What the effect on the latter object of competing ry agencies tempting the weak and dis- by offers of larger pecuniary aid? What the influence on discipline of rival church tions, ready to receive to their commu- sions who come under censure, or who luded from the churches connected with ions? How will it minister to spiritual on to have "Reformed Armenians" carry controversy and strife as far as they may be able into congregations and communities over all the fields of the operations of the American mission- aries? I ask, is it well for a missionary brother sent from England, and welcomed by American missionaries, to labour among Mohammedans, that he add to his own proper missionary work an active concert with disaffected Armenian converts, gathered under American missionary labours, in inaugurating a movement which, from the very law of its being, and the necessity of circum- stances, will, whatever professions be made at the outset, be antagonistic to the American missions? Painful and numerous facts, not only in Constanti- nople, but elsewhere among the Armenians where the "Episcopal movement" has been begun, shut me up to the conviction that such are the results to be expected. Now to those who have no conscience against robbing, wherever they can, the gardens which others have cultivated, I have nothing to say, but God judge between them and us! But of those who would deprecate injury and injustice to the missions which have toiled long for the harvest which they are beginning to reap, I would solicit a careful consideration of all that is involved in the case here adverted to. It is not a question between the Church and Dissent— between Episcopacy and Presbyterianism or Congregationalism—but a question of missionary comity and justice: just what it would be if cir- cumstances were reversed, and Independents or Presbyterians should be asked to take under their patronage a congregation of converts in a field occupied by missionaries of the Church of Eng- land, after a failure to carry their point in a con- troversy with their spiritual fathers on a question of missionary policy. The Earl of Shaftesbury, in the noble utterance which he made on the appre- hended interference in Madagascar, has given the judgment of Evangelical Catholicism on these matters.—Yours respectfully and fraternally, Geo. W. Wood.

AMERICA.

THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

New York, November 11, 1864.
have only one topic in America to-day late election. Of its political relations ll hear enough from other sources. I eak of its religious aspects.
one election was ever made the of so many prayers. The approach residential election has always been anied by at least a formal recognition, lic prayers and private, of the nation's ence upon God's guidance and blessing. e approach of this election has kindled e piety of the land to an unexampled . For the past few weeks there has ly been not a Sabbath congregation, social prayer-meeting, nor a praying circle, in which there have not been the most pointed and earnest requests ed would guide the nation in its ap- ing choice of President. And to this petition has been added another, equally pointed and fervent, that God would allay the strife of the contending parties, and cause the momentous choice to be made with a seriousness and self-command that should become a nation of freemen.

One of these petitions at least has been answered. So dignified an utterance of the will of a great people has never been made in this land, nor, I think, in any other. The occasion for it has never existed before. The magnitude of the contending parties, their vital differences, the greatness of the interests at stake, the heat of the canvass, the exciting presence of a most bloody and burdensome civil war—all these things seemed to us to give an unexampled importance to that critical day. No greater tension, we thought, can be brought upon a nation. Have we the fibre that can bear it? Our only hope was in God, and He has sustained us. Be the issues of the election what they may, it is a triumph in itself. Without a tumult, without a collision—so far as we have heard—without an angry wrangle, these four millions of citizens have decided with their votes the question that has held them for months in most earnest and passionate debate. In this city such an election day was never seen. We might refer the unusual quiet to the careful provision which the authorities had made against an outbreak, had not the same pervading and unusual seriousness been observed in other cities, where every such provision was wanting. The momentous day brought an earnestness too deep for strife. And it has been followed by an acquiescence in its decision, so general, so graceful, apparently so hearty, that we look back upon our apprehensions almost with surprise. We do not boast, but we are thankful, and we expect our friends to help us in renewing that ancient testimony to God's distinguishing goodness — "Then said they among the nations, The Lord hath done great things for them. The Lord hath done great things for us, whereof we are glad."

But the world ought to know that not only the manner of this election, but its result, is regarded by the immense majority of Christian Americans as a blessing from God. For this result they have prayed, and they have no doubt that God has granted it in mercy. To this representation, of course, there are exceptions. Yet it is doubtful whether one Christian man in twenty has voted for the defeated candidate. So general is this unanimity understood to be, that religious people when they meet, without a hint concerning each other's politics, break out in mutual congratulations over the issue. Indeed, the opposition, in their late electioneering movements, accepted this fact, and estimated the piety of a community as an influence against them. For example, a prominent politician of that party was discussing in a rail-car, just before the election, the probabilities of carrying the State of New Jersey for General McClellan. Of some counties he spoke very confidently. When asked concerning others, he said, "Oh, we can do nothing there; every third house is a church." An agent of the American Bible Society undertook to circulate Bibles in a large western community that was unanimously pledged to the Chicago candidate. They met him and his books with contempt, and he was compelled to give over the hopeless effort. In New York it is well-known the Irish Catholics and the most degraded of our native population have voted in a mass against Mr. Lincoln. Different influences have combined to draw these sharp lines. Sympathy with slavery, a fear of being drafted, restlessness under taxes, hatred of the negroes, who are regarded as rivals in labour, the dragging arts of demagogues, who have made the most of a party name—these things have united the ignorant and selfish upon one side. Yet they would not have stood so nearly alone, but for one fact, that is full of moral significance. The attempt which General McClellan made to conciliate the two different and inconsistent elements which opposed themselves to Mr. Lincoln involved such a sacrifice of candour, that good men of the Democratic party who, but for that fatal error, would have been glad to give him their votes, fell from him with disgust. The result of this election is of priceless value to the land, as a declaration for truth and fair dealing above party names.

There was a memorable scene enacted on the night of the election, which singularly confirms my representation concerning the character of the successful party. It was understood that the large hall of the Cooper Institute, which holds perhaps three thousand people, would be open to the friends of the Administration, and that the results of the day would be reported there as fast as the telegraph should bring them. The great hall was crowded. Thousands upon thousands of the best men of the city came about the building, and unable to get access, quietly departed. Those who were within watched with deepening enthusiasm, the receipt of the partial but decisive returns, until two o'clock in the morning, when it was decided to adjourn. As that great multitude rose to their feet they burst forth, as if they were in a church, with the Doxology,

Praise God from whom all blessings flow.

It was no profanation of the sacred strain. They who sang it were used to singing it, as they sung it because they were glad and thankful.

Our benevolent institutions take count from this decisive vote. While the crisis was impending, no man could foretell its form or measure of the derangement in which all financial interests might soon be involved. If a division of the Union was to result, it was impossible to know how many divisions would follow, and thus our schemes of work wide benevolence might in a few months be deprived of the greater part of their support. But now our national policy is declared. The crisis is past, and with God's blessing it o live. For this prospect none are l as those who wish it to live for Ve still look for an expanded or a national debt, and for heavy t the experience of the American the Bible Society, and of similar has proved that the piety and e of the American Church will emergencies. What our charities led, was a fixed national policy.

helming vote for the Administra-given it to us, and we will square ble plans and efforts to meet it.
e some navigators, we have for the force ahead slowly through the rift, from the mast-head we can see before us.

is, let me once more remind your ere is no indifference to the horrors vindictive desire for the chastise-umiliation of the South, but only the instinct of national life exalted and directed by sympathy with Christ in the cause of the world's salvation. We think we see before us the consolidation of a great Christian nation, with its conscience disciplined by a sublime moral struggle, with the vice and curse of slavery removed, with the sovereignty and providence of God reverently recognised, with its self-estimation chastened by delays and reverses, and by God's evident rebuke, and yet established in the conscious nobleness and integrity of its great purpose, with the seed of Evangelical truth spread thick and wide under all these horrors of war, and so prepared both to "be blessed and to be a blessing" This end may not be very near, but it is for such an end that Christian America is praying. God has just helped us to take one great stride towards it, and we expect Him to lead us on.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE AMERICAN BOARD OF MISSIONS.

New York, October, 1864.

merican Board of Commissioners for missions has just held its annual t Worcester, Massachusetts. The which lasted from Tuesday, the 4th the following Friday, were very ended, more than three thousand ing present at some of the meetings.
ce of such a crowd gave to one of rs the occasion for a very touching the second annual meeting of the ich was held in the same place in hen there were seven members pre-they all ate at one table. Now, as r said, no room was large enough meetings, and no table but that of ld feed them all.

erest of the meeting was due in a ree to the happy condition into perilful finances of the Board brought. The depreciation of our rency, and the high rates of ex-d left the Board, in the beginning with a deficiency of about 180,000 ich needed to be made up before the eting should be held. The report asurer showed that this great want nly been met, but exceeded. The begun with a debt of more than lars, and it closed with a balance in ry of nearly 4,000 dollars. The con-which produced this gratifying reed the aggregate of 531,983 dollars.

e-sixth of this large sum was made icua. Of the 135,000 dollars which were raised in August, it was said that, with the exception of about 30,000 dollars, the amount was contributed in small donations, and from all over the land. The audience was greatly moved by the reading of letters which accompanied some of these small sums:—

A dying soldier, the son of a missionary, sent 30 dollars; his last gift. A mother sent 6 dollars; found in the pocket of her dear dead soldier-boy.
A widow sent 20 dollars, adding: "From one accustomed to deny herself." A minister sent 5 dollars, saying: "I know not how to spare it, much less how to withhold." A twenty-shilling gold piece was accompanied with the words,
"Given to me to comfort me in my old age."

Encouraging reports were given from most of the missions. The recent return of Rev.
Dr. Wood, one of the Secretaries of the Board, from an official visit of the mission stations in Turkey, enabled him to make some very interesting statements. He had himself been a missionary in that field, and the twelve years of his absence prepared him to make the most discriminating observation of the changes which had passed upon it. Some of the results of his observation will be as interesting to British Christians as they are to American. Where he had left six mission stations in 1850, he found twenty-four in 1863. In those six stations there had been 18 missionaries and 20 female assistants; the missionaries and physicians now numbered 42, and the numbers of their female assistants had been increased to 47. Instead of six out-stations, manned by native labourers, he had found 101; instead of 6 native pastors

he had found 17, besides 31 licensed preachers not yet ordained. The whole body of native helpers had grown from 20 to 171; the number of common school pupils from about a hundred to nearly 4,000. But what is most important to notice is the increase which he observed in the number of churches and church members. He had left seven little churches, including 229 members; he found forty-nine churches and more than 1,800 members.

Dr. Wood made some statements concerning the government of the mission churches, which will interest those who have given attention to this delicate and important subject. Each church is governed by "care-takers," who correspond with the sessions or church committees of our home churches. Associations of the several churches have been in most cases prevented by the distances, the expense of journeying, and by other hindrances on the part of native ministers.

But just now, on the field of the Central Mission, an organization has been effected which is styled "The Presbyterial Association or Assembly or Council of Aintab and its vicinity," composed of ministers and delegates from the churches, whose duties are defined to be: "The formation of churches, the examination of candidates, and ordination to the work of the ministry, the installation and dismissal of pastors, the care of discipline, and the general welfare of the churches and the intellectual and spiritual improvement of the ministers." No appeal can for the present be taken from its disciplinary decisions. Missionaries are reckoned "corresponding members" only. There is no desire for ecclesiastical connexion with a body in a foreign land. It would be a reproach and disadvantage. The form of Church government must be moulded in the end by the genius of the people, and we may lose by endeavours to shape it.

The recent action of the Turkish Government, in restricting the privileges of missionaries and imprisoning converts, attracted the serious attention of the Board, and elicited the deepest regret for the lack of an influence in Constantinople like that of Sir Stratford Canning. It was proposed to make an appeal to the British Government to renew at this juncture its efficient care for religious liberty in Turkey.

The singular embarrassments to which the churches in the Sandwich Islands have been subjected were thought by the Board to be grave enough to become the subject of a special "appeal to all Protestant missionary societies against the principles" and action out of which these embarrassments have grown. The Board allude to the beginning of their missionary efforts in these islands, forty-five years ago, to the degraded condition in which the natives were found, and to the singular success which attended the labours of their missionaries, so that at the end of forty years "the Hawaiian Islands had become substantially a Christian nation, recognised as such by the leading Powers of Christendom." The Board take notice of the sanction which the Bishop of Oxford has given, by the use of his name, "to a book, written by an Englishman who never saw the islands, which pronounces the mission a failure;" and they instance many decisive and particular proofs of its abundant success. But the gravamen of their complaint is this: that when the religious character and condition of the Hawaiian people was so distinctly formed and recognised—

A self-constituted committee in London, taking advantage of the desire which the King of Hawaii had expressed for an Episcopal clergyman to reside at Honolulu, who besides ministering to the few English and American Episcopalians, might become the chaplain of the Royal Family, and the tutor to the infant prince, organised and sent forth what calls itself the "Reformed Catholic" Mission, consisting of a bishop and three presbyters, and proposing to itself an indefinite enlargement, as if the work of annexing those islands to the inviolable kingdom of Christ, and of planting there the institutions of a truly catholic Christianity, were that to be commenced.

The Board are careful to say that the settlement of a Protestant Episcopal minister in Honolulu, and his largest success in gathering not only foreign residents, but native converts into his communion, could have been no ground of complaint from them or their missionaries. But they claim that this "Reformed Catholic Mission" makes no such fair experiment of the adaptation of the Protestant Episcopal ritual and order to the wants of the Hawaiian people.

It enters the field [they say], renouncing, in the presence of Romanists, the name Protestant. It begins its operations, not as an ally against ignorance and sin, but as an enemy. It practically repels all offers of fraternity or courtesy on the part of our missionaries. It refuses to acknowledge their standing as ministers of Christ's Gospel. It makes no account of the work which God had wrought by His blessing on their labours—a work so great and manifest, that they might well say to the Christianised Hawaiian people, "In Christ Jesus we have begotten you through the Gospel; if we be now apostles unto others, yet doubtless we are to you, for the seal of our apostleship are ye in the Lord." The first lesson of its evangelization are to contradict what they have taught concerning the way of salvation for sinners through Christ alone, and to put contempt upon the Christian Sabbath.

The appeal, which was unanimously adopted, concluded with these words:—

In thus protesting against that self-styled Reformed Catholic Mission, we impute no blame to the Protestant Episcopal Church in our own to the authorities of the Established England. The Archbishop of Canterbury consecrating a bishop for that enterprise, under the force of a political necessity, of Hawaii having been represented as in favour of the British Government. The enterprise proceed from either of the societies through which the members of the Church of England conduct their foreign [it represents nothing more than a sect the Church of England—a sect which, our common Christianity, is far less in its influence than it was twenty years ago. Had such a measure as this intrusive Hawaii proceeded from any Protestant society, or from any recognised body of Christians, it would have been an violation of the law of comity which spontaneously and almost universally unite missionaries and the directors of missions. As it is, we can only appeal to the opinion of Protestant Christendom interference which is neither Protestantian.]

considerable extracts will enable us to see the nature and the limits of complaint which is made. The whole will, no doubt, reach their eyes through other channels, and cannot be read with interest.

The following summary gives a general idea of the relations of the Board:—

22; stations and outstations, 323. missionaries, 150; other male assistants, 170; total from this year; station pastors, teachers, &c., 740; number of labourers, 1,068. Mission 66; members, not including those at the Islands, 23,647; added last year, number of training, theological, boarding schools, 371; pupils, 10,317; printings, 4; pages printed last year,

American Board has not been suspected wanting in patriotism. If it had been, the session would have redeemed its name. When the venerable Jonas King was the unfurling of the American flag in his house in Athens had once proved his life from an infuriated mob. A great congregation broke out in singing "The Star-spangled Banner."

At one of the meetings a misrepresented cedar cones from Mount Lebanon and carob beans, and other objects of interest, which had been sent by an Armenian to be sold for the aid of the Christian Commission. They were at once, and realised the price of £1. More interesting still was the made by the same missionary, that converted Armenians had contributed £800 dollars in gold for the purpose of buying Bibles and Testaments for the Union. But the Board was careful to make the record of its patriotic feeling distinct and permanent. A series of resolutions presented by Rev. Albert Barnes, who is becoming almost as venerable for age as for piety, after alluding to the bearing which the issue of the contest may have upon the cause of missions and the suppression of slavery, concluded with these words:—

This Board expresses its hearty sympathy in the efforts to suppress the rebellion, and gratefully acknowledges the Divine interposition in the successes which have attended the arms of the nation, as an indication that we shall again be one people, united in our glorious Constitution, united in our efforts to spread the Gospel around the world.

The vote was taken by the whole congregation rising, amid the loudest applause, and singing with enthusiasm—

My country, 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty.

Such a vote may show how little the pious feeling of the country contemplates a surrender of the cause of nationality and liberty.

One of the most touching incidents of the meeting was the allusion by Rev. Mr. Jessup, of the Syrian Mission, to his father, Hon. W. Jessup, LL.D., of Pennsylvania, one of the vice-presidents of the Board, who had recently been prostrated by palsy. "He has forgotten," said the speaker, "that he was ever a judge or a lawyer, he has forgotten his books, but he has not forgotten his Saviour, nor his Bible, nor that he is a member of this Board. He has forgotten the way to his own house, but he remembers the way to church. He has forgotten the names of his children, but he leads his household daily in coherent prayer. He is like some gold-bearing mountain, from which the wind and storm have borne away all the earth and sand, and left only the massive golden peak."

For the next year the Board resolved to ask for a contribution of six hundred thousand dollars, as the lowest sum which, under existing circumstances, will sustain its work without retrenchment. Enthusiastic responses to this resolution were made by gentlemen who are most intimately acquainted with the temper of the churches, and there is little doubt that the amount will be raised.

Another correspondent—originally a British subject—who was present at these meetings, appears also much impressed by one feature in the proceedings above referred to. He writes:—

I can give no just idea of the intense spirit of loyalty which prevailed in that vast assembly. Never in England, or the United States, have I witnessed such deep, intelligent sensitiveness in of the civilised world the unwarrantable proceedings of a despotic power, which has invaded this peaceful island, trampled upon the sacred and long-cherished rites and privileges of this simple people, and robbed them of their Christian instructors. An eminent writer has said that "almost all the conduct of nations may be summed up in the rage of plunder, the fury of war, and the frenzy of civil discord," which may be all very true where there is something to plunder, or where there is at least some proximity to equality in those who engage in the "horrors of war;" but who ever heard of a band of robbers entering an empty house to plunder? or of a company of soldiers waging war with a few defenceless children? Here is an island holding its barren head a little above the sea, and bearing on its bosom a scanty vegetation, containing a population of about seven thousand harmless and comparatively enlightened natives—an island which does not present attractions sufficiently strong to bring its colonisation, with persons of capital and respectability, even within the range of probability; indeed, it is remarkable only for its uneven, rugged surface, and great scarcity of water. Yet, strange to say, this island has been invaded by the French, the ruins of its simple government seized, the chiefs informed that they are no longer the ruling power, and that their laws are null. Why this unjustifiable seizure? It surely cannot be that the French have gained the coveted pinnacle whence a noted warrior beheld the world at his feet, and wept because there was not another to conquer; and seeing no better land upon been permitted to intrude and pursue their labours unmolested, upon which the London Missionary Society occupied since 1841. Not satisfied with open field and fair play, they have recourse to the "leaden argument." natives won't be brought, persuade them, frightened into "the Mother Church," they must be forced in, that's all; must go somehow or other. This is the doctrine of the priests. The Government, of course, would not interfere with religion, not they; they are too honourable; but the bishop has only to intimate that natives cannot be loyal French subjects unless they are Roman Catholics, and the creatures are driven into the arms of Rome at the point of the bayonet.

The Roman Catholic priests in Papeete are evidently determined to follow the wake of Protestant missionaries, who, are followed by the French Government. When the inhabitants of an island have been brought under the influence of the Gospel, and have made some progress in civilisation, and when life and property are safe, then the priests arrive, tell the natives they have been deceived, that their former beliefs are false, and that they are the true religion. The natives, of course, don't believe this; they very naturally hold to those beliefs they have been instructed. The priests, and discouraged, appeal to the Government, which takes the island "under its protection," finds the Protestants very disloyal, and punishes them, until the natives, who already that loyalty is simply another re in 1841, but were soon obliged to leave, the natives had determined to kill them. For a time they returned and prosecuted their labours amidst dangers and discouragements. The good seed was scattered abroad, and soon sprang up, and the faithful labourers were cheered by beholding the tender plants sending their branches, unfolding their leaves, and bearing fruit. The Gospel spread with astonishing rapidity, village after village embraced "the Word." In a few years a greater part of the island was nominally Christian, although for years they continued many of their heathen practices. The work of reformation here has been gradual. The chief of this side of the island sternly opposed the introduction of the Gospel to his subjects, and endeavoured to kill the teachers; but his subjects were not only disobedient, but determined to have teachers, and to protect them, too, in spite of their chief. At this time the French had taken possession of New Caledonia. The chief, having heard of the death and desolation following in their wake, thought he would invite them here to punish the people for having received the teachers; accordingly sent his father over to New Caledonia, who returned with a priest. Then commenced a system of proselytising the most intractable and contemptible, which has happily proved unsuccessful; hence the arrival of the French.

The French flag was planted upon this island on the 2nd of May last. An officer and twenty-five soldiers were located here, and were soon to be followed by the Governor, a native seminary and all Protestant schools were closed, and the distribution of books prohibited. As might be expected, this course of procedure alarmed the natives, who are passionately fond of books, and devotedly attached to their existing forms of worship. The then chief and the priest assured the natives that the Governor was coming with three ships of war to abolish "the religious customs of England" which are prevalent here. All who refused to become Roman Catholics were either to be shot or taken prisoners to work upon the roads of New Caledonia. This, of course, was a native tale, but pretty generally received, as the people here had heard of the fate of those upon New Caledonia and the Isle of Pines who had not complied with the wishes of the French.

On the 21st of last month the Governor arrived here with two steamers, and about 250 soldiers (I am told that a number of them are armed convicts). Officers were sent to inspect the village, who inquired particularly about the roads, whether they were narrow, whether the natives had any muskets, and what kind of weapons they had been accustomed to use in their wars, &c. The soldiers were divided into two companies; one was landed on the opposite side of the island, the other at this village. Two large cannons were brought ashore, and the discipline of one of the most enlightened nations of the world arrayed against a few harmless and defenceless natives. Is it a matter of great surprise that the natives secreted themselves in the bush until the soldiers returned? Yet for this offence they were attacked next morning, whilst we were at worship. The chapel doors were burst open, and all except myself made prisoners and placed in irons on board the steamer. Amongst these there were three Samoan and three Raratongan teachers, with their wives and families, although the women were not put in irons, but placed on board a different steamer from that in which their husbands were. They were on board five days. Leaving the chapel in charge of a few, the soldiers rushed up the village, and fell upon the natives before they had time to secrete themselves; four were killed and many wounded. The French had one killed and one wounded. The natives ran inland, met the other company of soldiers coming from the opposite side of the island, and here they lost other four, and had many more wounded. The French had several wounded. The soldiers pursued the natives, but happily did not come in contact with any; they burnt down villages, destroyed plantations, entered the chapels, and demolished the pulpits; they were led about the island by the Roman Catholic party, who were as active as the French in the work of plunder. The chapel at this village has been turned into a barrack; the seats have been taken out and used as firewood; their firearms, luggage, &c., are placed at one end of the building—a large pew at the other is used as a kitchen; the pulpit is the Commandant's bedroom, and a table is fixed in the centre of the chapel, around which the officers meet to eat, drink, and smoke. Thus the house of prayer is changed, its glory is departed, and it is shunned by those who so recently assembled there in love and peace to listen to the Word of God. All public worship is prohibited; the natives are even forbidden to assemble for prayer. The Samoan and Raratongan teachers are to leave the island by the first opportunity, and we English missionaries are told that our residence on the island is merely "tolerated" as Englishmen. The priests are not only allowed to continue their labours as usual, but every facility is granted to render their efforts to proselytise effective.

The Governor claims the Loyalty group as dependencies of New Caledonia, although these islands are physically, geographically, politically, and philologically, distinct from that island; they are no more dependencies of New Caledonia than England is a dependency of France. But were they not as much the dependencies of New Caledonia in their heathen state as they are now? Strange that the French did not discover this until the islands were civilised by English liberality. When idolatry, cannibalism, and the more flagrant concomitants of heathenism had been abolished; when the island was studded with churches, and the schools in the most flourishing condition; when numerous acknowledged improvements had been made in native dwellings, public roads, &c.; when a native seminary had been established for training teachers and pastors; when, indeed, the whole machinery for carrying on the evangelisation and civilisation of this people was fairly at work—the French came, hoisted their flag, and declared this island to be a French colony. Seeing that the influence of the missionary was predominant, and that the natives manifested an unmistakeable preference for the English, with whom they have long held intercourse (nearly all the young men here can speak broken English, having sailed in English ships; many of them have been to Sydney), they have closed our schools, prohibited the distribution of books, forbidden us to hold any services with the natives, and ordered the teachers to leave the island.

From my intercourse with French officers, and several interviews with his Excellency the Governor, I am fully persuaded that their great object is to destroy English influence among these islands. They would not, probably, object to any improvements in the temporal and spiritual condition of these natives if they were made by Frenchmen; but it is exceedingly offensive to them to hear the English language spoken by natives so near to a French, and so far from an English, colony; to see the chief here living in a house built and furnished in English style, and married to the daughter of an Englishman; to observe that when an English vessel arrives it is surrounded by canoes and crowded with natives, and that when a French vessel anchors here, not a single canoe goes off to it; to see, not unfrequently in their own colony, natives of different islands meeting together and conversing in English, being ignorant of each other's language; to hear natives who have been to New Caledonia and Sydney speaking contemptuously of the former, and in the highest terms of the latter; to hear that the natives make imitations of the English flag and attach them to the masts of their canoes;—such things as these trouble the French, and they appear determined to establish a new order of things. They evidently have their suspicions about us, and although we have assured them that we are the agents of a voluntary and purely religious association, established for the purpose of diffusing the knowledge of the Christian religion, they are, nevertheless, inclined to regard us as virtually the agents of the British Government, who are endeavouring to extend the political and commercial influence of England.

You will probably wonder what has become of the natives, and whether they have remained steadfast in the day of trial. Happily, we had time to prepare for the storm. For the last two years we have heard the thunder rolling at a distance, and have seen the clouds lowering and blackening; so that we were awaiting the storm which burst upon us in all its strength and fury. Our little bark reeled under the first shock, and for a moment there was the greatest confusion, but she soon regained her equilibrium; and although we have been forced to take in more sail than we anticipated, she is nevertheless still flying along in her usual course, having gained speed from what was intended as a calamity. The natives—men, women, and children—were four days and four nights in the boat, exposed to inclement weather, and most of them returned to behold only the ruins of their houses. During that time we were forcibly reminded of the sad change which had taken place in this village. The long shrill howl of dogs prowling about seeking their homes and masters, and the monotonous cry of the guards every half hour, passed from one to the other, echoing through the stillness of the night, gave us a horrible impression of the death and desolation which reigned. Although there are over six thousand Protestants upon this island, about fifteen hundred of whom are Church members, I have only heard of one man who has become a Roman Catholic, and he is not a Church member. A few others I understand are hesitating; but as peace is proclaimed, their fears will doubtless be subside.

Our new mission vessel, the Day Spring, called here last Friday, with seven missionaries on board, one of whom was to be on the neighbouring island, Uea ; but I was immediately informed that I should not have any communication with the shore, as the island was in a state of rebellion. He was requested to leave at once, and not to call at Uea, being also strictly enjoined to leave the new missionary at any time in the group. I asked permission to be allowed to visit the brethren on board, but I lost this anticipated pleasure. On the following day, however, the Commandant gave me his order a little, and permitted me to visit us, and Mrs. Macfarlane to go on board. We were all, as you may suppose, very disappointed and grieved at not being able to see each other, and the more so as our brother was not allowed to go to Uea where the natives are anxiously waiting for him. The French are evidently determined to prevent English missionaries from landing on these islands, and to get rid of those already here as soon as possible. I understand the Governor is sending to France to procure French Protestant ministers for these islands. Perhaps they think they can drive us from the island by annoyances, in which they may possibly be mistaken. They have pitched their camp right opposite, and close to our garden gate ; and although the soldiers seldom come on our premises, yet 'tis very disagreeable to have them constantly prowling about the fence and staring into the house ; but this is as mere dust in the balance. We are not easily driven from a part of "the vineyard" in which God has so greatly blessed us. Pray that we may soon be permitted to resume our labours amongst this interesting people.

Yours in the bonds of Christian fellowship,
S. MACFARLANE.

Home Intelligence.

THE CHURCH AND THE JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF PRIVY COUNCIL.

An unsatisfactory decision of the court of appeal in ecclesiastical causes in the report of the "Essays and Reviews" has set on foot an one section of the Church of England on the task of considering whether a tribunal should not be established for the purpose of enabling the country to have more confidence in its decisions. The High Church party, as might have been expected, have taken the lead in this matter ; and a sort of judicial committee has been formed by the sanction of the Bishop of London, but the ostensible leaders are Lord Cairns and a nobleman who has not, we believe, taken a conspicuous part in the movement, religious or secular, Lord Cairns, a brother of the Duke of Devonshire. The provisional committee prepare a draft of an address setting forth the evils, dwelling upon the evil they were to correct, and the remedies they propose to provide. Those remedies, as set forth in the circular, may be comprised under five or six, any one of which, they suggest, would be the desires of Churchmen, and each of which might be subject to future modification. The most sweeping proposal is to give a final decision in all cases of ecclesiastical law to the Upper House of Convocation. The second is to retain the present Court of the Archbishop and the Judicial Committee of Council, and even to divest it of its present faint ecclesiastical tinge, by withdrawing from it the archbishops and bishops who are now members of the body, but so far fettering its action, that in all cases involving doctrine the court should be bound to refer the matter to a synod of bishops ; and having received the report of that synod, the court should be bound to recommend the Crown to decide the cause in conformity with the synodal judgment. Another plan is that the reference should be not to the Bench of Bishops simply, but to a board of "spiritual persons," with this proviso, that in all cases of doctrine not explicitly settled in the Articles and formularies the board should base its decision on a reference to the Scriptures and to the six ecumenical councils ; and, farther, that the board may ask the assistance of Convocation. Another proposal is that a spiritual court of final appeal on doctrine should be authorised to deprive clerks of their spiritual functions, but leaving to the Judicial Committee the power of dealing with the temporalities. And the last plan is that, leaving the Judicial Committee in the exercise of all its present powers, the Convocation itself should have power to correct all evils as they may arise, by being licensed to make new canons, from time to time, in order to remove ambiguities and correct errors.

It will be observed that all these schemes have for their object and groundwork to extend the power of the hierarchy and make the clerical element omnipotent. There is no room in any of them for the judgment of the enlightened Christian laity. It is probably from this point of view that none of these plans commend themselves to the judgment of the Evangelical clergy. The Record has no confidence in the ecclesiastical powers that have now so much influence in the Church, and warns its readers "not to play the enemy's game, and relinquish the liberties for which England always contended against the Pope and his priests, even in the middle ages." We may add, that the Parliament of England is not likely to give its assent to any of these schemes, or to abandon the principle it has always maintained in these matters, of the supremacy of the Crown—that is, practically of the right of the laity to judge and finally determine for themselves what shall be the doctrines of their Church, and what also the qualifications of its ministers.

THE BISHOP OF SALISBURY'S RECENT CHARGE.

The extraordinary charge of the Bishop of Salisbury has not been allowed to pass without remonstrance. It will be remembered that his lordship recommended for the adoption of his clergy practices that have always hitherto been regarded as peculiar to the Church of Rome, and without the recommendation of any of those safeguards which would prevent them from becoming mere adjuncts to a monastic system. Among these, were periodical seasons of spiritual retreat, and he suggested that some convenient parsonage house might be taken where those of the clergy who felt inclined might put themselves for a time under the charge of a spiritual guide. He followed up this recommendation of a mere mechanical devotion by a lamentation over the isolation to which the Church of England is reduced, in being separated from the Church of France and other Popish churches of the Continent, and avowed it as his opinion that the first advances towards a réunion should come from the Church of England. These new and Romanising opinions, possessed of double weight as they come from the episcopal chair, have been boldly remonstrated against by the Rev. Carr Glyn and the Rev. Talbot Greaves, both of them clergymen in the diocese, who firmly but temperately point out how contrary all this is to the stand taken by our ancestors at the Reformation and to the principles of the National Church. These clergymen deserve, and we are sure they will receive, the thanks of the whole of the Protestants of England for their part at this emergency.

THE NEW CANON OF WESTMINSTER.

The stall in Westminster Abbey by the resignation of Archdeacon Benti been conferred on the Rev. Ernest F the active Secretary of the Society Propagation of the Gospel. It has stated that the appointment was made solicitation of the retiring Archdeacon we can well believe that the expression any wish coming from that quarter have considerable influence. But perhaps, no man who less needed the of such influence to be brought on than the Secretary of the Propagation He could, if need were, enlist the Bench of Bishops, home and colonial side, for there is not one of them the more or less brought into frequent with the Secretary of the Society; as few of the colonial dignitaries, it is as their appointments to a few words from him. For some time past, in has been the moving spring of the and we observe the influence he has is now regarded with some jealousy by those who are otherwise well affected him. It must be added there never shade of a suspicion that he made a use of it.

BRITISH SUBJECTS AND THE SCRIPTURES IN ITALY.

The Rev. J. Davis, Secretary of the Evangelical Alliance, has lately visited Rome and other parts of Italy. Since his return addressed to us the following letter:

Having recently visited some of the cities in Italy, a few facts relative to work and Christian life may not be uninteresting to your readers.

As an official member of the Evangelical Alliance, I was gratified to find much readiness on the part of ministers and their people to enter into a more real and visible union with Christians in Italy than has yet existed. Several branches of this Alliance in several cities. The effect, it is thought, will be both the into affectionate intercourse and co-operation with those who are already one by their union with us, and the lifting up of an important testimony to the fundamental doctrines of Divine Truth by the different Evangelical sections of the Church.

The sale and distribution of the Word of God is carried on extensively, with many prayers for "the entering in of thy Word give it to us." There are twelve depôts for the Bible in Italy, about seventy colporteurs, or Gospel light-bearers, to the town and country populations. I am alone, so long the stronghold of super-and vice, there have been sold within years between one and two thousand Bibles and New Testament, besides tracts and religious publications, and and copies of the Amico di Casa.

A sound Scripture principles is ex- any schools, conducted by teachers of principles, commenced daily with e been established. My inspection of se schools in Milan, Florence, Naples, laces, convinced me of the special im- this branch of Christian work for the aly. The people are willing to place en under Evangelical instruction, and es children have been brought by the educated in these schools. New schools pened, and teachers obtained, well- their Christian character and intelli- ke the management, if only means of e supplied.

s of worship I attended were generally and the truth preached with much fervour. Godly men have been raised places to preach Christ, and are labour- nal proofs of the Divine blessing, but er is small. "Pray ye the Lord of that He would send forth labourers vest." At Florence I had the pleasure in the New Waldensian College a godly from Sicily, now training for the ministry. He had sought for truth salvation, and found it in the Word was staggered by the imposing uni- the Roman Church. He attended the er meetings in Naples in January last, ght what real unity was—unity in one hen decided for Christ as his only and : Saviour, and consecrated his days to he glorious Gospel of the grace of

Also in Florence the Stamperia Claudiana ing-office called after the honoured rin, where it was first established. It is xcellent direction of the Italian Evan- lication Society, and is in constant t in printing Bibles and a great variety reading over every department of reli- ure. It is impossible to overrate the of this establishment as supplying Evangelical knowledge to all Italy. as deepened my interest in the progress el in Italy. The times and circum- favourable to Evangelical effort. There liberty to a very large extent, and the f political events, by widening the ween the Italian Government and the manifest alienation of the people apacy and the priesthood, are favour- spread of sound religious opinions and perations. Prayer is earnestly asked is in Italy that the Gospel day which I may not be darkened by clouds of le tempests of strife, but advance in ess of truth and love, that Italy may : fountain of light to many nations.

On leaving the territory of the Italian Govern- ment and entering the Papal States, I was made to feel the intolerable yoke of priestly power. The following translation of a letter, addressed to Cardinal Antonelli, will explain the circum- stance :—

"Monsignore,—On Saturday, October 1st, coming from Naples by railway, where I crossed into the Roman States, my luggage was searched, and the official took from me an Italian New Testament (Diodati's translation, and without notes) which I had purchased at Naples. I had written the date and place of purchase on the first page; of course, therefore, it was for my own private use. I was told to apply to the police-office at Rome. On doing so the second day after my arrival, and sending in my card, inquiry was made, but I was unsuccessful; my book remains still in the possession of the police.

"Protesting, as I must be allowed to do, against this violation of my right to read God's Word in Italian, or any other language I choose, at Rome, or in any other part of the world—protesting, more strongly still, against the insult offered to Almighty God in committing to the custody of the police, as obnoxious and criminal, that blessed book which His Holy Spirit inspired, for the instruction, consolation, and guidance of mankind, I must respectfully demand its restoration, nor will this act appear in the eyes of many less guilty than that of former times when the Redeemer himself was committed into the hands of the Roman guard. With less excuse, you commit His own Word to the ignominy of the Roman police.

"My name and address will afford you the opportunity of repairing the wrong.—I have the honour to remain, &c., "James Davis.

"Oct. 8th, 1864."

I send you a copy of a letter since received from the British Consul, showing that the above protest has obtained some modification of the Papal opposition, and that in future an Englishman's Bible will be held sacred in Rome :—

"British Consulate, Rome,

"Nov. 12, 1864.

"Sir,—Cardinal Antonelli has requested me to convey to you the Italian New Testament, which arrived in Rome after you had left, and which I send to-day to the Foreign-office, at your disposal, to be called for.

"I have also to communicate the new order which I have been so fortunate as to obtain from the Pontifical Government, 'that for the future no Englishman's Bible is to be touched on his arrival or during his sojourn in Rome'—of course this extends to the Italian translation and editions.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

"Joseph Severn,

"British Consul at Rome."

I remain, faithfully yours,

JAMES DAVIS.

7, Adam-street, Strand, London,

November 21, 1864.

Miscellaneous.

MISSIONARY MATTERS.

INDIA.

Among the recesses of the rugged hills between Tadgurh and Doodárea, in the wild Mugra country (Rajpootana), is alleged to be a wonderful spring, the waters of which well forth audibly the praises of Shiva the Destroyer, by uttering the name "Mahadev," or "the great God," blasphemously ascribed to him by his worshippers. This spring has been visited by the Rev. Mr. Shoolbred and Dr. Valentine, of the United Presbyterian Mission, the former of whom gives a most interesting and humorous account of what they saw and heard. Their guide conducted them to a spot where, amid the deepest shade, was a fountain shaped like a horseshoe, from whose rather muddy waters trickled away a tiny brook. There was a small temple and an altar adjacent, with sundry symbolical objects. A Joggy, almost naked, and besmeared with ashes, the guardian of the place, having gone through some preliminary ceremony, proceeded with the guide to invoke the god. "Shaken by the vibrations of the air, as they shout, the water becomes troubled, and up from its miry bottom rise large blobs and bubbles of gas, that, as they touch the surface, burst with a slight sound in mimicry of the worshippers' cry. This, then, was the voice of Mahadev.

Enough it was [says Mr. Shoolbred] to hold one's nose over the seething spring, to discover the inspiring cause of this aqueous turmoil. Faugh! rotten eggs is a joke to its concentrated stink. "Sulphuretted hydrogen!" shout the doctor and myself simultaneously. . . . The water in the cold morning air had a temperature of upwards of eighty degrees, and was sweetish to the taste with just a slight soupy of rotten eggs. A thermal spring was before us, the first we had met with in India. . . . A bright idea struck me: I would set up a rival to Mahadev. To save cold seats of chabutra stones, the doctor's man carries for his master's use a patent air cushion; seizing this, I rapidly inflate it, and inserting its nozzle beneath the water, give a sudden squeeze. Up in myriads dance the rollicking air bells, breaking pop, pop on the surface, with a noise that throws Mahadev's mild performance quite into the shade. "Ho, ho, Shiva! you are quite outdone!" I shout. At this prodigy, the Joggy rolled his eyes in terror, and turned to run from the haunted spring; while the simple farmers, in whose minds fear and wonder struggled for the mastery, were ready to throw themselves at my feet, and acknowledge that a greater than Mahadev was there. Laughingly, I then explained to them the cause of the commotion: a little air, generated in the rocks beneath, finding vent along with the welling spring. But I am doubtful if they understood my explanations, or did not prefer to believe in the prodigy's supernatural origin, and in the more powerful jadu (magic) of the sahib, which could beat even Mahadev on his own chosen ground.

The guardian of the fountain deemed it so polluted by the touch of the English missionaries, that he forthwith proceeded to perform sundry ceremonies, in order to appease Mahadev, and to restore it to its original purity. The missionaries went on to the nearest village, and gathered an audience, whom they pointed to that Divine fountain for sin and uncleanness, which can cleanse the guiltiest of that stain which unnumbered washings in the spring of Mahadev, or gifts at the shrine of the god, could never wipe away.

While travelling in the hill tracts of Orissa, the Rev. J. O. Goadby, of the Geneva Baptist Society, was informed that a Roman Catholic priest had been endeavouring to make the Khonds "all Christians," by getting them to wear round their necks four or eight small pieces, and by repeating a prayer in an unknown language. He only obtained two or three converts, and was viewed generally with suspicion. At length, he was driven out of the village and compelled to descend the ghauts, and his chapel and house, with all his goods and chattels, burnt to the ground. The difficulty and peril of travelling down these ghauts Mr. Goadby thus describes:—

Road there was none—to walk down quietly was impossible, the descent was so steep; we had often to leap from stone to stone, and in some places a false step would have sent us spinning to the bottom of the gorge, full 400 feet in depth! I looked with wonder on our two Khond coolies as they bounded from stone to stone—they might have been taught their native dance by going up and down such roads as these. They never took a false step, whilst our legs were constantly shooting from under us. Several of the stones were brightly polished by the feet of the past generations of Khonds who had crossed and recrossed them in their journeys to and from the markets in the low country. This real Khond turnpike was four miles in length, and in that distance the descent was 3,500 feet.

We lately referred to the revival among the inmates of the Leper House at Almora (p. 517). It still continues, and thirteen more of these poor sufferers have been baptized. Twenty-one of the ninety-two inmates now profess Christianity, and there are others under a good impression. A Rajpoot convert has also been baptized, who was first convinced while listening to the preaching in the bazaars, more than twelve months ago. This was after the missionary, as he himself tells us, had given up all thought of witnessing himself, on earth, any direct result from that effort.

The Telugu Church missions have been lately visited by the Rev. W. Gray, who writes :—

In eight villages at different distances from Bezvara, people of the Mala caste have been coming for instruction, by two or threes ; and the interesting part of it is, that there does not seem to be any motive whatever of a secular kind in their minds, beyond that of a desire, perhaps, to know more, or, generally, to raise themselves in the scale of society. A considerable body of these people have come over to the missionaries of the American Lutheran Mission, in the Palnau (near Guntur) ; and the missionaries of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, and of the London Missionary Society, in Cuddapah, have likewise inquirers amongst them. Those of them I have seen seem to me decidedly of a superior class to the Pariahs of the south. It will be interesting to watch the movement ; and certainly, so far as Baghapur is concerned, it seems to be of God.

A young man named Krishna, of the Goundi, or mason caste, has been baptized at Puna, by the Rev. James Mitchell, of the Free Church Mission. "On coming to the mission-house," writes Mr. Mitchell, "he handed to me a purse of rupees, from which hitherto all his expenses have been defrayed ; so that he has not put us to a farthing's expense—a rather uncommon occurrence in a case of this kind." There was the usual scene with the convert's relatives ; in which they tried what could be done by tears, loud outcries, falling at his feet, tearing their own hair, &c., &c. ; and when these tactics failed, they poured upon him all the imprecations and curses they could devise. Subsequently their conduct was still more violent, but Krishna was able to remain firm throughout.

CEYLON.

At the Nellore station of the Church Missionary Society, the Rev. Mr. M'Arthur has been privileged to baptize, on one occasion, thirty individuals. Some were young, but the majority were men and women in the prime of life. All the adults had passed through the usual probation, and they were all able to give a reason for the hope that was in them. During last year there were more than forty baptisms at this station. In the Kandy country, in one village, Talampitiya, twelve adults have been received into the Christian Church ; and in another, Potuhæra, a convert, threw off his priest's robes, and gave up a considerable income, derived from his pansala, or temple, to become a Christian.

CHINA.

In connexion with the Ningpo Church Mission, some promise of fruit from among the Manichæans has been blighted by the precautions of the priests. One man indeed has been admitted to the Lord's table after public profession of faith and recantation of Popish error ; but a second, who had manifested a spirit of earnest inquiry, and had received a New Testament, had been got out of the way of Protestant influence by being sent to a distant city, as agent of the Heaven's Charity Society (for the baptism of heathen infants) ; and a third had been sent upon a similar mission elsewhere. Itinerating work is being earnestly prosecuted in this district ; but the time of harvest is not yet. We are told that "With the scholars, 'How shall I give up my ancestral worship ?' and with the working classes, 'What shall I eat ?' are questions which check and smother many a rising thought of conviction and penitance."

It appears, from the statements of the Church missionaries, that with the downfall of the Taepings, the old idolatry, which had received such heavy blows at the hands of those insurgents, is being restored ; the idol-temples are being rebuilt, and idol services resumed.

WEST AFRICA.

The sanguinary war between the Egbas and Ibadans, which has so long obstructed missionary effort in the Yoruba Country, is now happily at an end. The Egbas (people of Abbeokuta) had, one day, set themselves in array for battle, when, to their astonishment, the Ibadans came out, unarmed and in a begging attitude. They approached and prostrated themselves on the ground, and throwing dirt on their heads, begged for peace. Though there was an engagement subsequent to this, in which three Ijebu towns were destroyed, and a large number of captives taken by the Egbas, peace is now fully restored.

A missionary of the American Board at the Gaboon reminds us of the fact which we have already noticed, that some four years since, in connexion with the Week of Prayer, in January, an increased religious interest commenced among his people. We are glad now to learn, from a communication which lies before us, that that interest has never entirely subsided. Our correspondent writes :—

There has been no time since when there were not inquirers, and scarcely a quarterly communion season has passed without one or more having been baptized and received to the Church. Within the past year ten persons have been added to our mission church, and five have been removed by death, all of whom died in peace, trusting in the merits of that Redeemer in whose service they had, with loving hearts, engaged. Several persons have applied for baptism at our next sacramental occasion, and a still larger number profess to be seeking the way of life. Will not the readers of Evangelical Christendom who love our Lord Jesus Christ, and pray for the establishment of His kingdom on earth, especially remember in their supplications this central portion of the great vineyard in Africa, which has so long been a moral desert, but where spiritual vegetation is beginning to appear.

There is a most commendable movement in connexion with the Baptist mission at the Cameroons River. The Church members there have established a small fund to redeem from slavery any of their number. An aged woman, an inquirer, and the wife of one of the members, has thus been rescued.

SOUTH AFRICA.

The following revolting case of Kaffir superstition and cruelty is related by the Rev. W. B. Rayner, of the Morley (Wesleyan) Mission Station :—

A short distance from our station a man discovered the common "lung sickness" among his cattle, and employed a doctor to "smell out" the man who had bewitched them. After the performance of the usual ceremonies the man's nephew was pointed out as the guilty person. He was immediately seized and secured to one of the posts of his house, and a large fire made in front of him. After enduring the most frightful torture he was at length induced to confess—of course to a lie. They then loosened him and dragged him to the place where he pretended to discover the poison by which he had bewitched the cattle. This is done to secure the credit of the doctor. He was then taken back to his house, fastened again to the post, the fire rekindled, and fuel enough added to finish the work of destruction, while his friends and relatives coolly sat down outside to smoke their pipes and listen to his yells of agony. His torture commenced at mid-day, and his last groan was heard at midnight of the following day : thus thirty-six hours he was slowly roasted to death, and then he was dragged to the nearest precipice and thrown over to be food for birds of prey. . . . And these people have been living for years near a mission station, holding free intercourse with our people, and occasionally attending the house of God !

MADAGASCAR.

Though the recently-appointed Prime Minister of Madagascar is not professedly a Christian, his tendencies are said to be favourable to religion and civilization. The people in general are quite satisfied with the new Government.

Ambohimanga, the ancient capital of the Hovas, and the burial-place of their kings, has been visited by Mr. Ellis. The city is held peculiarly sacred as the head-quarters of idolatry, and the Christians are required to worship without its walls. Yet this restriction does not appear to operate practically to the injury of Christianity. Mr. Ellis ordained two native pastors and eight deacons. He was much pleased with the simple earnestness of the people, both here and at Ambohipanja, where he also ordained native teachers.

BRITISH AMERICA.

On the plains of the Saskatchewan, and around portions of the base of the Rocky Mountains, where the Rev. Mr. Woolsey, of the Wesleyan Society, has been labouring for more than nine years, he and a colleague have administered more than seven hundred baptisms. It is marvellous, we are told, with what tenacity many have held on to the doctrines of their faith and maintained the life and power of godliness, without the assistance of missionaries or ordinances. Others, however, in the absence of pastoral supervision, have been seduced by the errors of Romanism.

POLYNESIA.

An important letter from the missionary of the London Society stationed at one of the Loyalty Islands will be found at an earlier page, describing a most unwarrantable and cruel aggression upon the natives, ending in usurpation of their little island home, the loss of life, the suppression of Protestant worship, and the destruction of mission property. The French authorities in the South Seas are the instrument in the commission of these evil deeds; the propagandism of Popish priests, working according to its accustomed methods, the motive power.

We regret to record the death of the Rev. J. M. Mills, of the London Mission in Samoa. Mr. Mills only entered on his career in the early part of 1863. He and Mrs. Mills (daughter of Dr. Turner) were both children of the fathers of the Samoan mission, and were the first thus related to follow their example. They were received with unusual delight by the natives, whose grief at the loss of their favourite missionary is now most poignant.

The Directors of the London Missionary Society have resolved, with the least possible delay, to provide a successor to the missionary ship John Williams, the loss of which we reported last month. The amount contributed by the juvenile friends of the society, for the purchase and support of that ship, was not less than twenty thousand pounds. They will, no doubt, display equal liberality in providing the means for the purchase and fitting out of a new vessel. The John Williams was only insured for about half the sum which will be required for that purpose. The young people of Australia connected with the society were loving in the matter, before the news which rendered such action necessary had reached this country.

Literature.

Epistles of St. Paul, for English Readers. By C. J. VAUGHAN, D.D. 1. The First Epistle to the Thessalonians. Macmillan and Co.

The object of Dr. Vaughan is "to enable English readers, unacquainted with the Greek language, to enter with intelligence into the meaning, connexion, and phraseology of the writings of the great Apostle." We cannot disguise from ourselves the fact that this undertaking is as difficult as it is important, but we have the satisfaction of knowing that to other qualifications Dr. Vaughan adds that of an accurate and experienced Greek scholar. His plan, as described by himself, is, to preface every Epistle with an introduction supplying such information as can be gathered from Scripture respecting the circumstances, design, and order of its composition. Secondly, the authorised version is printed in paragraphs, with brief running comment. In the third place, we have a new and literal English translation, in which elegance is sacrificed to exactness, and to which a few less literal renderings are appended as notes. Fourthly, there is a condensed paraphrase, intended to show the connexion and course of thought in the Epistle. Lastly, there are notes applying doctrinal explanations and verbal illustrations. It may be added, that in arranging the Epistles what is regarded as their chronological order is adopted, commencing with the first to the Thessalonians.

There are several excellent features in this plan, but we certainly wish the author had allowed himself to introduce illustrations and explanations of the text not supplied by the Scripture itself. A few brief notes bearing upon history, biography, etymology, and topography, would have been acceptable to many. The casual allusions which we find in this specimen to classic authorities, show that such sources may be drawn upon with advantage. We fully believe that Scripture is its own best interpreter; but this applies, above all, to doctrinal and moral teachings. Let us hope, then, that as his work advances, Dr. Vaughan will be less limited to a rigid adherence to Scripture illustrations only.

With regard to the text upon which the translation is based, it is almost exclusively that of Dr. Tischendorf in his seventh edition of the Greek Testament. In comparing Dr. Vaughan's translation with this, we have noted only one or two slight deviations from it. Whether this is the best of all texts, we cannot venture to determine, but it is probably as good as any other; certainly its authority stands very high among those who rely most upon the more ancient documents. It is to be expected, however, that when Dr. Tischendorf republishes it, he will sometimes alter it in favour of his great discovery, the Sinaitic Codex.

Dr. Vaughan's introduction requires no remark from us, but that it is a very skilful arrangement of the materials supplied by the New Testament; and that we should have liked it still better if it had taken in a rather wider range. Precisely the same observations apply to what we may call the commentary on the Epistle, as we have already hinted in speaking of the plan of the work. Of the paraphrase we may say that it is well fitted for its purpose, being not longer, but shorter than the text, and exhibiting in the briefest form the course of the Apostle's thought. The authorised English version speaks for itself, but we are not sure that in this work it ought to have had the post of honour. Upon the new version we could speak more fully. It unquestionably displays a close familiarity with the uses and idioms of the Greek language, and any one who reads it may in the main feel assured that the Greek is speaking to him. But for all this, we fear that it is too baldly literal; in fact, unnecessarily and painfully so. Such a close construing of the Epistle reminds us of school or college, and will only raise new difficulties to the unlearned. And even when the nakedly literal is departed from it sometimes seems not to convey a clearer idea. Thus at the very outset we read of "the congregation of Thessalonians, in God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ," where our version has "the Church of the Thessalonians, which is in God the Father and in the Lord Jesus Christ." If "congregation" here and again chap. ii. 14, is a better rendering than "church," there is no word for "church" in the New Testament. Again, v. 3, we have "toil of love, and patience of hope of our Lord Jesus Christ, before God our Father; knowing, brethren beloved by God, the selection of you, that our Gospel become not unto you in word only," &c. We could say several things here, but we only say that we are not convinced of the need for omitting "and" in the phrase which our version renders "of God and our Father;" the Greek simply is "the God and Father of us." This applies also to chap. iii. 11, 13, in which we find the same construction. Neither do we see any need for putting "selection" where we have been used to "election;" nor for always translating the Greek word ginomai by "become." For this last we can find no sufficient reason, because Dr. Vaughan does not always render the same Greek words by the same English. Had he adopted this rule, we should have wondered, because he is too good a scholar not to see that two words fundamentally synonymous may widely differ in subordinate and secondary applications.

We are quite sure that some parts of the new translation will not be plain to mere English readers. For instance, chap. ii. 5, "For neither did we ever become in language of flattery, even as ye know; nor in a pretext of grasping, God is witness; nor seeking out of other men glory, neither from you nor from others," &c. This may be understood, but let no one imagine that the Greek was not clearer to a Greek than the English is to an Englishman. Here, then, we may introduce a second observation akin to one recently made—that, as words fundamentally synonymous may differ in their secondary applications, requiring us to translate them according to the sense in which they are used; so also regard must be had to idioms, or the way in which words are connected together. Idioms must be translated as well as words; and if so, we suggest that Dr. Vaughan might have improved his version of such passages as that we have just quoted. As it stands, it is a compromise, neither strictly literal nor properly idiomatic; and the very circumstance that some freedom has been taken by the translator shows that he admits our principle, and it suggests regret that he did not carry it further. Although our old translation might be mended in form, it will never be improved as a substantially correct representation of the Apostle's thought in this passage. There are places where it is doubtless wrong, but its generally masculine, vigorous, and idiomatic style constantly commands our admiration. But Dr. Vaughan has avowedly sacrificed style; "elegance," he says, "has been intentionally sacrificed to exactness, and the English idiom disregarded for the Greek." So be it; it is an experiment, perhaps, worth making, but we shall see whether, even under such favourable auspices, it is likely to be successful. Our expectation is that it will not answer, because it is a philological axiom with us that idioms are as much a part of language as words, and that no translation is properly such which does not render both so far as perspicuity requires.

Yet, after all, this labour may be useful to two classes. To one class the notes will supply many valuable hints as to the sense and bearing of the separate portions; to another and less numerous class the minutely and meagrely literal version will furnish matter for close and careful study. Our serious conviction is that if Dr. Vaughan will allow himself a little more freedom in his version, and a little more scope in his notes, he is able to produce a work which may be an honour to himself and a blessing to multitudes.

The Genius of the Gospel: a Homiletical Commentary on the Gospel of St. Matthew. By DAVID THOMAS, D.D. Edited by the Rev. WILLIAM WEBSTER, M.A. Jackson, Walford, and Hodder.

THIS is a substantial octavo volume, containing altogether about 750 pages, and 120 homilies or short discourses upon St. Matthew's Gospel. The editor, Mr. Webster, is favourably known for his critical labours upon the New Testament and its original language. He has supplied an introduction and a certain number of notes. As might be expected, he passes a very high commendation upon the work itself. We mention this because Mr. Webster, as an earnest Evangelical clergyman, and a scholar, is deservedly recognised as authority. The "Homilies" themselves form a continuous commentary upon the first Gospel, and in one sense now appear for the third time before the public, inasmuch as they have been preached before the author's congregation, and they have been published in the successive volumes of the Homilist, of which Dr. Thomas is the editor. From the nature of the case, these discourses are not characterised by much verbal criticism. Their author has rather laboured to develop the course of thought and logical connexion, the moral and religious truths, and the practical bearing of the sections upon which he has dilated. Much original thought, vigour of language, and depth of sentiment, are the characteristics of this volume. Private persons and preachers will find in it many things, both "new and old," which tend to edification. There are individual passages to which we should object, either because we do not accept the interpretation offered to us, or because the phraseology is somewhat eccentric. But the severity of criticism is disarmed by various considerations. First, the author is deeply in earnest in setting forth the truth; secondly, the successive sections must sometimes have been produced amid difficulties; and lastly, Mr. Webster reminds us that this work is fully entitled to the benefit of the Horatian rule, that where there are many excellences we must not take offence at a few defects. Mr. Webster gives us Horace's Lathe, but with two mistakes, one of which is that the word incuria is printed circuria, which has no meaning at all. We suspect a few similar blunders will be found in the body of the book. Nevertheless, we repeat our generally favourable estimate and recommendation of the work.

n of the Gospel of St. John (Explication de l'Evangile selon Saint Jean). By J. F. THIRD and LAST Part. Paris and Cherbuliez.

concluding part of a commentary already noticed in our number for last month, emboldened as it would seem by the success of his work, has now for the first time put his name. We are particularly struck in which Professor Astié develops the successive trains of thought in an ever-memorable conversation of our Lord with the Apostles on the night of His betrayal. Every reader can meditate upon those five chapters in our commentator's company without regret, for he has drawn something more than his share of their incomparable and inexhaustible resources, and to the selection from his writings and the arrangement of characteristic passages, which thus present his true intellectual and moral portraiture. This has been done carefully and judiciously. We have, first, what the Reformer has said about his own life and writings, this series of extracts forming a sort of autobiography. Then come specimens of his labours as a commentator upon God's Word; followed by others, of his teaching upon dogmatic theology. Portions of his sermons next bring him before us as a preacher. A section entitled "Thoughts," with an appendix, embrace selections of a miscellaneous character, and thus complete the work. The whole is preceded by a fac-simile of Calvin's handwriting, and is dedicated to the Evangelical Alliance.

g and thorough vindication of the truth of the Gospel of John, forming the first part of the introduction, is also very valuable. The arbitrary criticism of the school of Grotius and other impugnors of the genuineness of the Gospel, is met and exposed in a masterly and satisfactory manner. Among the separate essays in the introduction we were much pleased to find an essay on the object and plan of John's Gospel, among those of the appendix we noticed an essay that on our blessed Lord's way of thinking, and on the choice of the future of the Church and Apostles.

er, we must congratulate our French friends on the addition of this—in every sense—a valuable volume to their religious literature.

en France; ou, les Traductions des Saintes Ecritures. Etude Historique et Littéraire. Par EMANUEL PETAVEL. Librairie Française et Etrangère.

EL is the earnest and faithful pastor of the Church in London. He has here proposed a popular and attractive form for the results of his research and painstaking. As a monograph of French translations and early French editions of the Bible, it will be praised by the scholar and collector; whilst many striking facts will give it value to all who feel an interest in the history of French Christianity, or in the world of death and sin delight to witness the progress and triumphs of the Lively après Calvin. Fragments Extraits des Œuvres du Réformateur. Par C. O. VIGUET. Paris: Cherbuliez.

remembrance of the great Genevan Reformer, whatever relates to him, have been so carefully collected in the present volume of Christendom may refer to this work with greater interest than might otherwise have been required. The title indicates, nothing less than Calvin himself—that is to say, as he stands before the imperishable productions of his own mind, the work of the editors is limited to a brief in-

Sketches from the Life of the Rev. Charles Smith Bird, M.A., F.L.S. By the Rev. CLAUDE SMITH BIRD, M.A. Nisbet and Co.

THE name of Mr. Bird being scarcely known to us, we took up this volume with languid expectation, but we had not read many pages till we found that a delightful addition has been made to our stores of Christian biography. Mr. Bird was a man of very superior powers, and of still finer culture: a classical scholar, a mathematician, a naturalist. From early life he was influenced in all his ways by a vital and pervasive piety, which gave a beautiful completeness and charm to his character, and secured for him the affection of many of the excellent of the earth—in anecdotes and sketches of whom this volume abounds. Great part of it is in the form of autobiography, and it is told with delightful frankness and vivacity, as well as with a habitual and edifying reference to the "exceeding abundant" grace of God.

The Road and the Resting Place. By GRACE PRATT CHALMERS. Nisbet and Co.

FULL of original thought, vividly realising the great truths of the Gospel, and bright with the beauty of holiness, these meditations are the fitting memorial of one who loved much, and who suffered much, as "seeing Him who is invisible." The shortness of each portion, and their subdued and tender tone, especially adapt them to the use of invalids and mourners in Zion; but they will be prized by all to whom the truth as it is in Jesus is precious. It ought surely to have been stated, and would enhance the enjoyment of many readers if they knew, that the writer was the daughter of that most illustrious of Christian philosophers and preachers, Dr. Chalmers.

A Memorial Sketch of the late Rev. George Bannerman Blake, M.A. With a Selection from his Sermons. Nisbet and Co.

THE records of Mr. Blake's life are the records of early piety, great devotion to the cause of God, a brilliant promise of a long career of honour and usefulness in the Church, and, as men would say, an untimely summons from below. The memoir is due to the affectionate wishes of those who would treasure his remembrance, and is properly termed "A Memorial." Though not so minute in some of its details as we could have wished, it is fitted to awaken our lively interest in its subject. Mr. Blake was born, we presume, at Aberdeen, where he commenced his studies, which were completed at Edinburgh. He then went on a continental tour, after which he preached first in Dumfriesshire, and next at Montrose. He then removed, in July, 1856, to Sunderland, where he continued seven years, until his death, in 1863. The account furnished of his labours, piety, and personal excellences is interesting and instructive, and may fully justify us in strongly recommending it to the attention especially of young ministers and candidates for that holy calling. A very excellent sermon, preached on the occasion of his death, by Dr. Anderson, is added, along with other documents, testifying to his worth and the sorrow caused by his removal. Nineteen of his sermons, and various addresses here given, prove him to have been an earnest, faithful, affectionate, and gifted preacher. By these, "he being dead, yet speaketh," and doubtless they will be read with profit by many who knew, heard, and admired him, as well as by others. We need not add a word of praise in commendation of this book.

Wonderful Works; or, the Miracles of Christ.
By A CLERGYMAN'S DAUGHTER. The Religious Tract Society.

THERE have been many expositions of the miracles of our Lord, popular and scientific; and it is a healthy sign of the religious life among us that the demand for them is steadily on the increase. The little work now before us is the latest of these expositions, and we are confident it will not be found the least valuable. Under the unpretending form of Sunday afternoon conversations between a mother and her children, the leading features of the miracles are prominently brought out, the difficulties connected with some of them fairly and honestly grappled with, and the great lessons they were intended to teach affectionately inculcated. The framework in which the lessons are set is, as will be seen, simple in the extreme, but it must not be supposed that the expositions are therefore superficial. In fact, we have again and again, in perusing these pages, been struck with the natural, simple, and easy manner in which the writer has contrived to popularise the results of wide, comprehensive, and profound reading, and made familiar to the intelligence of children the fruits of the scholarship of such men as Trench, Alford, Bird Sumner, and other scientific and able expositors. To Christian mothers who are in search of a text-book for pleasant religious conversation with their children, as well as to the teachers of the advanced Bible-classes in our Sunday-schools, we warmly recommend this little volume. It well deserves to find a place in every Sunday-school library.

God's Way of Holiness. By HORATIUS BONAR, D.D. James Nisbet and Co.

WE are glad to meet with Dr. Bonar once more. There is a freshness and a vigorous earnestness, a transparency and a scriptural fidelity in what he writes, which can hardly fail to secure attention. In this book he has taken up the great practical side of Christianity, "holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord." He has treated this under various aspects, and in different relations, in a series of nine chapters, to which an appendix of notes has been added. He begins with a lucid explanation of the "new life" and its importance, and then shows how Christ is for us, and the Spirit in us. Next he displays "the root and all of holiness," peace and love. From this he passes on to consider "strength against sin," "the Cross and its power," "the saint and the law," and "the Saint and the seventh of Romans." "The true creed and the true life," forms the subject of the next chapter, and the last comprises counsels and warnings. We deeply feel the need of books like this at the present day, amid the rage for merely intellectual treatises upon religion, and the neglect of spiritual and Evangelical representations of truth, duty, and doctrine. We want that which speaks to the conscience, heart, and life, as well as that which speaks only to reason. Therefore we thank Dr. Bonar sincerely for this timely utterance in behalf of great principles and duties, and we earnestly hope that, as containing vital truth, it may be blessed to the souls of many.

Petros—Petra—Kleis: The Stone—the Rock—the Keys. A Commentary. Hamilton, Adams, and Co.

THIS is a singular book. The aim of the author appears to be to show that "sacerdotalism" has no real foundation in the passage upon which it mainly relies, Matt. xvi. 16—19. There is, naturally enough, a constant application of the arguments deduced to the claims of the Pope. The author writes with considerable earnestness, and manifest sincerity, and what he says may often help to strengthen our actual conviction, that, whatever our Lord intended, He did not mean what is asserted by the advocates of Papal and of sacerdotal powers. On many points we quite agree with our author, but we do not think he has been successful in his choice either of the title or the arrangement of his work.

Monthly Retrospect.

FOREIGN.

of Europe have now assumed a more settled aspect than they have worn for the past. How long the tranquillity may last, is a question no man can answer, but at present it would appear that the difficulties which have so long disturbed the continent are cleared, and no new ones have yet sprung up in their room. War has been disposed of. Exhausted Europe sinks back languid, and everywhere one hears of settled peace, of relaxed effort, of reduced armaments, of diminished expenditures. It is anticipated that our own country will partake of the general relief, and as well as elsewhere, the disappearance of threatening elements from the horizon will have a salutary and a sensible effect upon our burdens. We fervently pray that these signs may not be overcast, both for our own sake and for that of our Continental since there is a total absence of political excitement. Ministers are engaged in preparing the budget for 1866, for it is their custom to prepare the estimate of their expenses far in advance; and it is said that the Ministry will, for the first time, show a surplus of income over expenditure. This good news, of course, tends still further to soothe the already contented people. But while political matters are so stagnant, religious questions are discussed with as much zeal as ever. Pamphlets continue to pour from the press, examining the proposed evacuation of Rome from a religious point of view. The Ultramontanes see in it nothing less than the advent of chaos, in which the Government will be the chief sufferer. The temper of the Pope himself is indicated, not only by the incidents to which our esteemed correspondent refers, but by the fact that his Holiness withholds his recognition from the newly-appointed Bishop of Turin, on the sole ground that he has not shown much zeal on behalf of the temporal power. While the Romanists are thus busy, the Protestants have causes of anxiety and their own. Our correspondent's account of the Evangelical Conference at Alais is interesting; but the great interest at present centres round the approaching election of the Presbyterian Councils and Consistories. By the decision of the first meeting, the right of election is vested in all professing Protestants who are upwards of thirty years of age. Both the orthodox and heterodox parties are making extraordinary efforts to secure the suffrages of the electors. The Evangelicals, says our correspondent, work hard. There are many friends of Christ in this country who will join them in the discharge of their duty.

The Italian Parliament has, by a large majority, passed the measure for the transfer of the French troops from Turin to Florence. There is no doubt that the other provisions of the law will be agreed to in like manner; as not the delegates only, but also the people have a strong desire to leave nothing undone to facilitate the departure of the French. The two years which have yet to elapse are looked forward to with much interest, and no small amount of apprehension; for it is well understood that priest and despot, will leave no stone unturned to induce the French Emperor to prolong his engagement and prolong the stay of his troops. But the delay has its beneficial effects. For two whole years the question of the temporal power of Rome is certain to be discussed, not in Italy only, but throughout Roman Catholic Europe, and discussed with interest, and a practical purpose, such as was never known before. The result of such discussions are already producing a well set forth in the letter of our correspondent, who shows that, in one quarter after another, the hold which the temporal power had on the mind is becoming loosened, one old supporter after another is falling away, that in the face of events he can no longer maintain that doctrine. That darkness on the prospects of Italy is undoubted, but there are also bright and even gleams of light.

Our German correspondent takes up the greater portion of his letter with a narrative of the life and labours of the late Pastor Fliedner. Along with this we call attention to another of our valued correspondents, Miss Florence Nightingale, on the same subject. From her communications our readers will derive an idea of the man as he was, and of the true lesson we ought to learn from his labours and his death. With regard to Germany itself, it partakes of the general tranquillity. The affairs of Schleswig-Holstein are not yet settled, and it is easy to see that the smaller states are by no means satisfied with the course of events. There are many who will be ready to re-echo our correspondent's words—that it was hardly worth while to separate the Duchies from Denmark, if they are only to be added to Prussia. It will be seen that the Archbishop of Cologne is dead, and it is feared that the Ultramontanes will secure the appointment of his successor.

We wish emphatically to direct the attention of our readers to a communication we have received from one of the missionaries in the Loyalty Islands, in the Pacific, detailing a series of outrages on the part of the French authorities in that distant region, so gross and lawless, that we should find it difficult to believe them on any less authority. The Protestant missionaries have been labouring on these islands for some years, and with very marked success. In the Island of Lifu, where the aggression has just taken place, the Gospel has been preached since 1841; and though encountering some opposition, the missionaries have succeeded in bringing over nearly the whole population to Christianity. Among the few remaining hostile was one of the chiefs, who, finding that he could not persuade the people to continue in their old heathen state, went to the French settlements of New Caledonia, and brought back with him a Roman Catholic mission. No opposition whatever was offered to them, but as their proselytising efforts were exerted in vain, they appealed to the civil power. The Governor of New Caledonia listened to their application, sent over his troops, took military possession of the island, closed the Protestant chapels and schools, imprisoned or banished the native teachers, and the presence of the English missionaries is tolerated only because they are Englishmen. It does not appear that religious, so much as political motives, influence this truculent French Governor. He dreads the prevalence of the English language and English ideas, and it is said that he would have no objection to the location of French Protestant missionaries to carry on the work he has so ruthlessly interrupted. But the Romish priests, of course, have no such intentions. We want to know whether this is not a case for the interference of our Government? It is true our Foreign office has persistently refused to accept the protectorate of any of these islands; but that is no reason why unoffending English subjects should be interrupted in their work, or why the English name should thus have contempt poured upon it by an ally that professes itself to be in cordial relations with us. A deputation to Lord Russell, to elicit his views on the subject, seems to be imperatively demanded.

The communication from our Turkish correspondent supplies us with the sequel of the interesting case of the Turkish confessor we published last month. It appears that the man had no sooner selected the place of his banishment, and gone there, than his worst fears were realised, and he was thrown into prison. He was not without friends, however; his case was at once brought before the Grand Vizier at Constantinople, who sent immediate instructions for his release, with orders that he should not be further molested. This may be the inauguration of a happier era; but it is to be noted that the agents of the oldest mission there have no confidence in the zeal of our Ambassador, Sir Henry Bulwer, and fondly look back to the administration of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, when they were maintained in the same amount of freedom as the other denominations, without any of those terrible consequences the apprehension of which seems to unnerve the mind of Sir Henry Bulwer.

The great event in America during the last month has been the election of President Mr. Lincoln has been re-elected by an immense majority; only three out of all the States in the Union voting for his opponent. There is certainly something sublime in the spectacle of a whole people, who have already suffered so much from war, deliberately deciding to accept as their ruler the man who is pledged to a continuance of that war till all the purposes for which it was begun are accomplished, in place of one who was believed, rightly or wrongly, to be ready to terminate it on the first favourable pretext. The apprehension, real or pretended, of insurrection, riot, and bloodshed, which were so industriously spread in this country, as likely to follow on the re-election of Mr. Lincoln, proved to be baseless; the country was never more quiet than on the day of election. The darkest side of the intelligence is, that there is little prospect of a return to peace on any terms. The South shows as little inclination to submit as the North does to desist. A proposal was made by some of the Southern governors that they should call out the slaves to take part in the war; but President Davis, in a recent message to Congress, argues that the South is not yet reduced to that extremity; the lords of the Southern soil and of their black chattels are still is enough and high-spirited enough to fight their own battles. It is to be observed no quarter is there any fear expressed that if the slaves were armed they would turn their masters; but perhaps the fear may be there, though they are too proud expression to it. On the side of the North the contest resolves itself more and more one for the abolition of slavery. If we may trust to a speech delivered on the eve election by Mr. Seward, Congress at its next meeting will be asked for, and will proceed to pass, an act for the total abolition of slavery. It is gratifying to observe, the letter of our correspondent, that in the din and expenditure of war the cause of does not suffer.

HOME.

we may believe some of our contemporaries, the Ministers, or a portion of them, actually the surrender of the appointment of bishops, not into the hands of the people, or even ergy of a diocese, but into the hands of the now existing bishops, practically allowing nitary to name his own successor. The plan takes its rise from the present position of of Exeter, and is to work in this way: It is well known that the bishop of that has long desired some relaxation from the onerous duties of his diocese, and is for the nomination of an assistant, or suffragan bishop. Hitherto the Government sted his application; but it is now said to be in contemplation to give him more asks for. He is to be allowed to name two persons, one of whom the Crown hoose, to be his present assistant and future successor. Such a precedent once led, would, of course, soon find many imitators; and the right, always heretofore y guarded by the Crown, of nominating the bishops, would be practically exed. We do not believe that such a course will ever be adopted by Her Majesty's advisers, or if it were, that it would be tolerated by the Church. Nor even, if it odified, as it possibly would be, by taking the clergy of the diocese into account, he laity suffer the nomination of bishops to be thus wrested out of their hands. ie late discussions respecting the salary of Professor Jowett has raised up a curious rray in another direction. The rejection of the proposition to increase the salary Professor was followed, as our readers are aware, by a proposition for the apnt of a committee to consider the whole question of the endowment of the Greek i Oxford, and from what funds, if any, that endowment ought to proceed. As this otion which pledged no one to an agreement in the erroneous teaching of the Prond was a matter that deeply concerned the well-being of the University, it was to by all parties, and the committee is now engaged in its researches. And it apat some of them have stumbled upon some old charters, from which they say that n and Canons of the College of Christ Church are the proper parties by whom owment ought to be made, as they received certain grants of land in the reign of VIIIL., on the express condition that the Greek and some other chairs should be enut of those funds. This statement has called forth Dr. Liddell, the Dean of Christ who does vigorous battle for himself and his brethren, and declares that, after a search through the entries in the College books, he can find no evidence that any of their laws was granted to them on condition of their endowing the Greek but he adds that, if others should be able to show that the obligation does, after upon his College, he will immediately call together his brethren, and propose to hat would be fair and just in the case.

e regret to have to record the death of Mr. Richard Spooner, M.P. for North kahire, in his eighty-third year. Mr. Spooner was, in political matters, a Tory of school, a Protectionist, and an advocate of an inconvertible paper currency; but he er known, especially in latter years, by his persistent opposition to the Maynooth ent. When Sir Robert Peel, in 1845, changed the annual Maynooth vote into a mt endowment, on the plea that agitation on the subject would thereby be avoided, oner told him that the act would rather increase than diminish agitation; and from forward he exerted himself to fulfil his own prediction. Year by year he led the on, now proposing the repeal of the act, now moving for inquiry into its workt always concentrating and giving Parliamentary expression to the dislike of the ent which has ever been entertained by Protestants. It ought to be added that his on was ever conducted with the temper and the courtesy of a Christian gentleman; gh there were occasionally sharp passages between him and his opponents, yet, upon the whole, even the Roman Catholics in Parliament did justice to his sincerity and his courage. He resigned his position as leader of the Protestant side only a few years ago, and then not from any wavering or discouragement in the cause, but solely from the sense of his growing infirmities. He had given notice of his intention to retire from the House of Commons at the close of this present Parliament, but he was not permitted to see its termination.

That supremely silly young man, Brother Ignatius, has made shipwreck of his Norwich monastery before it was fairly under way. One of his brethren committed the great crime of taking a newspaper out of the library without permission, for which offence he was condemned to repeat the Lord's Prayer one thousand times, and to write out the "rule of silence" fifty times, this latter task alone requiring about seventeen hours to perform. Rather than submit to this, the monk flew from the monastery; and though it seems a reconciliation was afterwards patched up, the brother fled a second time—on this occasion, say his enemies, taking with him some of the monies of the monastery. As Ignatius declines to prosecute, it is probable we shall hear no more of the scandal; but it is evident, the system itself has received its death-blow in Norwich.

Thoughtful persons among ourselves have often lamented the pernicious influence exercised by the ordinary class of publications which are issued to the masses by the cheap press. We well know how evil much of their teaching is, though it must not be forgotten that the worst of them are great improvements on the publications of Paine and Carile, and other still more ribald sheets which were once sown broadcast over society. It appears, however, that another enemy has taken the field against them. The secular cheap literature of England is offensive to a religious mind. The cheap literature, secular and religious alike, is absolute poison in the eyes of the Irish Roman Catholic priests. And to their dismay, this poison is insinuating itself among their flocks in ever-increasing quantities. It is of no use, they declare, to guard their people against Protestant heresies, if these publications, in which the most sacred beliefs of the Roman Catholics are distorted, vilified, and laughed at, are permitted to find their way unchecked into the families of their people, to be upon their tables, to be read with avidity by the young of their congregation. They therefore raise the voice of warning; but it appears that the mischief is more apparent than the remedy. Unfortunately for them, the constitution of this country does not permit the exercise of other than moral power, and power of that kind appears to be slipping out of their hands.

The great crime perpetrated amongst us last summer was expiated by the forfeiture of the criminal's life in the course of the month. Remarkable as the offence was, and singular as were the circumstances that led to the suspicion, and ultimately to the conviction, of Franz Muller, we should hardly have adverted to it here but that the behaviour of the criminal after his conviction and up to the last moment of his earthly existence was most extraordinary still. As great efforts were made by his own countrymen, who were not satisfied of his guilt, to save him, it was, perhaps, not to be expected that he should have frustrated their purpose by making a voluntary confession; and it is to be said on his behalf that he never, of his own accord, talked of the murder, much less confessed his crime. But it is painful to reflect that, in his most solemn moments, in the hours of devotion, on partaking of the communion, and even when appearing on the scaffold, he persisted in his assertion that he was innocent. It was not till the halter was round his neck, and he was within second of being launched into eternity, that the importunities of the Lutheran clergyman who attended him wrung from him the memorable confession, "Ja, Ich habe es gethan"—yes, I have done it. For it must be understood that these repeated denials of guilt, though made in the most solemn manner, and accompanied with a humble and submissive manner, imposed no one. The utmost effect which they produced on the clergyman, Dr. Cappel's mind, was that in making his attack on Mr. Briggs, Muller did not intend more than robbery; and that death was the result of the subsequent struggle. So flimsy an excuse could suffice to persuade Muller that he was justified in making his repeated denials that he was innocent of the crime of murder. Seldom has there been a more vivid illustration of the words of Scripture, "The heart is deceitful above all things."

Evangelical Alliance.

—The Evangelical Alliance is responsible only for what is inserted under this head.

SPECIAL PRAYER, JANUARY 1—8, 1865.

tation for the next January Week has been forwarded to the stations of our missionary societies, to all the foreign branches of the Alliance, and as generally throughout the United States. It is earnestly hoped that wherever we have received Christians will unite in arrangements for holding meetings during their several neighbourhoods.

1. THAT MEN PRAY EVERYWHERE, HOLY HANDS, WITHOUT WRATH AND REVENGE. — 1 Tim. ii. 8.

2. Praying are the topics suggested as suitable for intercession on the subject of meeting:—

Jan. 1.—SERMONS on the Agency of the Holy Spirit in the Present Dispensation.

Jan. 2.—THANKSGIVING for Blessings of the Holy Spirit, Nations, and Churches; together with the Sins.

Jan. 3.—PASTORS, TEACHERS, EVANGELISTS, and especially Missionaries; and especially Ministers to the Jews and Heathen.

Jan. 4.—THE CHILDREN of Christians, Congregations, and Schools.

Jan. 5.—SUNDAY-SCHOOLS, and all other Christian Work.

Jan. 6.—SPIRITUAL and TEMPORAL Blessings in our Nations; "for Kings and all;" the Sanctification of the Sabbath; the Means of War and the Abolition of Slavery, and of all Oppression.

Jan. 7.—THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH: its Holiness, Activity, and Harmony in all sections.

Jan. 8.—SERMONS: The Visible Unity of the Church.—"That they all may be one, as the Father is in me, and I in thee, that they may be one in us, that the world may believe that I have sent thee."—John xvii. 21.

It is proposed to hold the usual meetings in London at Freemasons' Hall, and addresses will be given on the subjects for which is also proposed to hold several evenings during the week, at the same place, and addresses on the progress of the Christian faith in different countries. Further names of speakers, will be shortly published.

ANNUAL CONFERENCE, 1865.

Communication has been received from the members of the Evangelical Alliance, conveying a cordial invitation to hold the next Annual Conference in London, and urging weighty reasons for compliance. The subject has been very fully considered in committee, and the decision is in favour of the present.

ATH OF PASTOR FLIEDNER.

At the meeting of Committee special prayer was offered at the request of Miss Florence Nightingale, in connection with the death of Pastor Fliedner's son.

MR. HENDERSON, OF PARK.

The Committee regret to hear of the continued indisposition of their Vice-President, John Henderson, Esq., of Park. At the last conference of the British Organization in Edinburgh a letter of sympathy was adopted by the meeting, and sent to their esteemed friend. The following reply has been received:—

"Park, Glasgow, July 26, 1864.

"My dear Dr. Steane,—I wish to acknowledge the receipt of a kind letter of sympathy from the Edinburgh Conference of the Evangelical Alliance, signed by Major Baillie, as chairman, and by you and the other secretaries of the Conference.

"I had hoped to take part in the proceedings of the Conference, and it was with regret that I found the state of my health to be such as to put it out of my power to be present. I desire to feel, however, that all these things are ordered for our good by a higher wisdom than our own.

"I have been gratified to learn that the deliberations of the Conference were so much in harmony with the spirit of the Alliance. That Alliance, I need not tell you, has from the first had a high place in my esteem. It cannot, therefore, but be cheering to me in my sickness to be assured by your letter that I was not forgotten by those with whom, in Alliance work and meetings, I have been so long and so pleasantly associated.

"With the warmest wishes for the continued and increased efficiency of the Alliance, and of all other means for helping forward the cause of Christian union, I remain, dear Sir, yours sincerely,

"JOHN HENDERSON."

TURKEY.

During the last few months communications have been received from the Secretary of the Turkish Branch of the Evangelical Alliance, giving particulars of a serious violation of religious liberty in Constantinople, in direct opposition to the Hatti Humayoun published by the Sultan in the year 1856. The details have already been published in the daily journals and in the columns of Evangelical Christendom. A brief reference to them, therefore, is only necessary. It will be remembered that mission premises and Bible societies' establishments in Constantinople were suddenly and violently closed by the Turkish Government, and that Christian converts from Mohammedanism were thrown into prison. In consequence of energetic protests at once made against these illegal proceedings, the missionary rooms and offices of the several societies were re-opened, and liberty given to the several agents to preach and dispose of Bibles under certain restrictions. Of the nine persons thrown into prison, six, in order to regain their liberty, recanted and professed themselves Mussulmans. The remaining three continuing firm to the Christian faith, were kept in prison, but subsequently released and sent into exile. The numerous documents and correspondence between Sir Henry Bulwer, Her Britannic Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople, and the Constantinople Committee of the Evangelical Alliance, were published by the London Committee and largely circulated.

The Committee of Council gave their serious attention to this case, and made arrangements for waiting on Earl Russell with a deputation to present a memorial on the subject. On Wednesday, October 26, the members of Council, headed by their President, Lord Calthorpe, and accompanied by the honorary and official secretaries and representatives of religious societies, and a numerous body of members of the Evangelical Alliance, and others, were received by Earl Russell at the Foreign-office.

Lord Calthorpe, who introduced the deputation, drew attention to the great change which has taken place in Turkey, to the diminution of British influence, and the violation of the promises made by the Government of this country.

The Rev. Dr. Steane, in presenting the memorial, read the following letter from Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, formerly English Ambassador at Constantinople:—

"Upleatham, Redcar, Yorkshire, Oct. 16, 1864.

"Gentlemen,—I have received your printed letter of the 13th inst., and the Memorial enclosed with it.

"Though I must decline from motives of delicacy the honour of taking a personal share in presenting the Memorial to Earl Russell, I earnestly hope that his lordship will find himself at liberty to attend effectually to its contents.

"Her Majesty's Government have, in my opinion, most rightful and urgent motives for keeping the Turkish authorities to a full execution of the Hatti Humayoun, and, in particular, for pressing upon them the bounden duty of not impairing, or allowing to be impaired, that part of the Imperial charter which provides for the complete enjoyment of religious freedom and its open exercise without molestation by all classes and every individual of the Sultan's subjects.

"The committee by whose authority you have addressed me, and its noble President, have my permission to make any use they may deem proper of this reply to your letter.—I have the honour to be, gentlemen, your obedient and faithful servant,

"STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE.

Rev. James Davis, Secretary; Rev. Hermann Schmiedt, Foreign Secretary to the British Committee of the Evangelical Alliance."

Dr. Steane also read extracts from a letter of Rev. Edwin Bliss, written at Constantinople, dated October 17th. It stated that Ahmed Agha, the last of the imprisoned converts, was sent out the preceding day to Rodosto, and that all the three persons who refused to recant were exiled. The letter went on to state that no Turk dare come to a Protestant place of worship, those places of worship and the steps of the missionaries being beset with spies, and if any appeal was ever made to a Turk to become a Christian he pointed to the city prison, and passed on—a clear proof that the men were not imprisoned because they created a disturbance, but because they had become Christians.

The memorial was then presented, setting forth the facts, and stating "how incumbent it is on the British Government, to whom Turkey owes so much, to look to the fulfilment of the pledges she has given, and still to maintain by British diplomacy that freedom from persecution for Turkish subjects becoming Christians, and that liberty for missionaries to propagate the Christian faith which it is the distinguished honour of British diplomacy to have achieved. Your memorialists are constrained, in conclusion, to observe that these proceedings of the Ottoman Government upon which they have animadverted are conceived in the spirit of that ancient exclusiveness which characterised the policy of Turkey in former days, but which they hoped had become obsolete under the guidance of Christian statesmen. They are a practical repeal of some of the most precious provisions of the Hatti Humayoun; and the first steps at least of a retrograde movement which, if it be not stopped, will conduct the rulers of that country back again to the time when a Mussulman could embrace Christianity only at the peril of his life."

Lord Russell, in reply, said he had paid very great attention to the subject brought under his notice; it was one of the highest importance, at the same time one of considerable difficulty. The Turkish Government profess to have a character for toleration, and to compare favourably with any other of the Governments of Europe; but he thought what had taken place this summer has been entirely inconsistent with religious liberty, and inconsistent with their professions. Quoting the Hatti Humayoun, his lordship added that it appeared to him to justify a Mohammedan in becoming a Christian, or, in short, any one in professing that religion which is most consonant with his own belief. As regards the distribution of the Bible, he confessed that it appeared to him impossible, without an infringement of religious liberty, to interfere with persons offering Bibles for sale. He had, therefore, contended with the Turkish Government, through the medium of our diplomatic Minister, that the distribution of the Bible ought to be unobscured. His lordship, after alluding to points raised by the Turkish Government, concluded by saying: "I confess that I cannot myself understand the distinction which is made by those who are not favourable to religious liberty in Turkey, and which is made by some Governments of Europe against whose doctrines and practice I have sometimes had to remonstrate with them. They say, 'We have no objection to persons having their own religious convictions, but we cannot allow them to attempt to persuade others.' It appears to me that if any person has a religious conviction, and is allowed to entertain that conviction, that carries with it the right to attend Divine worship which is in accordance with his belief in regular places of worship, and it carries with it also the right to tell others that he considers that his is a better mode of faith than the which they profess, and out of the abundance of his convictions to state the arguments which he induced him to adopt that form of religion. I do not myself understand a religious liberty which does not allow persons privately—privately to assail a religion which they think erroneous. But if you carry it beyond that, if you say that persons have acquired a right to go into public places, or to distribute books full of terms of insult and attack against the established religion, that becomes another question, and it is a question which I myself at least should be unwilling to entertain. I have now stated to you what are my general opinions on this subject. I have certainly endeavoured to point out to the Turkish Government what a great offence against religious liberty—believe it was in a moment of panic—it has committed; I shall continue—I trust with your support—to urge the Turkish Government to allow all religious liberty throughout the Ottoman dominions; I shall urge on our Ministers the example of Lord Stratford, and I may tell them at the same time that I am convinced that the Protestant religious bodies of this country, whilst they are not desirous of propagating the Christian religion in Turkey, wish to do so consistently with that respect and consideration which is due from one friendly nation to another, and above all, with the hope that the extension of religious liberty will not be made a cause of disturbance, still less of slaughter and bloodshed."

Sir Harry Verney expressed the desire of all at the influence of England might be exercised in Turkey in the way in which Lord Stratford de Redcliffe exercised it for many years. "That noble lord was in fact the zealous, wise, and judicious protector of Christians, and not only of Christians, but of all classes who were oppressed in Turkey. He believed that the Greeks were quite as much as Englishmen and other Europeans constantly promoted by his lordship; and so great were his energy and determination, that all felt the benefit of the remarkable influence which he exercised."

The deputation withdrew, after thanking his lordship, not only for the kind manner in which they had been received, but more particularly for the sentiments he had expressed. The Committee of Council would with great confidence leave the matter in his hands.

The following letter has just been received:—

"Constantinople, November 10, 1864.
"My dear Brother,—We have all been deeply interested in the published accounts of the interview your deputation with Earl Russell, and rejoice in the favourable tone of his lordship's reply. We do not put our trust in princes, and yet they are the instruments by whom the Lord works for His oppressed people. His lordship says he has been informed that the imprisoned have been set at liberty, and that he will inquire into the truth of the statement that they have been sent into banishment. Ali Pasha, Minister of Foreign Affairs here, is said to have informed the ambassadors of the different Powers interested in the question, that Ahmed, the last of the sultans, had been 'set at liberty, and had gone to Rodosto of his own choice.' It is quite possible the same statement may be made to Earl Russell in answer to his inquiries. The truth in the case is that when Ahmed was ordered into exile he was asked where he would prefer to go. A number of places were mentioned to him, and he was allowed his choice among them. He chose Rodosto, as the place nearest Constantinople. The question whether he would leave Constantinople was not left to his choice. His only choice was between Rodosto and other places. This is a pretty fair specimen of the 'state craft' of the far-famed Minister of Foreign Affairs. For the first fortnight of Ahmed's residence at Rodosto he was allowed the liberty promised by the Government, and spent his time in visiting the Armenian Protestant brethren of the place, having also much and perfectly friendly intercourse with all classes, the Turks not excepted. At the end of this time, without any suggestion on his part, and without any specification of any charge against him, except that he had changed his religion, he was suddenly seized, by order of the Governor of the city, and thrown into prison, and when his Armenian friends, hearing of his imprisonment, asked permission to send him a few things necessary for his comfort, their request was most rudely and insultingly refused. This proceeding of the Governor of Rodosto is a natural and direct result of the new policy in respect to religious liberty inaugurated at Constantinople during the last few months. It shows, too, what interpretation will be put upon the recent acts of the Government by the officials and by the populace in all parts of the empire. It will never occur to them that men may be imprisoned for three months, and then banished for an indefinite time, for their own personal safety. Their minds are too dull for such refinements of watchful care over its subjects on the part of the Government. Whatever interpretation the Government may try to put upon its own acts, and whatever special pleas its defenders here and elsewhere may make in its defence, the fact is just this and nothing else—viz., religious liberty has been virtually abrogated in the case of these imprisoned and banished Protestant Christian Turks. So the Governor of Rodosto understands the case, and so will all the subjects of the Porte understand it, as the knowledge of what has transpired circulates throughout the country. The breach of the charter of religious liberty granted by the late Sultan is a most palpable one. We could not have a clearer, stronger case. The Alliance could not have a better case on which to appeal to the people and Government of England, and see what can and what cannot be done by them in behalf of the imperilled cause of religious liberty in Turkey. We are glad that the Alliance has placed itself on the simple ground of asking that the influence of England in Turkey be used to secure the faithful execution of the provisions of the Hatti Humayoun. Nothing more need be asked, nothing less should be expected. A little firmness in the right direction on the part of Her Majesty's Ambassador last summer would have been sufficient then. A great deal of firmness and long-continued exertions on the part of your Government and its representatives will now be required. And we are glad to hear that the Alliance are determined never to rest till the needed result is gained. May God guide and bless all your efforts.

"I ought to add, in reference to the imprisonment of Ahmed at Rodosto, that when Fuad Pasha, the Grand Vizier, was informed of what the Governor of that city had done, he expressed great surprise, and promised that Ahmed should be immediately set at liberty, and the Governor called to account for his conduct. More than a week has now passed, but we have not as yet heard whether those promises have been fulfilled.

"Please present my affectionate salutations to the members of your committee, and believe me, as ever, very truly yours, "EDWIN E. BLISS.

"P.S.—Since finishing my letter news has come that the prisoner at Rodosto has been set at liberty, in accordance with Fuad Pasha's promises. This is a hopeful sign so far as it goes. But the sentence of banishment has not been cancelled."

OROOMIAH.

A letter has been received from Persia, dated June 13th, referring to the oppressions of the Nestorians in Oroomiah, and the action of the Persian Government in consequence of the representations which had been made to them. The visit of Mr. Consul Glen had been of service, and an application was urgently requested to the British Government, for the appointment of a consular agent, to be permanently located among that people. The official secretaries of the Alliance have had an interview with Her Majesty's Under Foreign Secretary of State, who promised to send out instructions to detain Mr. Glen in the neighbourhood of Oroomiah as long as possible.

SWITZERLAND.

A letter has been received from a Christian gentleman connected with the Government at Lucerne, to the President of the Evangelical Alliance, thanking the Committee, in the name of Swiss Christians, for the prompt and successful action taken in the case of Antoine Lauber (whose five children had been taken from him by the municipal authorities, in consequence of his refusal to have his infant child baptized), and attributing the restoration of the children to the energetic remonstrance made by the deputation of the Evangelical Alliance to the Federal Government in May last.

The Committee have been grieved to learn from the Vice-President of the Swiss Federal Government at Berne, that the children of Antoine Lauber were restored to him on the condition that they should in future attend school and religious instruction (Roman Catholic), and there is great reason to believe that his consent was given after undue and unjust pressure had been exercised upon him. A resolution was passed at the last meeting that the investigation of this question be remitted to the Committee of the Evangelical Alliance at Geneva.

SYRIA.

The following letter has been presented by the Rev. Dr. Calhoun, of Abeih, Lebanon, to the Committee of Council, at their meeting in September, from a number of native Syrian Christians in the Lebanon :—

From the Evangelical brethren in Syria to the Members of the Evangelical Alliance in England.

"With due salutations, brethren beloved, we thank God exceedingly that He disposed you to establish a society so beneficial to all Christians, and with so appropriate a name. Truly the sound of this name (Evangelical Alliance) rejoices our hearts, for it assures us that Christians in England, and France, and Germany, and Switzerland, and Italy, and America, have been moved by brotherly love to create an association which has for its object the cementing of the union between all Christians in all parts of the world. We write to you, therefore, the more boldly to inform you of our welfare, and we trust our letter will find acceptance with you. Though a wide ocean and a whole continent separate us from you, and we speak a language altogether different from yours, yet brotherly love in Christ makes the distant near, and the many one.

"In regard to ourselves, we have to say that the Gospel continues to make progress in Syria, through the agency of the honoured American missionaries. The number of adherents to the Evangelical Church in Syria is not far from two thousand. On an average from twenty to thirty unite yearly with the Evangelical churches in Christian communion. There are to be found also considerable numbers who have become enlightened, and need only the power of the Holy Spirit and more zeal on the part of Christians to confirm and strengthen them in the truth. Then, too, we have primary schools and high schools, supported by the American mission and by ourselves, and by friends in England; and we have hope that the coming generation will be a still more enlightened one, both in religion and in science. Societies also have of late been formed among the Evangelical Christians for the purpose of spreading wider the knowledge of the Gospel, and individuals have been appointed to these associations to act as colporteurs in sowing the seed of the Divine Word. Printing-presses have increased in number, and more have been printed during the past year than during the previous one. More books, too, are sold now than formerly.

"You no doubt know that our numbers, which we hope will continue to increase, are small in comparison with the adherents of other sects. On this account we earnestly desire that our union and mutual knowledge may be increased by means of correspondence, that thus our brotherly love and Christian union may be cemented, and you may be stirred up to aid us to the extent of your power. If the other sects in Syria make strenuous efforts to aid and strengthen themselves, how much more reasonably may we, who are the weaker, expect aid from you, as our necessities require. We trust that your love toward us will increase, remembering what is written in Luke iv. 9—12 and Eph. iv. 1—16.

"We wish assurances of our love to each member of your Association.

"SOLEIBEH JERWAK.
"HANNA SHAKKEE.
"AS'AD ESH SHEDDY.
"RISKULLAH BERRANT.
"DAUD KENA'AN.
"MEKHAIL MUSOLLY.
"RASHID MISHALANT."

The Committee were glad to hear from Calhoun that, thanks to the impartial administration of justice by his Excellency Daoud Pasha, the present Governor of the Lebanon, the missionaries and their native helpers go, by night and day, where they will, and preach without let or hindrance.

GENERAL CONFERENCE OF CHRISTIANS OF A LANDS IN 1886.

The Foreign Secretary has been requested by the Committee to visit Holland, to confer with Christian friends in that country relative to next General Conference of the Alliance, which is hoped, will be held in one of the cities of Holland in 1886.

JAMES DAVIS, Secretary.

HERMANN SCHMETTAU, Foreign Secretary.

INDEX.

Original Papers.

	Page		Page
o Evangelical, in Edinburgh ...	369	Marsh, The Rev. Dr.	482
-, and What it has Done	1	Mind, The, of the Master	478
Calvinism	7, 62	Monod, The late Dr. Frederic	59
va in the Time of	263	Newman's, Dr., Apologia	421, 477
Man	316	Oriental Churches, The, of Syria	216 version	110	Prayer, The, of Christendom.....	157
itutes	210	Preacher, How shall they Hear without a...	529
sture with Rome	160	Radiant Characters	209
triotism	269	Raffles, The Rev. Dr.	533 hop, on the Deluge.....	116	Russell, Earl, on the Moral Elements of Alliance, The	1, 369	Spiritual Life	581
s and Heresy-Hunters	12	Spiritual Life in the Church of England	525
Progress	313	Work, The Eternal Duration of.....	428
e late Pastor.....	535, 584	Force	577
zerland.....	321	Strangers, Be not Forgetful to Entertain	165
late Duchess of	105	True Word, The, in the Right Tone.....	372
The late Mr. George.....	119	What Israel Ought to do.....	53
ons, Ten Years of	55	World, A, upon Wheels	3
late Dr. Cesar.....	261	History.....	348

Foreign Intelligence.

Evangelical Agencies and Reli-		America, British—
Wants in	344	Mission Work among the Aborigines of Successful Labours of a Spanish		the North-West	239
in	282	Australia—
e, Mission Work among the	398	Episcopal Proceedings.....	408
Rev. J. S.	398	Mission Work in the Pacific	402
River, Christianity and Civiliza-		Union among Presbyterian Churches... 402
North of the.....	135	Belgium—
Churches	455	Evangelical Society, Progress of the..... 126
in Board of Missions, The.....	400, 509	China—
Anniver-		Baptisms	237
of	603	Mission Work, Progress in.....	287
every Policy, National	401	Opium Smoker, Conversion of a	237 society, The American	239, 346	Week of Prayer	236
in Commission, The.....	187, 345	Denmark—
"Christian Patriotism" from an Ameri-		Mission Work in the Army	234
'oint of View	557	Missionary Society, The Danish.....	81
in Union.....	284, 346	Schleswig, Persecution of the Church of 234
sions in the Army	238	War with Germany	82
The late Rev. Russell	508	Week of Prayer	81
national Tendencies	284	France—
he National	454	Abduction at Lyons.....	18
on, The.....	455	Alliance, The Universal Israelite	381
dent, The New York	557	Anniversaries, The Paris.....	224
etings, The, in New York...283, 345		Army, Evangelical Effort in the	173
ra, Northern, in Southern Pulpits	456	Bathing Establishment, Protestant	486
Churches, Proper Status of	399	Bible Society of France	378
Troops, The, at Petersburg.....	455	The Protestant.. ..	70
The, and Slavery.....	186	Bost, M. John, Charitable Establish-
Answered for Colleges and Semi-		ments of.....	124
s	239	Calvin, Tercentenary of the Death of erian Board of Missions, The ... 400		125, 276, 329
erians, The Old and the New		Canonisation at Rome, Collections for a 378
l	346, 400	Clerical Invectives against England	15
nt, The Contest for	509	Schools at Bordeaux, Opposition
ntial Election, The	601	to	377
ed Dutch Church, The, and its		Cohen, Young, Case of	435
ons	347, 400	Conference, Pastoral, of Nismes.....	329
s, Religious	187, 238	Conferences, Evangelical, in the South, 538, 588
y Commission, The	188	Protestant, in Paris	226
res, Circulation of the.....	239	Convention of September.....15, 537, 587
fluence, Past and Present, of the	186	Coquerel, M., Jun.....171, 329, 438, 589
loral and Religious Aspect of the	454	Dupanloup, Bishop	484 Education and Ecclesiastical Schoolmasters	17

France—	Page	Germany—
Elections, Protestant	437, 486, 539	Baptist, Persecution of a
England, Grievance of the Ultramon-		Baumgarten, Dr.
tanés against	222	Bavaria, Death of the King of ..
English Literature, A Book upon	484	Berlin, Church Building Society
Evangelistic Efforts, Successful	381	Beyschlag, Dr.
German Mission, The, at Lyons	70	Bismark, Count von 182, 231, 3
Government, Increasing Difficulties of...	170	Christian Beneficence in War...
Guizot's, M., Book on the Christian		Conference, The London
Religion	539	Controversy, Political and Relig
Ignorance of the Romish Clergy	436	Denmark, Peace with Infidelity among Young Men	435	—, The War with 79,
Intolerance, Acts of	275
Jalaguier, Professor, Death of	224	Diet, The Germanic
Laforce, The Protestant Asylums at	125	Diplomacy and the War
"Le Mandit" Denounced in the Senate	69	Fliedner, Dr., Death of Liberty of the Press, Discussion in the		Franco-Italian Convention, The Senate on the	222	Gustavus-Adolphus Society, The
Libraries for the People	124	Hanover, Ecclesiastical Agitatio
Literature and Religion	123	—, New Ecclesiastical
Lyons, Liturgical Controversy at 122,		tion in 222, 274	Hengstenberg, Dr.
Marriage, The, of Priests	377	Holstein, The Pastors of Matter, Professor, Death of	379	Kirchentag, The
Mechlin Congress, The	484	Knapp, The late Pastor
Mexican Question, The, in Legislature...	121	Krause, Dr. A.
Miracles, The Mania for	123	Life of Jesus, Publications R
Monod, Death of Pastor Frederic	70	the
—, M. Jean	380, 540	Manifesto, Ecclesiastical, on Dr. S
Montalembert, Count de, Pamphlet of...	327	Book
Montauban, Pastoral of the Bishop of ...	68	Marriott, The late Dr.
—, The New Professor at	540	Matamoros at Frankfort
Mortara Affair, Another	435	Mechlin, The Congress of
Nismes, Pastoral of the Bishop of	587	Missionary Meetings
Outcast, An, Reclaimed	487	Moral Conflicts
Paris, Annual Meetings of the Protestants		Pope, The Future Election of ..
in	224	—, The, on the Study of Sci
Pius IX., Conduct of	536	Preaching, Scandalous
—, on Religious Liberty	586	Protest Against the "Cha
Plantier, Bishop	587	Jesu"
Pope's Temporal Power, The 274, 483, 536		Prussia, Re-organization of the Pope, The, and the Plan of a Congress...	16	Religious Life, Manifestations c
—, The, Remonstrating with the		Roman Catholic Church, Disse
Priests of Lyons	122	the
Priests, Decrease in the Number of	169	— Catholics in the Rhe
Processions, Romish, in the Public Streets	326	vinces
Protestants, Controversy among the 173,		Schenkel, Dr.
223, 275, 437, 486, 538		Schleswig-Holstein, The Duchi
Rag-gatherers, The Paris	487	79,
Rationalist Pastor, A, Interdicted the		Scriptures, Circulation of the...
Pulpit	485	"Signs of the Times"
Religious Position of French Protestants	67	Stahl, Dr., on Catholicism an
Renan, M., Dismissal of	328	tantism
Renan's, M., "Life of Jesus"	171	Synod, Constituent, of Hanove
Revue des Deux Mondes , A Romance in		—, Protestant, at Vienna... the	437	Wichern, Dr.
Roman Question, The, in the Legislature	121	Zetzschwitz, Dr. von
St. Peter's Pence, Another Appeal for ...	69
Synodical Question, The	19	Greenland—
Tahitians, Young, in France	70	Moravian Mission, Progress of
Verneil, Pastor, Death of	589	Holland—
Virgin, Festivals in Honour of	275, 327	Amsterdam City Mission Work
Virgin's, The, New Liturgy	17	Chinese Convert, Baptism of a
—, The, Statue at Lourdes	223	Missionary Festival in Gelderla
War of Principles, The Social and Re-		Society for the Spread of the T ligious	380	India—
Weaver, Mr. Richard, in Paris	19	Christianity, The Prospects of Wesleyan Conference, French	381	Chumba, Introduction of Chris Himalayas, A New Mission in Murder of Two Missionaries ...
		Italy—
		Adriatic, Italian Shore of the...
		Albarella, Signor
		Ambrogio, Don
Germany—
Auberlen, The late Dr.	497
Austria, The Concordat in	134
Baden, The Grand Duchy of 341, 494, 496
Baptist Churches, The, in Germany	134

INDEX.

629

	Page	Italy—	Page
pal Attack on Protestantism.....	387	Persecutions, Clerical	384
— Feeling..... 24, 74, 339,	385	Persecution, Remarkable Result of	542
d Tract Circulation	130	Perversion, An Attempted	490
ciety, Scottish, Circulation	76	Piedmont	23
.....	493	Pious Frauds.....	385
Tourists, A Word to	386	Plymouth Brethren, The 75, 178, 230,	340, 444
nd Sway, The.....	441	Pope's Policy, The	491
nd Baptism Refused	73	Pope, The, and the Italian Bishopricks ...	73
Miss	77, 230	—, Illness of the	339
gio.....	21	Priesthood, Unpopularity of the	385
Provinces.....	78	Priestly Hate, Power of	383
Abduction of Young	491	Protestant Hospitals	76
eur, Incidents in the Work of a... 130		— Progress, General Survey of... 544
Remarkable Incident at	22	Publication, New.....	74
s between Jesuits and People..... 491		Religious Liberty	22
ery among Protestants, 178, 230, 340		— Movements (See Como, Cremona, tion, The Franco-Italian 494, 541, 589		&c., &c.)
a.....	22	Renan's Book, Effects of	74
u's Denunciations of the Romish		Republican Faction, The.....	72
ch	180	Rome, Device at	590
ctia, Dr. 75, 179, 230, 279, 340,	388, 446	—, French Troops in.....	494
ctis's, Mrs., Schools.....	77	—, Priestly Kidnapping in	444
on..... 20, 24, 386, 441, 442		—, Projected Evacuation of..... 494, 541
.....	547	—, Scottish and English Services in... 231
pening of a New Church in ... 228		Sicilian Degradation.....	383
licals Annoyed and Persecuted ... 384		Sienna	230
lization (See names of various		Southern Italy: An Observer's Tes-us and Provinces.)	131	timony	23
—, Difficulties in	181	Southern Provinces	77
ter, The	22	Taxation, Unpopular	445
The National.....	339	Vaudois Church, Synod of the	276
s, Italian	387	Waldensian College, The..... 78, 388
e	229, 547, 591	— Synod	276
di	22, 72	Week of Prayer, The	76
— on Priestcraft	591	Labrador—
, Treatise by.....	181	Moravian Mission, The, to the Esquimaux	84
la	543	Palestine—
ements, Public.....	72	Lebanon, Government of the	236
.....	542	Missionary Visit to Wandering Arabs ... 184
ruggling into the Light	19	Sidon, Protestant Church at	235
The, Scruples	72	Week of Prayer.....	236
a, Priestly Kidnapping in	445	Polynesia—
dy	23	Cannibals, A Day among	510
.....	230	French Aggression on Protestant Missions	606
try.....	25	Sweden—
— at Palermo	131	Dissenting Bodies, The	83
ella, Signor	340, 388, 446	Ecclesiastical Legislation, Improved..... 82
as, Papal.....	20	Evangelical Efforts, Varied.....	83
eries, Revolt in the	25	National Church, The.....	82
h Polemic, A, Defeated	229	Religious Publications.....	84
Revolution, Progress of the..... 446		Scott, Rev. G.	84
i, Signor, on the "Modern Phari-		Switzerland—
..... 77, 78, 386, 387		Basle, Religious Anniversaries at	382
, Dissensions in.....	492	Calvin Commemoration at Geneva... 177, 331
itan Education	24	Clerical Infidels.....	439
Evangelization in the.....	492	D'Aubigné, Dr. Merle.....	336
ries, Neapolitan.....	444	Evangelical Alliance	129
Professor, Lectures by	21	— Society, The.....	333
Corruption	445	Geneva Anniversaries	332
so	386, 547	—, Calvin Commemoration at 177, 331
Policy	25, 73	—, Disturbances at	489
Sovereignty, Fate of the	589	Hospital and Preaching Hall, New	440
r, Increasing Unpopularity of the		Naville, M. Ernest	128
.....	21	Neff's, Felix, Schools	177
lia and his Journal	493	Neuchatel, The Swiss Pastoral Society at	540
.....	493	Reformation Hall, The.....	333
icals, Religious	443	Students' Revolt, A	440
		Vaud, The Canton de, as Viewed after Thirty Years' Absence.....	128
		Zurich as compared with Geneva	440
		—, Religion in	176

Syria—	Page	Turkey—	Page
Protestant College at Beyrout	550	Greeks, Extraordinary Movement among the	393
(See also "Palestine.")		Hatti Humayoun, The 504, 506, 553, 596, 599
Turkey—		Koelle, Dr.	596
Ahmed of Cmsarea.....	552, 554, 595	Kuzelbash Koords, Visit to	596
American Mission, Annual Meeting of the	394	Missionaries, Charges against the... 452, 467
Armenian Converts, The, at Constantinople.....	506, 599	———, Correspondence of the British Ambassador with	596
——— Mission Field	281	Missionary Establishments, Seizure of	490
Bulgarians and the Greek Church	280	———, Outrage on a	596
Bulwer, Sir H 282, 453, 502, 504, 554, 597		Missions in Turkey, General Account of	290
Christian Turks, The Persecuted	551	Mohammedans, Movements among the... 393
Circassian Exodus, The	393	Pfander, Dr.....281, 394, 452, 492, 596
Colporteurs	500	Protestant Civil Community, The ...381, 393
Constantinople, Exciting Scenes in	450	——— Missions, Crusade against	490
Converts from Mohammedanism Arrested	450	——— Turks, The Exiled and Imprisoned	551, 596
———, Imprisoned and Transported, 500, 502, 504, 551		Russell, Earl, Instructions from.....	596
Curtis, Rev. C. G.....	598	Turkish Government, Apologies of the... 596
Danubian Principality, The	393	Turks, Baptism of Two	281
Gibraltar, The Bishop of	395	Wood, Dr.....	593
Greece, Protestantism in	392

(See also "Missionary Matters.")

Home Intelligence.

Allon, Rev. H.	305, 563	Established Church of Scotland	39
Angus, Dr.	293	Evangelical Alliance, Annual Conference of the	59
Archbishops, Address to the	348	——— Continental Society	29
Army Scripture Readers' Society	299	Free Church of Scotland	39
Arthur, Rev. William	286	French Pastor's Story, A	51
Baptist Missionary Society.....	292	Foreign Aid Society.....	29
——— Union, The	305, 564	German Alliance, Communication from the... 49
Bible Society, The	285	——— Unbelief, The last Phase of	49
——— National, of Scotland.....	89	Gloucester and Bristol's, The Bishop of, Charge	59
Birch, The late Rev. G. R.....	192	Glyn, Rev. C. J.	29
Boyd, Canon	296	Goode, Dean	19
British and Foreign School Society	301	Hawkins, Canon	59
——— Subjects and the Scriptures in Italy... 610		Henderson, Mr. John	49
Browne, Bishop	88	Herschell, The Rev. R. H.	29
Cairns, Dr.....	245, 406	Home Missions.....	49
Calvin Tercentenary, The	244, 348	Independents, Proposed Union of Presbyterians with	59
Canterbury's, The Archbishop of, Pastoral Letter.....	190	Infidel Controversy, Aspects of	49
———, Primary Visitation Charge.....	560	Irish Church Missions.....	29
Cardross Case, The	89	Jenkins, Rev. E. E.....	29
Christian Vernacular Education Society	302	Jeremie, Dean	29
Church Congress, The	561	Jeune, Bishop	29
——— Home Mission.....	299	———, Dean	29
——— Missionary Society, The	287	Jowett's, Professor, Salary	19
——— of England Metropolitan Training Institution.....	302	Judgment of the Judicial Committee ... 138, 149
——— Pastoral Aid Society	226	Judicial Committee of Privy Council, The ... 9
——— Union, The, at Cambridge	32	Kershaw, Mr. J.	32, 39
Clerical Subscription	142	Lincoln, Deans of.....	32, 39
Colenso, Dr.	348	Lincoln's, The Bishop of, Charge	29
Colonial and Continental Church Society.....	295	London City Mission	29
Congregational Union	305, 563	——— Missionary Society.....	29
Continent, Religion on the.....	404	London's, The Bishop of, Fund.....	191, 192
Convocation	241, 347	Lord's-day, Observance of the	29
Crowther, Bishop	234, 288	Malagasy Ambassadors, The	29
Cureton, Canon	348	Maurice, Rev. Mr.	29
Davys, The late Bishop	244	May Meetings, The	29
Duff, Dr.	460	M'Cosh, Dr.	29
Edinburgh Conference	403	M'Millan, Rev. Mr.	29
Ely, The Bishop of	88	M'Neile, Canon	29
English Presbyterian Church	245	Noel, The Hon. and Rev. Baptist.....	29
"Essays and Reviews"	347	Opinions, Representative	29
———, Final Judgment on	138, 189	Oxford Declaration, The	189, 242, 249
		———, The Bishop of	29

INDEX.

631

	Page		Page
... and their Imitators	513	Shirley, Professor.....	32
... The New Bishop of	304	Spurgeon, Rev. C. H.	293, 305, 459, 511
... The late Bishop of	244	Stanley, Dean.....	29, 88
... H. J.	290	Stowell, Canon.....	287, 297
.....	404	Sunday-school Union	301
... Proposed Union of Indepen-		Systematic Benevolence Society.....	299
... Dr.....	407, 410	Turkey, Deputation on Religious Liberty in	459
... of the Gospel, Society for the...	294	Turkish Missions-Aid Society.....	295
... Alliance	300	Turton, Bishop.....	88
... School Union	302	Union of Presbyterian Churches	143, 191
... of the Religious Societies for 1863-4	303	United Presbyterian Synod, The.....	562
... ry and Refuge Union	302	Week of Prayer, The	86
... Thought, Tendency of	405, 1865.....	559
... Fract Society	300	Wealeyan Methodist Conference.....	457
... e Dean of.....	189, 513 Missionary Society.....	289
... The Bishop of, Charge	610	Westminster, The Dean of	29, 88
... Rosseeuw de.....	405	Williams, Dr., The Suit against	138, 243
... resbyterian Churches, Union of the		Wilson, Rev. Mr., The Suit against.....	138
.....	143, 196, 304	Winslow, Dr. Octavius	512
... y, The Earl of 285, 295, 296, 299,		Wordsworth, Dr.	29
.....	302, 459	York, The Archbishop of	304
		Young Men's Christian Association	300

Missionary Matters.

.....	196	Greenland	150
entral.....	250	India 34, 90, 143, 193, 246, 306, 353, 411, orthern	196	462, 516, 565, 612
orth-Eastern.....	36	Japan	354, 465, 518
uth 37, 95, 145, 197, 248, 355, 413,		Labrador	150
.....	465, 519, 567, 613, 614	Madagascar 38, 95, 144, 197, 248, 414, 519, estern 37, 95, 146, 196, 307, 356,		570, 614
.....	413, 466, 518, 568	Mauritius.....	308, 570
.....	466, 519	Mexico	414
ritish	149, 571, 614	New Zealand	38, 149, 198, 248, 308
orth-Western	250	Norfolk Island.....	357
outh.....	147, 308, 357	Nova Scotia	149
.....	198	Persia	33, 90, 193, 353, 516
.....	36, 307	Polynesia 39, 97, 148, 198, 357, 467, 520,
.....	93, 195, 247, 354, 412, 465, 567	570, 614
5, 94, 144, 195, 247, 354, 412, 465,		Siam	465
.....	517, 567, 613	Syria.....	33, 193, 353, 461
British	199, 414	Turkey ... 33, 143, 246, 351, 411, 461, 515, 623
.....	352	West Indies	97, 250, 570
.....	33, 351

Miscellaneous.

Bishop, Deposition of	150	Colenso, Bishop, Trial of	39
-----------------------------	-----	---------------------------------	----

Literature.

...s, Dr. J. W., Christian Faith and		Christ of the Gospels, The, and the Romance
.....	44	... of M. Renan.....	252
... Magazine, The	468	Christian Home Life	361
... Muehleisen J., Biblical Criticism		Cottager, The	44
... Pentateuch	360	Culross, J., on Divine Compassion	361
... F., on the Gospel of John	617	Death or Life	468
... L., Christian Self-Culture	361	Dwyer's, J., Christian Work for Gentle Hands	362
... on Christ our Life	152	Garbett's, J. C., Morning Dew	468
... M. A. S., Sweet Childhood, &c.	252	Godet's, F., Commentary on the Gospel of St.
... r. C. S., Sketches from the Life of	617	John	151
... r. G. B., Memorial Sketch of.....	617	Gospel According to St. John, Explanation of
... r. H., on God's Way of Holiness.....	618	the	360
... r. D., on the Four Gospels.....	40	Gossner's Spiritual Casket	468
... Days in our Village	99	Grosart's, A. B., The Lambs all Safe	468
... Sermons by the Bishop of	415	Kurtz's, Dr., Sacrificial Worship of the Old
... spirit Calvin	617	Testament.....	42
... G. P., The Road and the Rest-		Lange, Dr., on the Life of the Lord Jesus
... ..	617	Christ	571

	Page		Page
Leisure Hour, The	44	Saurin on Conversion	468
Leslie's, Emma, Trial and Trust	362	Schaff, Dr., Essay by	252
M'Neile's, Canon, Sermons	415	Sermons by the Bishop of Calcutta and Canon M'Neile	415
Meikle, J., on the Battle of Armageddon	361	Spence's, Dr., Scenes in the Life of St. Peter	43
Morning on the Mountains	99	Steward on Mediatorial Sovereignty	358
Murphy's, Dr., Commentary on Genesis	42	Stuart's, A. M., Capernaum	44
Newton's, H., Fall of Babylon	362	Sunday at Home, The	44
Nisbet's, Dr. R., Songs of the Temple Pilgrims	251	Thomas's, Dr., Genius of the Gospel	616
Palmer's, G., Scripture Facts and Scientific Doubts	152	Vanderkiste's, R. W., Lost, but not for Ever	152
Pattison's, S. R., The Rise and Progress of Religious Life in England	360	Vaughan, Dr. C. J., on the First Epistle to the Thessalonians	615
Petavel's, E., La Bible en France	617	Williams's, C., The First Week of Time	100
Petros—Petra—Kleis	618	Wilson's, Bishop, Journal	90
Pleasant Hours with the Bible	252	Wisdom of our Fathers, The	468
Pressensé's, E. de, Reply to Renan	100	Wonderful Works	616
Prime's, S. I., Five Years of Prayer	362	Woodward's, H., The Shunammite	99
Roussel, N., Essays by	252	Worboise's, E. J., Autobiography of Mande Bolingbroke	252
Ryland's, J. E., Wholesome Words	362

Monthly Retrospect.

Home... 46, 103, 155, 202, 254, 311, 365, 419, 471, 523, 575, 621	Foreign... 45, 101, 153, 200, 253, 309, 363, 417, 469, 521, 573, 620
--	---

Evangelical Alliance.

Berlin, Meeting of the Alliance at	206	Matamoros, Letter from	50
Calvin Tercentenary, The	49, 257	Members, New	2
....., in Geneva	368	Monod, Dr. F.	2
Canada	51	Monthly Meeting for Prayer	2
Day of Special Prayer for Children of Christian Parents	204, 259	Natal Branch	2
Edinburgh Conference, Programme of ...	312, 367	Nestorians, The	51, 368
....., Proceedings of	403	Persecution of Baptists in Russia and Poland	51
Geneva Committee, The	206	Provinces, Visitation of the	2
Henderson, Mr. John	410, 623	Switzerland, Religious Intolerance in	2
Lebanon, Letter from the	626	Week of Prayer	49, 204
Matamoros, Appeal of	50

VANGELICAL CHRISTENDOM:

A Monthly Chronicle of the Churches.

CONDUCTED BY

MEMBERS OF THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

SO WE HAVE ALREADY ATTAINED, LET US WALK BY THE SAME RULE, LET US MIND THE SAME THING."—PHIL. III. 16
"UBI AGNOVIMUS CHRISTUM, IBI AGNOVIMUS ET ECCLESIAM."—AUGUSTINE.

VOL. VI.—NEW SERIES.

LONDON:

PUBLISHED BY WILLIAM JOHN JOHNSON, 121, FLEET-STREET.

EDINBURGH: JOHN MENZIES.

DUBLIN: GEORGE HERBERT; AND ALL BOOKSELLERS.

MDCCCLXV.

LONDON :

PRINTED BY WILLIAM JOHN JOHNSON, AT 121, FLEET STREET.

PREFACE.

the year now closing the churches of Britain have lost Isaac Taylor and Hugh Stowell. It is scarcely possible to name them together without thinking of the contrasted powers which they brought to the service of the Christian Church: the severe, critical, often jealous acumen which proved things, and which, as in the instance of "Ancient Christianity," exploded much of what the world had long taken for granted; in opposition to the sunny faith and loving assurance which, resting on the Rock of Ages, and rather avoiding hard questions, delighted in expounding and enforcing familiar and faithful sayings: the grave and anxious regard with which he learned in Church history and expert in spiritual pathology surveyed our modern religious society, over against the sanguine hopefulness which in the Second Advent awaited an early redress of all evils: to which may be added the bodily presence so weak, and the speech so harsh, jerky, and unrefined, which made the recluse of Stamford Rivers so feeble on the same platform where the frank affection, the majestic form, the melodious voice of the Rector of Christ Church always found the audience propitious, and soon left it enraptured. As a preacher and public speaker, few have rendered more immediate service to Protestantism and Evangelical truth than Hugh Stowell: by his contributions to the Christian evidence, and by dissolving the enchantment which Tractarianism had tried to throw around the first-four-century fathers, Isaac Taylor has done a service to all time.

Next to a popular prince, great is the nation's happiness which has a popular prime minister. With his good humour and good sense, his love of freedom and fair play, Lord Palmerston was the favourite of the English people, and, patriotic and courageous, he was respected abroad. In the interests of religious liberty on the Continent of Europe, we are bound to hold his memory in all honour; nor is it a slight service which was conferred on national Christianity by that adviser of the Crown who, in the appointment of deans and bishops, so uniformly regarded the claims of personal worth and sacred science. The same year which has bereft us of the patriarch of British statesmen closes over the grave of one of our greatest economists; and inasmuch as peace on earth and goodwill amongst the children of men are promoted by commercial treaties and such other bonds of international brotherhood, we cannot pass over in silence the name of Richard Cobden.

To the philanthropist the great event of the year has been the close of the Civil War in America, setting free, as it has done, four millions of African bondsmen. In the absence of other brilliant or startling events, such a consummation, costly as it has been, is enough to make the year illustrious.

Over greater part of these islands the sun has arisen for the last eight months almost daily unclouded. Would that we could take the face of the sky as an index of our social and spiritual condition, or a sure sign of our political future. From Fenianism there is not much to be feared; but negro insurrections and New Zealand wars may well awaken some "searchings of heart," and make us consider whether there is nothing, after all, in our colonial system which admits of improvement. At home, it is evident that new assaults are about to be made on the sanctity of the Christian Sabbath, and the tone of flippant assumption and sneering contempt in infidel journals shows that attacks from without and treason within have given new courage to the Antichristian array. On the other hand, there are appearances which should encourage those who have faith in God, and who long for the redemption and elevation of our fallen human family. In all lands the Gospel gains ground. The translation of the Koran into Turkish, and the effort to reform Hindooism, are each a concession to the advancing Christianity; and at home the reaction already perceptible from researches purely material in favour of mental and ontological science, may be hailed as the harbinger of a more thoughtful and perhaps more spiritual era. But the work before the Church is still enormous, and the day still seems distant when it shall be said to her that her warfare is accomplished. It looks as if a time were near when those alone need not be troubled who believe in Jesus and in God, and when, awaking to the internecine conflict with the powers of evil, Christendom will despise as idle phantoms the interminable debates on which its strength is at present wasted.

LONDON, DEC. 1, 1865.

Evangelical Christendom.

THE MISSION OF THE COMFORTER : AN EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE MEDITATION FOR THE NEW YEAR.

BY THE REV JOHN CAIRNS, D.D., BERWICK-ON-TWEED.

WHEN one looks abroad upon Christian society, one may not at first see anything to distinguish the Church of Christ from any other organization. Here is a body of persons holding certain peculiar opinions, and acting according to them. But other societies exist, and they have all their creed more or less distinctly avowed, and more or less faithfully respected. Here, also, is a body of persons having certain office-bearers, certain forms of admission, and certain rites and usages, in which their joint action is made visible ; but neither is this distinctive ; for all other societies have equally some government, discipline, and common field of operation. Here, also, are certain means of diffusing and propagating the society and its opinions, a book which is explained, sermons and lectures which are delivered, and various forms of discussion and personal influence. But though these are certainly somewhat singular, and unlike other societies, yet all societies do take pains to spread their views, and recruit their ranks, and appeal in different ways to the intelligence and sympathies of those on whom they hope to act. So far, then, as we have gone, there seems nothing quite singular in the Christian association ; and men may suppose that it is simply one of the many varieties of the principle of combination, though certainly it does seem to stretch over a wider surface, and to maintain itself for a greater length of time in the world than any other. Men may say, "This Christian Church, of which we hear so much, it is just, after all, a matter of education or of ordinary choice. Some become Christians, and some do not, just as some become Freemasons or adherents of one political party or of one side in certain questions of literature and science rather than of another." This, however, will not come up to the views of true Christians ; for so much as one true Christian in the whole world. They will one and all say, "We have become Christians, not because we were brought up in the Christian belief, or because we have examined and read on this subject, as on other subjects, where there is evidence to be considered. We have become Christians, because we have been taught, influenced, and moved by the Spirit of God." Here we come upon something new, singular, and distinctive, for here is a society worked upon, according to the testimony of all its true members, by an influence unlike every other—an influence which the world indeed cannot connect with its Author, but which the Church connects with Him, devoutly ascribing to Him, as a Divine Person, all that is good, holy, and true in its belief and practice, and all that is precious and comfortable in its hopes and expectations. Nor is this the whole wonder and peculiarity ; for this Holy Spirit acts as the representative of Christ, and supplies His place ; so that you have a society whose Head is alive and absent in heaven, and yet present and operative by this mysterious substitute, to whom all Christians ascribe everything that is most valuable in their character or most blessed in their destiny. Anything so wonderful as this does not, and cannot, exist in the case of any other society ; for what other society has a spirit working in it over and above the natural feelings of its members ? What other society has a living, but absent head, thus working and acting by such a representative ?

It is to these wonderful and glorious truths that I would now direct your minds this New Year's sermon, founded upon the text, "And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another comforter, that he may abide with you for ever." This text, in dependence on Divine grace, I shall attempt to explain and enforce ~~in~~ its several parts as they stand before us. And evidently there are two subjects suggested—first, the mission of the Holy Spirit; and secondly, the work of the Holy Spirit.

VOL. XIX.—VI. NEW SERIES.—JANUARY.

I. The first topic is the mission of the Holy Spirit. "I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another comforter."

1. Here we are instructed that the Holy Spirit is prayed for by Christ. Our Lord thus consecrates and exalts prayer by connecting it with His own work. He prayed on earth; He intercedes in heaven; and what He prayed for was the Holy Spirit. He taught His disciples that the Holy Spirit comprehended all good; for in one passage the words stand, "How much more will your Father in heaven give good things to them that ask him!" while in another place it thus reads: "How much more will your Father who is in heaven give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him!" That the blessing was of all others most precious, we shall fully see when we come to speak of the work of the Holy Spirit; but meanwhile, it is easy to see, that as the Holy Spirit is, so to speak, God in the soul, this must be a gift transcending every other, for what more can God give than God, or what can equal the light, the purity, the warmth, the tenderness, which the dwelling of God in the dark, impure, cold, and hardened spirit of man must create and diffuse? This is what Christ asks in His prayer to the Father; and this He receives. I do not understand that Christ's prayer for the Holy Spirit was limited to the time when He went away and ascended to heaven. No doubt He then prayed; and the descent of the Holy Spirit on the Day of Pentecost was the answer. But Scripture rather teaches us to regard Christ's prayer as continuous; for His intercession is something which He ever liveth to make, and therefore we are warranted in regarding Him as still praying the Father for the Holy Spirit; and what an encouragement is this for us to pray likewise, seeing that our feeble and worthless petitions are supported by the continued requests of one whom the Father heareth always!

2. We are taught, secondly, that the Holy Spirit is given by the Father. In the economy of grace all things are of God. There is a Trinity of Persons; but the Father represents, as it were, the unity of the Godhead. It is condescension in the Holy Ghost to come, even as it was condescension in the Son; and for this coming the way is now clear. The justice of God is satisfied by Christ's death, so that God may again draw nigh to guilty man. The terms of the covenant have been fulfilled by Jesus, so that God is bound by His own engagement to grant Him the Holy Spirit for the accomplishment of His work. And once more, the truth regarding the Saviour is now complete, so that the Holy Spirit has everything at hand which needs to be showed to the souls of men. In these circumstances the Father gives the Holy Spirit or sends Him forth, because He, equally with the Son and the Spirit, desires and delights in man's salvation; because the gift is necessary for that great end, and because every obstacle has been completely and finally removed out of the way. The Son prays and the Father gives, not because there is any reluctance, for the Father himself loveth the souls of men. The Father gave the Son, and gives the Spirit to apply the boon. And the giving is said to be His, because in this way the Godhead is carried up, so to speak, to its highest summit, and our gratitude is carried back to one eternal and infinite source, which receives all the glory. When we, then, receive the Holy Ghost, let us receive the blessing, not only as prayed for by the Saviour, but as given by the Father. Let us prize it as God's sovereign gift, to which we have absolutely no claim; and let us say with the deepest reverence, "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy name give glory!"

II. Having thus spoken of the mission, let me now speak a little more fully of the work of the Holy Spirit. He is called here, a Comforter, another Comforter a Comforter who should abide with Christ's people for ever. The word translated "comforter" is of wider signification than any one English word that could render it. It denotes not only a comforter strictly so called, but an exhorter, adviser; and it was familiarly used to denote an advocate who pleaded another's case in a court of justice. Keeping these things in mind, we may form some conception of the work of the Holy Spirit, more especially when He is expressly said to be in the place of Christ, and to be to the disciples what Christ himself had been, who would have continued to be to them, had He remained with them. Let us suppose that Christ were still upon earth, actuated by the same motives which moved His holy and compassionate nature in the days of His flesh, and that He were accessible to all His people, and capable of acting as directly upon the whole of them as His personal presence as He was upon the little company of disciples, what conviction, excitement, and strength would not this impart! But all this we have in the presence of His Spirit; and I now proceed, following out this hint, to illustrate some particulars in regard to the work of the Holy Ghost, as the continuation and consummation of that of Christ upon earth.

THE MISSION OF THE COMFORTER.

3

1. First, then, the work of the Holy Spirit lies in conversion. This was also the work of Christ. He could not have been himself a Comforter, had He not converted the souls of men. Some of His disciples were converted before He knew them; but others were not; and in all He carried on (if He did not begin) the converting process till it was finished. Here, then, the Holy Spirit takes up the Saviour's work. He is no longer among us to stretch forth His blessed hands and seek to convert men as a hen gathereth her brood under her wings. But His Spirit is here; His Spirit has the same power and love. Did we suppose Christ embodied and appearing in the flesh, what could we suppose Him doing first, but preaching the Gospel, travelling over land and sea to bring it to all hearers, and beseeching them to give up their own name to be reconciled to God. Ministers, no doubt, act thus as His representatives; but His own Spirit is the best representative; and Christ does not need to come again or to come back, because His Spirit is here, another Comforter, to do the work in His room.

2. Secondly: The work of the Holy Spirit lies in the preservation and increase of Christians in the faith. Our Lord could say at the end of His course, "Of those whom thou gavest me have I lost none." But how was this end attained? By constant watchfulness, by faithful teaching, by correcting errors, and repressing dangerous opinions and dispositions, and by exerting such a spiritual control over the minds of the disciples, that they ceased to have any wish to wander from His side. Had Christ continued upon earth, He would have acted the same part to His apostles, and would have extended His care to the whole household of faith. And here is another part of the work of the other Comforter who takes His place—viz., to guard the precious seed of grace against all the hostile forces of a fallen world, to supply wholehearted instruction and saving influence, whereby it may be nurtured, and to carry forward the process of enlightenment and spiritual growth, till the infant becomes a perfect man, and the whole Church rise to the stature of which the fulness of Christ is the measure. How blessed and glorious this work of preserving Christians and of fitting them up in their most holy faith! This is the end of all the means of grace, and of all the dispensations of Providence. Christ, as it were, herein prolongs His own friendly care of the chosen band, and by His Spirit will establish, strengthen, settle all who are partakers of the like precious faith. God grant that we may remain within the range of this guardianship, and may be kept by the power of God unto the faith unto salvation!

3. Thirdly: The work of the Holy Spirit lies in the preparation of Christians for special service, and in the strengthening of them for that service. How did Christ train and qualify His apostles during His personal ministry ! and how, had He continued on earth, would He have directed and upheld them in that ministry ! Here, too, the Spirit came in as another Comforter. One was gone, but another remained. And how effectual did their training appear ! How blessed the fresh baptism which they received from on high ! Had they any reason to complain that Christ was not with them, when they went everywhere, preaching infallibly the Word, and confirming it by signs following ? Thus still the Holy Ghost treads, as it were, in Christ's steps, and acts over the same part in training Christians for work, and then making that training to avail. How strange and wonderful are the processes of preparation that all go through for the special work required of them ! What conflicts, what afflictions, what disappointments are often necessary to prepare for special usefulness ! Nothing is more glorious in the work of the Spirit than this tempering of the instruments in the fire, than this direction of them where to be employed, and then this strengthening of them for the work given them to do ! Do not give way, O Christians, in the midst of trial and despondency, or even of persecution and outrage ! These are the processes by which the Holy Spirit trains the soul. These are the footsteps of the Comforter ; and what seems now the most irksome discipline will seem hereafter the most glorious preparation for work on earth, and for praise in heaven !

4. Fourthly : The work of the Holy Spirit lies in the teaching of Christians to pray. This was one special part of Christ's work on earth. His whole life was an answer to the disciples' question, "Lord, teach us to pray." He not only taught them by word, dictating to them the prayer they should use, but by example and by His whole work revealing God and bringing Him near. If I wish to teach a child to pray, what do I do ? Do I dictate a prayer, and enjoin the use of it ? No. I may do this ; but I do far more than this. I strive to convey to the mind and heart of that child a conception of God as a kind and lovely Being—as one who hears and who can help—as one who is nothing less than a Father who pitieth His children. Then the child's prayer arises spontaneously. It comes to God as naturally as to an earthly parent. Thus did Jesus teach His disciples to pray. He made God near and amiable, and then prayer followed. And thus does the Holy Ghost continue His work, and prove another Comforter. He teaches us our need. He teaches us God's fulness. He draws out our hearts to God. Thus we are comforted, elevated, defended in all our want and in all our trouble ; for what can fail those who cast themselves on the fulness of God ? This is the intercession of the Spirit, His teaching us to intercede ; and wheresoever He thus descends as the Spirit of grace and of supplication, the soul prays without ceasing, and is consciously, unspeakably, unfailingly blessed, even as it prays.

5. The work of the Holy Spirit lies in making the Church the dwelling-place of Christ. The Holy Spirit is promised as a Comforter who should abide. But He does not abide separate from Christ. When He comes into the soul, Christ returns. His coming is the fulfilment of Christ's own word, "I will not leave you comfortless ; I will come unto you !" The truth which the Spirit shows to the soul is Christ's truth ; the graces which He imparts are Christ's image ; the joy which He sheds abroad is Christ's own peace. This other is not another ; for Christ and the Spirit, like Christ and the Father, are one ; and where the Spirit works, His word is verified, "I in them, and thou in me !" How sublime this unity, so that the whole work of the Spirit begins with Christ and ends with Christ. Christ is the object revealed ; Christ is the object reproduced ; Christ is the object glorified ; and the word is made good, "We all with unveiled face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, and changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord !” The Church is thus truly the manifestation of the Saviour ; and the Holy Spirit builds it up as an holy temple wherein He at once abides and is revealed ! O, may his end of the Spirit’s work be gained in us ! May we be builded together for such a habitation of Christ and of God ! And may that ever-during presence of Christ which we have by His Spirit, with all its joy and consolation, be our daily and hourly portion, till we reach that higher world, where we shall be personally and corporeally ever with the Lord !

And now, in applying this subject, suffer me at the beginning of the year to ask you one or two simple questions. First : Has the mission of the Holy Spirit taken effect upon you ? You have often heard of it—have you felt it ? I ask if you have felt some transient impression—for almost none (if any) escape this—I ask, have you repented and been converted ? Have you escaped from hell and hold of heaven ? If you have not, let me beseech you to yield now to the strings of the Spirit. Let the year be made new by your opening your hearts, that the King of Glory may enter in. Let it be the year of God’s redeemed, the acceptable year of the Lord.

Secondly : Are you growing in the fruits of the Spirit ? For these you have not to seek—“ The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance.” If you cannot say that you are growing, as perhaps the growth of humility may hinder you from saying it, are you, at least, striving to grow ? are you diligent in the use of the means of grace ? are you watchful against temptation ? are you continuing instant in prayer ? As merchants balance their books at the close of the year, so should Christians attempt a spiritual balance-sheet. This will be humbling at the best. But the most humbling discovery is sadder than contented ignorance, which is the parent of bankruptcy and ruin.

Lastly : Are you labouring to extend the dispensation of the Spirit. Christ prays for the Father for the Spirit, but we must pray also. Are we, then, entering into our closet, and frequenting the meeting for prayer ? And while we pray, are we also working ? for the Spirit can only work according to the law of His operation, where the truth is presented ; and if we hide the truth from men’s souls, either at home or abroad, we so far make void the mission of the Comforter, and suffer His work to remain in abeyance. May the Lord grant to all of us, during this year, a mind to work, as well as a heart to pray ! Let us return to all our Christian activities with renovated vigour, and let us gladly embrace new openings of usefulness. The night is coming, wherein no man can work. But still, blessed be God, the light is in the heavens ! Let us, then, one and all, in God’s name, go forward !

Come, let us anew our journey pursue,
Roll round with the year,
And never stand still till the Master appear.

RELIGIOUS PARTIES IN FRANCE.

“ ROMANISM never changes,” say its friends and some of its foes. “ It does change continually ; but always from bad to worse,” says another class of opponents—those, namely, who have looked into it more closely. Can it mend ? many ask, both at home and abroad. Is self-reformation, gradual internal improvement, possible ? The Rénovation de l’Eglise, published four years ago by l’Abbé Michon, was a wild attempt to show how such a reform might be effected as should (he thought) save the Church, by bringing it up to the level of modern society. We were to have the herent Christian Churches united by mutual concessions, general councils held to settle points in dispute, clergy of all ranks elected by universal suffrage, pastors once chosen not removable, and a set of preachers who should preach not unpractical mysticism, but something useful for the needs of every-day life. That was the programme of the "Rénovation." How it was to be worked out was not so clear. It seemed very doubtful what mutual concessions could persuade the Eastern Church and the Churches of England and Germany to accept the supremacy of the Pope, even though he were to wear nothing grander than a white surplice, and were to be chosen by the general votes of Christendom. Nor was M. Michon's method of putting a stop to private judgment, by forcing every one to acquiesce in the decrees of oecumenical councils, one likely to meet with favour in England, at any rate. It is all very well to recommend each réformé "to study the common creed adopted by an overwhelming majority;" to tell him that "in religion, as in everything else, a man may go on disputing till the end of time, but that faith, not discussion, is the keynote of the Gospel, and that surely no one would be so conceited as to desire to make a little individual schism on his own account, when the highest minds in England, Sweden, and elsewhere had solemnly declared for unity." Even were the plan not hopeless for other reasons, we fear there are to be found a good many stubborn minds (like the Quaker, who, proud possessor of one little house, used to delight in telling the Yorkshire lord, "I and thee own all Halifax"), whose pleasure in dissenting would be enhanced by the feeling that nearly all the European world was against them. But, of course, the first thing for a would-be reformer to do is to persuade the members of his own communion. M. Michon would perhaps succeed in persuading us that Rome needs entire renovation rather than reformation, and that, under certain conditions and after a thorough reconstruction, an union such as was dreamed of by Fenelon and Tillotson would not be impossible. But can he convince his own people of this? It seems not. Four years have made him much more hopeless of internal amendment. We say him; for if "l'abbé étoilé" who writes "Le Maudit" and "La Religieuse" is not M. Michon himself, he is at any rate so thoroughly in his confidence as to have embodied in his last work whole paragraphs from the "Rénovation." We incline to think that all three works are by the same author. His former books, such as "Du Progrès et de l'Importance des Idées Gallicanes," did not make noise enough; so the Abbé has adopted an incognito, and come out with a pair of sensation novels with appetizing titles, which hundreds have read for the sake of the story who would never have looked into any book professedly treating of the destinies of the Church. Change from within the "Abbé étoilé" now deems utterly hopeless. "We want (says he) not a reformation, but a renovation. It is no use meddling with the Ultramontane clergy; they are hopeless; the more wildly they go on the better for us, for the sooner will all sensible people get disgusted with their absurdities. We must let the worn-out Catholicism of the middle ages die out as noiselessly as possible, in order to substitute for it a modern Catholicism, better suited to the needs of modern society." (La Religieuse, ii, 325.) The fact is, the parti prêtre is very strong just now. In France, the Emperor has to sacrifice M. Renan; in Ireland, Archbishop Cullen makes waste paper of the rules and provisions of the national system; in Chili, a wild outburst of Mariolatry could count, not a year ago, a hecatomb of victims; while even in sober, money-making, critical London, the cynical investigator of human folly may see Fetishism of the worst kind in full force scarce a stone's throw from the palaces of Tyburnia, at the Church of St. Mary of the Angels. It would seem as if the "Oxford Movement," instead of showing (as its promoters intended) that we have, after all, a good many points in common with Rome, has driven the Romanists to desperate self-assertion. The dream of a Church Catholic, with Anglican, Italian, Syrian branches, is (we are told by the Pope himself) but a dream. There is no Church Catholic except the in Catholic Church, one and universal. "If you come in full submission, and to our Immaculate Conception, our one breviary for all Christendom, our missal and haute spiritualité, you will be safe; if not, though your candles and incense and fasts and genuflexions are perfect copies of ours, you will be left in outer darkness, because you dare to question our dogma of papal infallibility. That is all the answer our Romanizers will ever get from the Vatican. 'L'Abbé ' labours to prove that Neo-Catholicism, having once broken with Ultramontane party, will gather to itself not merely all the intellect of France, but (it is far more to the purpose) the great mass of the population, thoroughly weary with which neither they nor their fathers have been able to bear. Man cannot do without negations; he must have some sort of doctrine; and so your Frenchman will not let his daughter miss her first communion, and very generally goes out for his last communion himself, though he may have never entered a church since he began to wear trousers. The thing is, according to our author, to find him a religion which shall supply the wants of his healthy life as well as those of his age and death. Nothing (he is perfectly right in saying) in the way of change has been done by reformers, however eager, who continue in the Romish Church. It seems as if M. Michon has, since he wrote his "Rénovation," made another voyage to Rome, and has come back thoroughly convinced, as every one must—as our own Dean Alford has—of the hopeless corruption of everything and everybody except the poor Pope himself. He proves that a Romanist cannot mend. He has no power whatsoever to make an honest stand against any Ultramontane encroachment. The worst thing about the system is, that the man who has grown up under it has lost not only his individual right of private judgment as to matters of dogma, but his power of acting up to the dictates of his conscience in practical things. He must not stir to oppose innovation or to assert time-honoured practices; if he does, he will be howled down by the extreme party; and there is no such thing as a wholesome public opinion within the Church itself to counteract the espionage and denunciation and general terrorism which prevails. The picture of Bishop A., merely accused of sympathising with the Gallican party, and because of this suspicion worried and resignation by the Jesuits, is one of the most melancholy contrasts between the present state of France and that of England which could be imagined. He thinks, poor man, that he is safe in the support of the Government. Of course, he is nearly broken to get one morning a Ministerial letter recommending him to give up his bishopric and accept in its stead a canonry at St. Denis. If he holds on, he is a lost man; an order will come from Rome for his deposition, and then he will have nothing to fall back upon. Never did any one measure do so much to strengthen Ultramontanism as the destruction of the French Church's temporalities at the Revolution. A De Rohan, a Noailles, could hardly have been got rid of so unopposedly as this poor Bishop A.; but as there is very little to get in the Church, Frenchmen of a higher class either of mind or rank or connexions adopt it as a religion. The poor prêtre prolétaire, so scorned by Jesuit and Carmelite and Ultramontane, is not worth making a fuss about, and the bishop (unless he is a member of the Order) fares no better when he comes into collision with the ultras than the peasant from whose ranks he is sprung. The astonishing thing is the political power of the collective priesthood in France, considering their individual weakness. With the Emperor dead against them, with most of the Ministers utterly indifferent, they prevail, by sheer force of organization and by that subtle terrorism which is even more Italian than Romanist, but which has been pretty well naturalised in France since the days of the Medici, to get their own way, and to force the Government to crush any man whom they point out as dangerous. We in England cannot stand the secret of their power. We have noisy parties whose real import infinitely less than the talk which they keep up about themselves would lead to suppose. But we, happily, know nothing experimentally of that strange and social nightmare which holds men spell-bound and prevents them from out and shaking off the horrible delusion which weighs them down. The whole is to a great extent political; it is the fruit of repression. We had it at full force in Tudor times; we had it again (strangely enough) under Cromwell only time, let us remember, when passports were in force in England; it existed in milder form in Ireland, not simply because Ireland is Romanist, but also because it is in the joint occupation of two alien nations, always doggedly hostile, if not at war. But it is no use blinking the question, that Romanism is a system of repression; and that, however it may occasionally have coquetted with the party, it is the true handmaid of Despotism: so that in France, just now, independent mind, who would fain see the Gallican Church reassert its old independence, have both Church and State against them. They suffer accordingly; they lose preferment, and lose caste as well. Even the great mass of the nation believes none and cares for none of these things, is industriously taught to look upon the would-be reformer ("a renegade priest," as he is styled), much as if he were a traitor who had deserted his colours. And then, as we have said, there is not a body of moderate men on whom the poor priest of moderate views may fall with certain (if he is honest) of securing their respect, if not their adherence. In almost every man not of extreme views is outside the Church; so that the would-be reformers have nothing for it but to come out too, unless they suffer a life-long persecution of the most unbearable kind. They must (in the use of M. Michon's language, cease to be reformers, and turn renovators. It is unfair to ourselves when we speak of English society being divided into cliques, men being tabooed here for opinions which they might hold abroad with freedom. In England we have always allowed a certain latitude. Our formularies are framed not to exclude, but to admit all honest men who accept the fundamental truths. Four-fifths of the Protestant Dissenters might join us to without any sacrifice of conscience. We cannot feel comfortable with traitor bosom; but to honest men we give, and have always given, a large margin. Rome gives no margin at all.

The fact is, that nowhere, except, perhaps, in that Oxford which has rationalised itself by its sudden change from Puseyite intolerance to equally irrational Neologianism, have we any "sets" so narrow as French clerical society; there is society there outside the pale. Any man who does not like to sacrifice the religion of his childhood, and all that he has been taught to hold dear, and to go out of the altogether, must be content to place his conscience in the keeping of M. Veuillot, the Jesuits, or else he will be hunted down like a traitor. Rome rules the party (as far, at least, as the affairs of his national Church are concerned), and the party rules Rome, and by a mixed system of cajoling and terrifying, urges the camarilla to acts which, uninfluenced, it would never have thought of. And the heads of the extreme party? Why, if we are to believe "L'Abbé ," a newspaper editor whom he calls Falot, and who is clearly our old uncompromising friend Veuillot, of the Monde, a fanatic bishop who is always sending encyclicals to every Romanist bishop in Europe, with a view to keep them "up to the mark," a Jesuit, Dom Leureux, who, Ignatius-like, dresses in the costume of the missionaries and tries to reproduce their spirit by his contributions to the Mappemonde, these three men are the soul of the Ultramontane party; its body consists of the whole of whom they have under their control; of the few young enthusiasts who (to suit schools) have followed out what they there learned, instead of forgetting it all the moment they got into the world; of women of all ranks—it is not comme il faut to be irreligious in French female society, and the unhappy creatures have only one idea of religion; and of course of the men of the religious orders in general. These work by keeping up an excitement in the country. No one knows who and how many of his friends and nearest relations are enrolled among the reactionists: no one, therefore, can tell whom he may be offending by expressing liberal opinions. Hence universal suspicion and distrust; and the system is perpetuated by the hold which the party has unhappily managed to get on education. M. About, in Le Progrès, told us some significant truths about this. This seemed the only dark shadow in his otherwise coloured picture of the future,—the great numbers whom the parti prêtre, systematically discountenanced under Louis Philippe, have ever since been training up into possible marguilliers, as he styles the bigots of the new schools (churchwarden is our nearest equivalent). The growth of Dom Lecreux is very happily described. He began a poor priest in Paris; the highest honour to which he could look forward that of being curate—one out of fifty—at St. Eustache. Angry with Mgr. Affre, the Archbishop of Paris, who did not participate in his high opinion of himself, he vows that though he can't be a bishop, he will still wear a mitre. He keeps his word. Some violent Ultramontane tracts, and above all, a critique on the Paris liturgy, which he stigmatises as tainted with heresy, recommend him to Rome. He then gets together three or four discontented priests like himself, and starts (Ignatius-like again) as an abbot of Augustin monks, with crosier, mitre, ring, and acolytes complete. He is, of course, Ultramontane to the backbone. Like Falot, "Le Pape, c'est l'Eglise," is the sum total of his creed. And then he, and those like him, are never content to let Rome go its own quiet way. It is they who keep urging it on till in its despair it makes one of those strange moves which try the faith of the staunchest believers in infallibility. It is they who, in our author's words, will (if they have their way unchecked) ruin religion altogether. But we cannot now follow this matter out further. We think we have said enough to show the futility of those ideas of "union between the Churches of Christendom" of which many good but misguided men dream, and plans and societies for setting forward which are so largely placarded in some of our extreme contemporaries. We cannot hope that what we may say will open the eyes of the blind partizans of a certain section in the Church of England (or, as they prefer to style it, the Anglican branch of the Church Catholic); but we may influence moderate men, and they are (happily) the strength of our Church, and of our national Christianity besides. The ultras of every party are but few in England, despite the noise they make. As to the scheme for union, and its chance of success, we may point to a paragraph which will be found in the Record of the 7th November, giving the Pope's views on the subject: "Such a plan is simply impossible: it proceeds on the false assumption that for the Photian schism and the English heresy there exist equally with the Roman Catholic Church, throughout the world, one Lord, one faith, one baptism." We are told that Eastern and Muscovite bishops are coming in troops to confer. It may be so; but the Pope will not yield an inch: he would cease to be the Pope if he did.

F.

PROTESTANTISM AND POPERY IN POLYNESIA.

WHAT will those who have been so ready to extol Roman Catholic missionaries say of the proceedings of the French in the Loyalty Islands, detailed in the letter from the Rev. Mr. Macfarlane, published by us last month, and described by him with somewhat greater fulness in another addressed to the London Missionary Society? That the French authorities acted under instigation of the priests, admits of no doubt, nor is it more open to question that the object of the priests was to silence Protestant missionaries in Lifu, Mare, and Uea, and finally to drive them away. As Mr. Macfarlane says, the Romanist has always had fair play in those islands, but this does not content him, and he has invoked despotism to strike down Protestantism. What an answer does this afford to the boast that Roman Catholic missionaries are high-spirited, intrepid, and devoted men, whose trust is in the truth and in the God of truth, and who, in carrying the banner of the Cross into remote territories, do not count their life dear unto them! Can those have confidence in the truth who endeavour to assist it—to open a way for it—with the rude enginery of material force? Can those have faith in God who look to the bayonet flash and the musket volley to give them the victory over their spiritual opponents? We desire to be just to the missionaries of Rome. We mention with unfeigned respect the name of Xavier. We are constrained to admit that there has mingled with the zeal of Protestants to extend the boundaries of the Redeemer's kingdom upon earth a spirit of caution and calculation—a habit of waiting until doors are opened—which we fail to trace in the apostles and evangelists of the early Church. It is to the honour of Rome that she carried her version of the Gospel into China before she could introduce it at the Treaty Ports, and that a Romish Church in China was adding to the roll of its martyrs while Protestant missionaries were waiting outside her gates. Nevertheless the fact remains that, in her missionary operations, as elsewhere, Rome leans on material force. The spectacle she presents at the centre of civilisation in Europe is essentially the same as that she exhibits in the remote islands of the Pacific. In the city of the seven hills and in the ocean solitudes of Polynesia, we behold her clinging to an arm of flesh, and refusing to depend upon spiritual and supernatural power. In Europe and in Polynesia, also, the Protestant Christianity which opposes Rome adopts a principle of action the reverse of hers. In Protestant England, Romanists are as free to propagate their opinions as in the shadow of the Vatican. In Polynesia the Protestant missionary has never called for a ship or a soldier to assist him in his work, or to stop the mouths of Roman Catholics. Strong in the conviction that truth is great, and will prevail—believing that the pure and simple Gospel will commend itself to the soul of man more persuasively than the most plausible and dazzling error—sure, above all, that the Spirit of God will own and bless the eternal verities of Scriptural Christianity rather than any corruption of them by human devices—Protestant missionaries in the South Sea have never dreamed of opposing the priests of Rome except by weapons drawn from the armouries of reason and Scripture. Can this contrast, presented wherever Romanism and Protestantism exist, be devoid of significance? Is there no cause to which the calmer, manlier, and more steadfast faith of Protestants can be traced? Does not this difference in operation proceed naturally from diversity of principle? Romanism rests as a system on the Church; Protestants allow of no intercepting medium between the Divine and the human, but are expressly, and, if we may so say, at first hand, the ministers and soldiers of Christ. The idea uppermost in the mind of the Romish missionary must, in ordinary circumstances, be the infallible Church, with the infallible Pope at its head. In obedience to this Church, with no shadow of warrant from Scripture, he has gone apart from his fellows, relinquished domestic ties, and denied himself that peace and tenderness of the family circle, that pure sunlight of home, which God has appointed to nurture and to expand the best affections of the soul. For the sake of his Church he has made a sacrifice which his Saviour nowhere demands of him. In his Church—we speak advisedly and with reverence—he lives, moves, and has his being. Mighty as this absorption of the individual in the Church may be as a principle of action, it is of less real wer than the Protestant principle of simple obedience to Divine commands. It ay produce a spasmodic energy, a feverish excitement, an indifference to the casures of life, which will pass for elevation above them ; but it cannot produce at deliberate and sustained endeavour, that placid fixity of purpose, that fortitude, at patience, that smiling earnestness of constant and unwavering faith, with which bitual reliance upon Christ, habitual reference, without medium interposed, to the lmighty, inspires the Protestant missionary. It is wise in Rome to seek aid from rthly potentates, for its spiritual resources are small compared with those of riptural Christianity.

There is another reflection borne in with melancholy impressiveness upon the mind these tidings from the Pacific. An error which takes the name of truth, which is corruption from the truth, which is the truth held in unrighteousness and not in the ve of it, is more virulent in its opposition to the pure Gospel than heathenism self. Publicans and sinners listened to Christ, were converted, and He healed them, it the Pharisee, the Scribe, the doctor of the law, would not hear Him. They had e letter of the Scriptures in their hands ; they were leaders of the Church and of e people ; they sat in Moses' seat, and Jesus himself commanded that they should : obeyed. But a subtle poison of self-trust and self-complacency had eaten out the al elements of their faith ; they had made the Word of God of none effect by their aditions ; with the names, badges, privileges of the Israel of God, they were actically involved in deadly error ; and publicans and harlots entered into the ingdom of heaven more readily than they. The unsophisticated natives of the oyalty Islands received the message of salvation gladly. They were sunk in olatry ; they were polygamists—nay, cannibals ; they probably knew not the very me of virtue. But their minds were not barred against the reception of the ospel by any process of artificial reasoning, and those moral instincts, inextinguish- le by the grossest accompaniments of savage life, which slumber in every human east, responded to the appeal of a religion divinely pure and divinely beautiful. It aid that when grass, which has been untouched for a quarter of a century or more, turned up, there arises often from the ground a company of flowers. Their rms, long hidden from sight, no sooner feel the influence of sunshine and of rain, an they swell and spring, and start into a vigour and a beauty none the less fresh at they have so long been buried out of view. Thus it is that, beneath the cumulations of heathen superstition and iniquity, the seeds of moral principle uplanted in the human soul by Him who made man in His own image lie indes- actible, and, when visited by the beam of truth and watered by the influence of e Spirit, rise into life and manifestation. If the plants grow, however, and if then blight steals over them, and if their vital sap is changed into a deadly virus oozing wly through their ducts, will the sun warm or the dew quicken them ? It is not prising, though inexpressibly melancholy, that the most determined enemy of ospel truth in the islands of the Pacific should be not the savage, but the Jesuit.

We must leave these more general considerations, however, and proceed to consider e question of Protestantism and Popery in the Pacific in its present and practical pect. Into the details of what we may call the armed aggression of Roman tholicism upon the Protestant missions of Polynesia it is unnecessary to go, but we at recall enough to our readers to place in clear relief the nature and magnitude of e evil, and to enable us to judge intelligently respecting measures of redress. About a arter of a century ago, the London Missionary Society established a mission in the yalty Islands, an extremely diminutive group lying fifty or sixty miles to the east New Caledonia. Lifu, Mare, and Uca, the members of the group, are little eks of rock and shingle, with scanty fringes of cocoa-nut foliage, too barren to of the slightest importance to commerce, and having a population of but a few thousands. At the time when the Protestant missionaries landed on their shores the French had no settlements near, and Great Britain, with her vast Australian possessions, suggested herself naturally to the mind as the mistress of the Pacific. The missionaries, however, sought no protection from England, and appear to have never considered the question of allegiance to a European power. As the ministers of Christ and the pioneers of civilisation, they found that their position was sufficiently strong. The barbarous people showed them kindness, and gradually turned from their idols to the true God. The abominations of heathenism gave place to a regulated and respectable mode of life. What efforts the missionaries put forth, what patience they manifested, what disappointments they suffered, how they watched and waited, and laboured, and prayed, until the voice of Christian praise, rising in the household and congregation, mingled its gentle note with the everlasting roll of the Pacific, the reader will conceive for himself. The work was all but accomplished. Cannibalism had become a frightful reminiscence, and polygamy was to be found only here and there. The islanders learned to dwell in houses and to cultivate the arts of industry. In Lifu alone there were seventeen churches, with 1,500 church members, 2,000 children and others at school, and many out-stations for preaching. The Government, meanwhile, practically and peaceably arranged itself as a combination of the patriarchal authority of the chiefs with that which the missionaries derived from intellectual and moral superiority. The people were contented, prosperous, happy, and free. Such was the position of affairs when the Emperor of the French resolved to take possession of the large island of New Caledonia, and make it the head-quarters of the French in the Pacific. This occurred a considerable number of years ago, but no step was taken to annex the Loyalty Islands. The missionaries having been Protestant and English, they had taught the English language in their schools, and the civilisation they introduced was on the English pattern. But beyond what was implied in this fact there was no alienation of the people from France, and it is an outrage on justice and common sense to charge it as a crime upon the islanders that they did not sufficiently respect the majesty of a nation which had not planted its flag on their soil or declared them its subjects. This, however, is the monstrous accusation brought by the French authorities of New Caledonia against the Protestants of Lifu and her sister islets, and for this imaginary crime they have been visited with fire and sword. Last May a stripling officer, styling himself Commandant of the Loyalty Islands, landed on Lifu with twenty-five soldiers, and announced his intention of teaching the inhabitants to obey. He was shortly followed by the Governor of New Caledonia, who came with a small army of 250 men to impress the natives with a due sense of the power and supremacy of France. The islands were formally taken possession of in the name of France; the people were informed that they were released from their allegiance to their chiefs, and that they must contribute no longer to the support of the missionaries; their sovereign was to be the French commandant, and to him they were to have recourse if they wanted advice. Proceedings so harsh and summary irritated the natives. They were not prepared to see their simple and domestic institutions thus cruelly abolished, or to rend asunder at a moment's notice the bonds of respect and affection which linked them to the chiefs and the missionaries. Alarmed by the presence of the soldiers, they took refuge in the bush, and laid hold of what arms they could find—clubs, spears, axes, and a few muskets. When the French retired to their ships in the evening, they swarmed into their habitations, and the clash and glancing of their arms were noted from the decks by the French. This, of course, was insurrection, and an opportunity had arisen for exhibiting the invincible prowess of France. The troops were divided. One-half the army landed on one side of the island, the other on the other, and they marched to the interior to put down all opposition. The expedition commenced with the earliest dawn of day, and the first undertaking which presented itself to the half of the valorous host was to reduce to obedience a score or two of Protestant worshippers, assembled at sunrise to hold a prayer-meeting. The French soldiers poured into the chapel, but finding the congregation in prayer, and observing no disposition to resist their intrusion, poured out again and took post round the edifice. At the end of the service the whole of the worshippers, with the exception of Mr. Macfarlane, were made prisoners. The reverend gentleman, unfortunately, we think, availed himself of the permission granted him to depart. On his way home he heard hallooing and firing, and perceived that the French and the natives were in conflict. There was loss of life on both sides, that of the natives being, of course, most considerable. At the same time the column advancing from the other side of the island came into collision with the people, and more bloodshed occurred. The village was burnt. A large number of cocoa-nut trees were cut down. A quantity of cocoa-nut fibre, collected by the natives for the missionaries, was committed to the flames. The victory of the Governor of New Caledonia was complete, and no one in Lifu disputed the authority of his Imperial Majesty. The time, therefore, had come for promulgating the ordinances of France. Protestantism was no longer to be tolerated on the islands. It might, indeed, be adhered to by the individual, or practised in the family circle, but public worship was laid under the ban. The voluntary maintenance of the missionaries by the natives was forbidden. The Imperial system, which makes the citizen hang upon the soldier, and turn in every emergency to the representative of Imperial authority, was introduced. The rule of the patriarch and the missionary was superseded by that of the gensd'armes and the bureaucrat. French was to take the place of English in the schools; a French Sunday was to be substituted for the Protestant Sabbath; the civilisation of Great Britain was to be thrust out, and that of France, supported on the right hand and on the left by military force, was to be brought in. Then did this Gallic hero of New Caledonia rest upon his laurels, and, contemplating the triumph of his arms, await the gratitude of an admiring country.

We shall not inquire whether all this is in accordance with international law. That civilised nations hold themselves entitled to take possession of territories occupied by uncivilised tribes, and to put down resistance by force, is unquestionable. From the moment the French erected their flag on New Caledonia, it was perfectly consistent with usage that they should shoot down all who opposed them. It is by no means so clear that the original occupation of New Caledonia included the occupation of the Loyalty Islands, or that the missionaries and the natives could have understood to do so. Such was the position taken up by the Governor of New Caledonia in his conferences with Mr. Macfarlane. The islanders were charged with disloyalty to France before France had declared them her subjects. Their crime was that they had naturally and inevitably become, in respect of language, religion, and habits of life, what instructors who visited them long ere the name of France had been heard on the islands had made them. That for a crime like this they should have been shot or bayoneted—that their houses should have been burned—that the trees on which they depended for subsistence—trees which it will take many years to replace—should have been cut down—constitutes one of the darkest outrages ever committed against humanity and civilisation.

Lamentable, in all human probability, will be the result to the islanders of Lifu, Uvea, and Uea. The civilisation growing up among them, marked as it is by many simple and beautiful traits, is a tender plant. Whether, even under the most favourable auspices, it would strike root and endure—whether a race whose stamina appear to have been for ages exhausted would have renewed its youth even under the fostering care of Protestant missionaries—may be deemed problematical. But no one can imagine that, when harshly and suddenly plucked up by the roots and replanted by the method of physical force, it will attain to anything like maturity. Protestantism is naturally a civiliser, because it appeals directly to the individual, and calls forth all the energies of individual character. The native of Great Britain, also, is naturally a civiliser, because the absolute personal freedom in which he has lived from infancy, the habits of self-help and self-reliance he has acquired, fit him to act with others and to call forth their dormant activities. Romanism, on the other hand, inculcates, as the first of all duties, submission to the Church, and if to the tutelage of Romish priests be added the tutelage of Imperialist soldiers, no system can be conceived more powerfully adapted to deaden the capacities of the soul. The tendency of Imperialism, and still more of Imperialism in alliance with Jesuitism, is to reduce civilised men to children, and there is small probability that it will educate persons who, in respect of civilisation, are children, into men. The Frenchman is the worst of colonists, because it is the ingrained habit of Frenchmen to look to Government officials, not to trust in themselves.

The worst result of all—the turning away of the native converts from the faith—we do not apprehend. If representations sufficiently firm and urgent are made to our Government, and if the matter is taken up by them and brought with all gravity and earnestness before the Emperor of the French, we cannot doubt that the Protestants of the Loyalty Islands will be permitted to continue the public exercise of their religion. The introduction of the Jesuit to Lifu, as one who does not scruple to use injustice and cruelty as means for attaining the objects of his Church, will not commend him to the inhabitants. Thus may the Almighty Father cause the wrath and the folly of man to praise Him, by rendering these mournful incidents conducive to the deepening and extending of true religion in these lonely islands of the great sea.

P. B.

Foreign Intelligence.

FRANCE.

—, France, December, 1864.

THE WEEK OF THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION.

Everybody is aware that the Protestants have, from year to year, a week of prayer, when they beseech the blessing of God for the advancement of the Gospel, the unity of the Church, the sanctification of Christians, the conversion of the heathen, and other things which relate to the most precious interests of religion. The Romanists have also their annual week of devotion, but for quite another object. It is the Virgin Mary—the Immaculate Virgin, as they call her—who possesses exclusively this privileged place. During seven or eight consecutive days, it is the theme of all the sermons, the subject of all the prayers, the centre of all the Popish worship. Add to this, splendid processions, magnificent illuminations, pomp of every kind: such is Mariolatry, as it now absorbs the attention and determines the action of the Papal Church.

Since the 8th of December, in this year in particular, the festivities in honour of Mary have been celebrated with extraordinary splendour. Pius IX. assisted personally, and with the most gaudy equipage, in the Mariolatric demonstrations. So, too, in Paris, Lyons, Marseilles, and throughout France, the priests and monks have displayed the greatest ardour in exalting the Immaculate Virgin. God and Jesus Christ are relegated to a secondary position. Mary is everything.

It is, in fact, the tenth anniversary of the proclamation of the famous dogma relative to the Immaculate Conception, and the sacerdotal body has not neglected this good opportunity of inflaming the imagination of the bigots, especially of the feminine sex. Here,

However, there is a difficulty or a disappointment, which a little embarrasses the fervent worshippers of Mary. You perhaps recollect that at the period when this dogma was promulgated the Jesuits and their disciples solemnly predicted that the Immaculate Virgin would recompense Pius IX. for his zeal by strengthening the Pontifical throne, crushing down the heretics and infidels, increasing the number of devoted Romanists, &c. Well, for ten years these bold prophets have been completely deceived by events. The Pope has lost more than half his states, and he is threatened with the loss of the other half. In Belgium, and in almost every country, Roman Catholicism has become weaker. It must be admitted, then, that the protection of Mary, upon which so many hopes were founded, has not at all responded to the expectations of the Roman Pontiff!

The organs of the clerical faction perfectly understand the force of this objection, but they seek to evade it by saying, that the decline is only apparent, and that the Papacy has been more powerful than in our own day. I copy these singular assertions word for word. If the Jesuits are sincere in putting forth such statements, we must do them the justice to say that they are consoled and contented at very little expense.

GALLICANISM AND ULTRAMONTANISM IN FRANCE.

Let us pass to another subject, which will, perhaps, be productive of serious consequences. Napoleon III. well understands that the Franco-Italian convention has greatly irritated Pius IX., the Roman cardinals, and the most zealous members of the episcopate. He is apprehensive that their clamour and intrigues will endanger his authority, and he wishes to neutralise the effects of this clerical agitation. In order to attain this end, the Emperor and his counsellors have thought that the best means is to re-constitute or to strengthen the Gallican party in the episcopate of this country; for if the bishops themselves are divided—if, in this matter, they range themselves under two different banners—they will, by the intestine struggle, diminish their influence, and all serious peril will be at an end. The French clergy, as you are aware, have always had among them bishops and priests who maintain the liberties of the French Church against the pretensions of Rome. In the reign of Louis XIV., by the eminent voice of Bossuet, they openly resisted the decrees of the Vatican. It was the same under Louis XV. and at more recent periods of our history.

For the last thirty or forty years Gallicanism has lost much of its influence, and seemed almost annihilated in France. However, it has still had its adherents, especially among the inferior clergy. Recollect the long resistance of the curés and the priests of the diocese of Lyons, when Cardinal-Archbishop de Bonald attempted to impose on them the use of the Roman liturgy. This was a striking manifestation of the Gallican spirit; and the French Government, faithful to its traditional policy, has not failed to give its support to the opponents of Pontifical omnipotence.

There are also some Gallican bishops, among others, M. Darboy, Archbishop of Paris. He is an intelligent, moderate man, suspected at Rome on account of his liberal ideas, and detested by the Jesuits. He is the Principal Chaplain (Grand-Aumônier) of Napoleon III., and a member of the Senate. This prelate naturally seeks to manage the susceptibilities of the Pontifical See; he speaks and acts with prudent reserve, and his pastoral letters never exceed the bounds of moderation. But everybody is aware that he has adopted the maxims of Gallicanism. He is at the head of the prelates who claim a certain measure of independence, and the Emperor can reckon upon him in critical circumstances.

Other facts, similar to the above, have taken place. Thus, the episcopal sees of Périgueux and Valence having become vacant, the head of the State nominated two Gallicans to the dignity of bishop. But these appointments require to be confirmed by the Pope, and it appears that serious difficulties in the matter have suggested themselves to the Court of Rome. Pius IX. claims to impose upon the new-made prelates, before sanctioning their election, a pledge of complete obedience. The French Ambassador has received orders to overcome these obstacles. Pius IX. and Cardinal Antonelli constantly reply by their famous Non possumus. It is a contest between the two Governments. Let the Roman Pontiff take care! Napoleon III. is not disposed to bow in servile submission to the arrogant sway of the Vatican!

Some of the Ministerial organs, in accordance with the word of command which they have received from those whose leadership they follow, also set forth and maintain the Gallican liberties. The daily paper called Le Pays energetically attacks Jesuitism, and invokes the great authority of Bossuet to put a limit to the Papal dictatorship.

What will be the result of these discussions between the Gallicans and the Ultramontanes? Evidently, if a considerable number of our French bishops had the courage to pronounce for the traditions of Gallicanism, the Papacy would be pierced to the heart; but the greater number of these prelates dread irritating the bigots and incurring the calumnies of the disciples of Loyola. This will, therefore, be a slow and laborious work.

EMBARRASSMENT OF THE JESUITS UPON THE QUESTION OF RELIGIOUS TOLERATION.

Within the last few weeks, the interpreters of Ultramontaniam, such as the Monde, the Union, the Gazette du Midi, &c., have had another controversy to maintain with the Liberal journals, the Siècle, the Opinion Nationale, and the Temps. The subject of the quarrel is this: The Czar Alexander II. has suppressed many Roman Catholic convents in Warsaw and the rest of Poland. It is not our intention to justify such a measure. The principle of religious liberty should be respected everywhere, and Evangelical men cannot approve of these acts of oppression. But the Jesuits are in a situation quite different from ours, and their embarrassment has been great. When they heard of the suppression of the Polish monasteries by an Imperial ukase, they indulged in the most violent invectives against the Muscovite Government. "Alexander II.," said they, "is a barbarian, a hypocrite, who conceals his tyranny beneath the mask of the national interests, an abominable despot, a cowardly imitator of the ancient Emperors of Rome, who shed the blood of martyrs,"—and so forth.

This is all very well. But the Liberal journals have opposed to these philippics the principles and proceedings of Popery. "By what right," they reply to the Jesuits, "do you condemn the intolerance of the Czar Alexander II.;—you, the murderers of the Albigenses and the Vaudois;—you, the founders of the Inquisition;—you, the authors of the massacre of St. Bartholomew;—you, the instigators and the panegyrists of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes;—you, in short, the relentless persecutors of the Protestants, Jews, and all the adversaries of Rome? Have you not ill-used their persons, closed their churches, confiscated their property, and committed many more atrocities upon them than the Russian Emperor has inflicted upon the Polish Romanists? And if Alexander II. walks in your footsteps, what have you to reproach him with?"

The reply is forcibly put, and is not without foundation in fact. The Jesuits, before accusing others of intolerance, ought to commence by disavowing their past acts and those of the Papacy. But no: that which they condemn in their antagonists they consider as legitimate for themselves, because they believe they are in possession of absolute truth and absolute goodness. This flagrant inconsistency must produce, sooner or later, the ruin of Romanism.

ATHEISM AMONG THE FREEMASONS.

While the Ultramontanes and the Liberals are maintaining this bitter controversy, infidelity is increasing in France, and is showing itself in the most hideous forms. It is not only by Deism or Naturalism that the fundamental doctrines of the Christian revelation are attacked; it is decided materialism, or atheism, which descends into the arena, and aspires to gain the assent of public opinion.

We have a sad and striking example of this state of things in the internal quarrels of Freemasonry. I am not initiated into the secrets of this institution; but it appears, according to the statements of well-informed persons, that the Freemasons have hitherto proclaimed the existence of God as the Grand Architect of the Universe, and of the immortality of the soul. Each of the members accepts these two principles before entering the association. But these bases of natural religion are now attacked; and as the constitution of the Masonic Lodges are to be modified next year, many of the members demand that the existence of God and the immortality of the soul should cease to be acknowledged, urging that everybody ought to be at liberty to become an atheist!

The article which they propose as the only foundation of Freemasonry is the inviolability of the human person, or the universal morality involved in the three words, liberty, equality, fraternity. This was the motto of the revolutionists of 1793. But Robespierre acknowledged, at least, a Supreme Being and a future life. Our freethinkers have professed during the last seventy years; they will admit nothing but pure atheism.

This attempt has excited much discussion among the Freemasons. It is probable that those of England and Scotland, with whom our own maintain amicable relations, will, for the most part, refuse to go to this extreme. We shall see what the movement will come to. In any case, here is a very characteristic and grievous fact in relation to our country.

ism claims supremacy in a society which everywhere reckons thousands of members.

INCREASING AGITATION AMONG THE FRENCH PROTESTANTS.

Let us turn our eyes from this mournful tale, and observe what is occurring among the French Protestants. Here there is a really great ground for apprehension and sorrow. The elections for the re-appointment of all the members of the consistories and synodical councils are approaching; they will take place in three weeks. Never were churches in a more troubled and critical state. On the one hand, are the Orthodox avowing to preserve the essential doctrines and the distinctive characteristics of communion; on the other, the men of extreme views, the Radicals of every grade, avowing to gain a majority for their shifting sentiments. The struggle is specially seen in Paris; but at Nîmes, Bordeaux, Lyons, Havre, &c., it is also evident. A civil war is going on within our communion, and as we advance nearer to the crisis moment, the discord is heard in deeper tones and assumes vaster proportions. Is it a Christian society, in the true sense of the word, in which all this is taking place? Surely not. When believers met to form a church, they had common and well-defined convictions; they could celebrate the same worship, utter the same prayers, partake of the same sacraments. They were united beforehand as to the fundamental articles of faith and practice, and the ecclesiastical polity was simply the expression of that unity.

Recently, all this was changed. French Protestantism contains wholly heterogeneous and antagonistic elements. What relation can there be between those who continue to believe in the supernatural intervention of God in the world and those who deny it? Evidently, here are two wholly distinct churches, two religions.

Our National Protestant communion is not united to the State, it is not to be feared that a separation between such opposite elements would be effected to-morrow. Evangelical men would found their own church upon immutable bases of the Holy Scriptures; they would continue the glorious work of our fathers, by introducing some modifications of minor importance only in its constitution; the negative men, in their turn, would endeavour to establish a religious society in accordance with their mind and their sentiments. But the legal union of our Church with the State creates almost insurmountable obstacles. The Orthodox maintain, and with just reason, that they represent the historical Protestantism of our country, and that they ought to remain in the National Establishment. The innovators also persist in being members, because they need the support of the State. How are the opposite claims to be reconciled and peace to be re-established?

LAYMEN TAKING PART IN THE STRUGGLE.

Our laws grant the right of voting, in the election of elders, to every male Protestant of thirty years of age, who declares that he attends public worship. This is, therefore, a species of universal suffrage, and the laity will pronounce the decisive and final sentence upon the question. The Orthodox have assuredly reason to hope for victory. They reckon upon the time-honoured and sacred traditions of the laity; they invoke the pious examples of our fathers; they know that the Church of which they are the defenders has, to use St. Paul's words, to possess and keep the faith which has been committed to it; above all, they place their confidence in the Lord, who has promised to be with His faithful disciples till the end of the world.

But the men of negative views have also means of exercising great influence. First, there is the infidelity, ignorance; and indifference of many persons, who, having little or no sense of religious need, are disposed to vote in favour of those who retain only a minimum of Christian faith. Then the great words liberty, toleration, charity, brotherly love, &c., produce a strong impression upon those who never penetrate beneath the surface of an idea or a fact. And, lastly, the party obtain the support of political journals belonging to the Opposition, which, being edited by freethinkers, readily afford their assistance to whatever bears a negative character.

Let us wait the issue of these collisions. My next letter will probably contain the principal results of the elections. Whatever may happen, men of piety will discharge their duty and will firmly maintain their ground.

X. X. X.

Paris, December 19, 1864.

THE IMPENDING ECCLESIASTICAL ELECTIONS.

Parties are running higher and higher in Paris as the time for the elections approaches. Both Orthodox and Liberal are straining every nerve to reach the goal. Party spirit on the Liberal, or rather Radical, side has penetrated the public at large, and the world, which knows its own and loves its own, stands round in eager interest, claps hands, and cheers it on, as blindfold it rushes towards the abyss! It entangles its feet now and then, and stumbles over a stone or two mercifully thrown in its way to impede its course and cause it to reflect, but rises again to bound with double speed over all hindrances. Your venerable correspondent, "X. X. X.," cast an historical obstacle or two, and faces have scarcely resumed their gravity after the universal smile called forth by the reply of the Rationalist Lien, that he evidently did not know the first word of our history! Of course, he took no notice of it!

The pert little paper, Le Protestant Libéral, contains arguments and perfidies worthy of Ultramontane pens, undermining faith both in doctrines and men, shaking the very foundations. The Orthodox have brought out to answer it a weekly supplement to L'Espérance, and the very numerous electors are inundated with these and other pamphlets, and visited and revisited by every man of persuasive powers who can be pressed into either side.

The three addresses on the "Rights and Duties of Laymen," delivered by Professor de Félice at Alais, on the occasion of the National Evangelical Conference in October, are doing good service, published as they are in a cheap form by the Toulouse Book Society. "The Doctrine of the New School according to Messieurs Réville, Coquerel, jun., and Colani," by Pastor Boissounas, Principal of the Preparatory Seminary of Theology at Batignolles, Paris; several works of Pastor Poulain, and others, are freely spread abroad. "Plus de Surnaturel," by N. Roussel, is finding its way into many hands; and much good will be the result. Not only is it expected that the Orthodox will succeed in the elections, but the interest the contest has stirred up on the vital truths of revelation will tell to the saving of souls.

EVANGELICAL EFFORT.

While the armed men are defending the bulwarks, the builders are not idle. Evangelization is widening its efforts; stirring tracts, brief, and going at once to the point, are being multiplied and widely distributed; ears are universally willing, and hearts open to receive the tidings of a present Saviour and free salvation. Strange that the glad sound should be so often obscured, unduly guarded, and refined upon, as if it were not still, as in days of yore, the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth! Little gatherings tend to multiply in private houses. I know of an Arab who gets a dozen neighbours to his house every week, and invites Christian men to speak, and sing, and pray, often adding a word himself. An Arab preaching the Gospel to Frenchmen!

Last week a party of English Christians went down to Chantilly to see the 300 jockeys and stablemen. About fifty came to a meeting, and listened with the most intense interest to earnest words about their soul. A good work is commenced there.

We are expecting Grattan Guinness in Paris to hold meetings in January. We hail the visits of English evangelists; they bring with them a stream of blessings, and leave long and lasting impressions.

SYNOD OF FREE EVANGELICAL CHURCHES.

The most prominent event in Paris Protestantism lately has been the sitting of the ninth Synod of the Union of Free Evangelical Churches. It met on Thursday, Nov. 24th, in Taitbout Chapel, and lasted a week. Morning prayer had preceded it, and the Lord gave His blessing of peace. Pastor John Boissou of Laforce, delivered the opening discourse on Psalm cxxvi., after which the sixty-three members elected their president, vice-presidents, and secretaries. Dr. Fisch was chosen president, and Pastor Pozzy and M. V. Pressensé vice-presidents. That evening Dr. Edmond de Pressensé gave to a crowded auditory a sketch of his late brief visit to Palestine. In its subsequent meetings the Synod admitted the churches of Nîmes, Saint Hippolyte, and Codognan into the Union, thereby increasing the number of churches to thirty-five. These admissions were not made without serious inquiry and lengthened discussion. An exceedingly touching letter was addressed, signed by all present, to the family of the late Dr. Frederic Monod, expressing their deep sympathy, admiration of his character, and affectionate remembrance of his labours, as their president, in eight successive synods.

Thirteen letters of greeting from various foreign and sister churches were read; and the deputed brethren from many other churches were heard with much interest and warm sympathy. The Commission of Evangelization gave an encouraging report, but is 8,000 francs in debt. A new form of ordination was discussed and adopted by a majority, but the Confession of Faith of the Union was taken as the only dogmatic to be subscribed necessarily by the candidates.

every candidate, however, before being ordained, must undergo an examination. An important financial question came before the Synod, in a report carefully prepared by the Commission nominated by the Synod of France. After much prayerful discussion, various opinions harmonised, and it was decided that in each church should be a body of collectors to promote regular contributions; that the Synod should name a Commission of Finance, composed of five members, to stimulate and systematise the contributions of the churches, to see that the central funds are efficiently sustained for necessary purposes, to give assistance to weak churches and theological students, and other objects determined by the Synodal Commission for local or general interests. The amount raised by each church for the stipend of its minister is thus appropriated, there being no common sustentation fund; but in each case, it is to pass through this Finance Commission.

The provincial pastors preached in various Paris churches; and hospitality was exercised by Paris Christians towards all the members.

An interesting ordination took place at the Oratoire last week; it was that of a young missionary, about to start for Senegal, where the French Missionary Society has already an agent, whose establishment has been greatly favoured by the Government. All the Evangelical churches were represented by their pastors at this touching ceremony. The consecrating pastor was Dr. Cazalis, Principal of the Mission-house.

Pastor Guillaume Monod has been chosen to the post in Paris left vacant by the demise of Professor Vermeil.

ITALY.

(From our Italian Correspondent.)

A POPISH PLOT DEFEATED.

A laughably malicious instance of lay bigotry lately occurred in Florence, in a quarter where it was least of all expected. The Evangelical Cemetery is now rapidly approaching completion, but throughout the entire course of the works connected with it, an unceasing hostility has been manifested by the priests towards their creatures to the quiet possession of their resting-place by the Evangelici in the neighbourhood of the town. The Waldenses offered by the Florentine municipality, three years ago, a cemetery three miles distant, and on a very hilly road; but of the Fratelli, stung to the quick by the account of various disgraceful proceedings in the sepulture of their dead by Roman Catholic hands, had already begun among themselves and in England a subscription for the purchase of ground and the erection of a neat building, close to the walls, and suited only for the evangelization of stragglers on Sabbath evening, but also of the multitudes, who, through curiosity, often attend the funeral of a Protestant. Happily, all the Christians in Florence, for the sake of peace and unity, combined in one large unsectarian committee, composed of a lay and clerical member from each of the native and foreign Protestant churches, to manage the affairs of this cemetery, in which a free grave is accorded to any man who dies in the profession of the Evangelical faith. The Government sanctioned the plan, the town council acquiesced, and the municipal council of Florence reported favourably on the beautiful spot of ground at the foot of Fiesole Hill, where all things are now nearly ready for the interment of our Protestant dead. A sum of 120*l.* is all that is needed to put the ground in order, and finish the gateway and keeper's house. The clerical faction, however, could not idly stand by and see this further innovation of liberty of conscience, which robbed them of one of their most valued privileges, the sepulture, according to their own rites, of all the dead—a privilege which was esteemed as only second in importance to the sway exercised in hospitals and private houses at the bedsides of the dying. The rural community within whose bounds the cemetery is situated was prompted to adopt every course of annoyance to the committee, short of regular legal proceedings. The late Prefect of Florence, who has succeeded for four years in making Florence the only exception to entire freedom of colportage in the large towns of Italy, was influenced to refuse the right of burial in the cemetery on three occasions this year, so that the costly Swiss burying-ground had to be resorted to. At last the mooted change of the capital to Florence came as a powerful help to our enemies in their opposition. It so happens that the Evangelical Cemetery is outside that gate of Florence where, in close proximity to one another, are found the Swiss and English Cemetery, the dépôt for the sewage of the town, the extensive burying-field of the "Misericordia" (the Charitable Poor Society of Florence), as well as some minor nuisances. It is precisely here that the Florentine municipality purposes to throw down the city walls, and build crescents and terraces of houses, to meet the influx of population shortly expected in the train of the Court and Parliament. It was a fine opportunity, as I trust it is the final one in this matter, for our sleepless foes, and it told so well, that from anxiety for the health of the city, the magistrates had remitted the consideration of what was best to be done in the cemetery quarter of the town to the Medical Council of Florence, which contains men of European fame. No time was lost in discharging the duty imposed upon them. An unusual alacrity marked their proceedings, in a country where dilatoriness is the habit, and procrastination the rule. On the fourth day the adverse medical report was ready, brimful of scientific knowledge. Thereafter it was printed in the Nazione newspaper, and greatly tickled the fancy of the few who were in the secret. It was suggested, with the utmost appearance of sound sense, how one and another of the existing plagues might, with slight remedial measures, be tolerated, and shown, by clearest demonstration, how the Evangelical Cemetery could on no account be allowed. The bitter animus of the report came out in gross misstatements, anything but creditable to the body which vouched its correctness. The Evangelical Cemetery was mentioned as containing 2,000 square metres, whereas it actually measures 7,000. The ground was wet, undrained, and ill suited for the purposes of interment, whereas a deep well in the centre of the plot showed the low level of the water and the dryness of the soil. The depth of earth was less than three feet, whereas nowhere is it under five feet. It was even proposed to improve the present unsatisfactory state of matters by allowing of an enlargement of ground to the "Misericordia" company, who bury an immense number of people, and use no coffins, covering over the dead with lime; even such an enlargement as would take in the whole ground of the Evangelical Cemetery itself, where only an average of twenty bodies per annum would be interred, and that after the decent fashion of Protestant lands. But the crowning injustice, which led the Evangelical Committee to publish and widely circulate a reply of the nature of an exposé, lay in the fact that the location of the cemetery was placed to the S.S.W. of Florence, whereas it is to the N.N.E. It was incredible that men with heads upon their shoulders, and charged with a scientific commission of the highest civic interest, should perpetrate such a blunder.

It must be a printer's error. Not so, gentle reader. The report proceeded at once to draw the inevitable conclusions from the posting of a cemetery to the S.S.W. of such a city as Florence. Were not the prevailing winds the soft, balmy breezes from the south, and would they not carry the pestilential miasma over the whole town, and poison the atmosphere inhaled by the inhabitants? Was not the dip of the land towards the north, so that the polluted water would pour into the conduits of the city from the abodes of the dead?

You can imagine how foolish some of our leading physicians looked—liberal men, too—when these incongruities were pointed out in a document, which bore their names, and how they felt towards Signor Punta, their president, who had concocted the whole story to impose on legislators in Turin, unacquainted with the localities of Tuscany. Signor Punta was a close associate of the late ruling family in Florence, and has shown his unaltered hatred to the cause of Christ.

A deputation from the Cemetery Committee had immediately an interview with Signor Cantelli, the new Prefect, in order to ascertain how far prejudice and injustice were to be allowed to go, and whether or not property rightly acquired was to be considered their own. The Prefect entered thoroughly and warmly into the views of the committee, and promised not only to grant liberty of sepulture, whenever the necessity should arise, and the request be presented to him, but to acquaint the Government, Municipality, and Medical Council of the true merits of the question.

PROTESTANT PREACHING OPPOSED—THE VALLEYS INVADED.

The feature of most interest in the Evangelical work during the last few weeks throughout Italy, is undoubtedly the opposition, more or less violent in different places, which the preaching of the Gospel has called forth. Eighty places of worship already occupied by the young Christians of Italy have not escaped the serious attention of the Pope. Probably they have suggested to him, as to others, that the true solution of the Roman question is ripening faster than any new propagand from without—as Italian evangelization is by the priests falsely considered—could have promised. Make every deduction for the political and hollow frippery gathered around the banner of Scriptural truth, winnow the elements of the Evangelical movement as thoroughly as we may, there is no denying that the genuine residue constitutes a most vital and vigorous antagonism to the security of Papal interests. The bishops and priests are unable, therefore, to despise or trifle with this nascent enterprise any longer. The thunders of the Vatican having failed to arrest its onward progress, the mot d'ordre has gone forth to grapple with the infant heresy wherever it shows itself, and that, happily, is well nigh everywhere. Full details would be fatiguing, but I may throw together a number of facts regarding some of the places where the strife is most intense, and leave your readers to judge of the stir created among the supporters of the Papacy and the consequent reality of the march of Protestantism in Italy.

In revenge for the active part which the Waldenses are taking in the enlightenment of their fellow-countrymen, their mountain homes are being invaded by zealous Popish missionaries, crosses are planted on the highways, churches are erected in several parishes, and the places vacated by thousands of Protestant emigrants from the Valleys, in these days of liberty, to Montevideo and elsewhere, are filled by a forced immigration of Catholics. The nine Catholic parishes among the Waldenses are presently in excitement with collections for new Madonnas, sermons on the glories of the Virgin, processions, festivals, and such like superstitious doings. It is given out industriously that Protestantism is not the religion of a gentleman. An appeal has actually been made to a sub-prefect as a crime, the refusal of the Waldenses to raise their hats in respect to the passing Madonnas, and one parish priest has been successful in stopping the erection of a Protestant church, by protesting to the Government that "the polite ears of Catholics in the vicinity would be scandalised by overhearing Waldensian preachments." On the other side of the hill, in the Valleys of Felix Nef, a cross was lately planted, with great ceremony, by an intruding bishop, and as speedily removed by the protesting inhabitants.

THE ANTI-PROTESTANT CRUSADE IN LOMBARDY AND PIEMONTE.

Lombardy is the most liberal province of Italy. While in Tuscany the priestly game has long been to combine and oust the Evangelicals of every colour from their hired houses and meeting places—in Milan, a beautiful hall is fitted up expressly for preaching purposes by the proprietor of a newly-erected tenement; in Pavia, a new hall is granted by the magistrate of the district himself; and the travelling evangelist gathers his auditory, in many of the mountain villages, in the rooms of one or other of the authorities.

But the work which is progressing so prosperously—special services for soldiers having recently been opened in Milan, where, too, all the evangelists are meeting regularly for prayer upon their work and mutual counsel—encounters, in many parts, even of Lombardy, every kind of hostility, secret and vile.

In Como, special processions and days of prayer are instituted, and pulpit harangues indulged in, in order to extirpate Protestantism, the bishop of the diocese, who for six years has not preached a sermon in the place, entering on the crusade with fiery zeal. A Como Evangelical carries his new-born infant, according to arrangement, to the nurse at Cerano, but finds that the priest has been beforehand, and prohibited his parishioner from receiving the child, under pain of enjoying no more the advantage of absolution, and of thereby being consigned to eternal damnation. Despite the pleadings of natural feeling on all sides, the priest, who saw Protestantism being introduced into the country side by means of this infant, insisted on expelling the missionary baby, and would have carried his point, had not the Syndic interfered, on the ground that we were now in the time of liberty, and not of the Inquisition.

In Intra, the excellent Evangelical schools, superior in every respect to those of the priests, have encountered incredible difficulties from monks, nuns, and episcopal appeals to the prejudices of the people. As the public had been constituted the judges, the evangelist wisely entered the lists with the bishop, and earnestly invited the magistracy and the working classes to be present at various public school examinations; the result of which has been to crowd all the classes with the Evangelical and Roman Catholic youth of the district.

At Monza, where the furious hierarch of the diocese of Milan resides, such extraordinary tactics have been resorted to, by means of the pulpit and the confessional, that the existence of a little flock, with regular public services, and evening schools for the working classes, is reckoned a marvel. Calumnies, persecutions, threats, and even the beating to death in the streets of a young man by the country people, infuriated through priestly diatribes, have been of no avail, for recently a new and more commodious hall was auspiciously opened for the services of the faithful Evangelicals.

At Brescia, a well-known character, who has incessantly annoyed the gatherings of the brethren, threatened beforehand, and despite every precaution taken, actually executed, with a host of comrades, such a violent interruption of public worship, as to scatter the congregation to their homes.

At Caravaggio, the proprietors of houses have listened to the insinuations of the priests and turned out the poor Evangelicals to the streets; while in other quarters, work has been denied them, and the means of gaining a livelihood withdrawn for the present.

Turning westwards to Piedmont, two cases of hardship have just come to our notice. At Vercelli an immense crowd is raised close to the evangelist's house by a fellow of the baser sort, who does not deny having taken a fee of the priests. "Get you gone with your psalm-singing. We have the Madonna, we wish the priests, you thieves, assassins, brigands of Evangelicals!" was the burden of a two hours long shout. This proceeding has not, however, daunted the seventy stanch members of the Church.

At Roccatagliata, again,—a mountain parish six miles from Favale, where the Bible has been widely circulated and read, through the encouragement of the late priest, a truly good man,—the newly-ordained curate, assisted by preaching friars, has begun to withdraw the Diodati from the people, promising to replace it with the Martini version,—preaches "destruction of heresy," teaches the people that the evangelist is under all the excommunications of Rome, and treats most injuriously the Protestants of the place.

PERSECUTING TENDENCIES IN PARMA AND MODENA—THE GUASTALLA CONVERTS.

Coming southward, instances are not wanting in the Emilia and the ex-Duchies of Parma and Modena that the power alone, and not the will, is wanting to light again the fires of persecution and thrust the Christians into the innermost prison.

In the town of Parma a dying Evangelical has lately been subjected, on the part of a bigoted lady of rank, to a sort of ceaseless torment in the public hospital, which has happily led to the laying down of a new and liberal code of rules for that institution, the Evangelical pastor being permitted at all times to see the members or adherents of his church, and the interfering parties on this occasion, who belong to a religious order, having had their right to enter when they liked withdrawn. In this same town, where the preaching of the Word has been greatly blessed, at the funeral of a man who had lately from the Church of Rome to the Evangelicals, a great crowd was collared and howl, and break windows, and dead. The town guards alone saved the town from being seriously

At Carpi, eighteen miles from Modena, of the most recently-formed station there is said to be a real awakening after the preaching of the Gospel of the Capitular Vicar has been read from the pulpits, warning that whoever has the daring to persecute Evangelicals, or to attend meetings, or to let them have a room way to co-operate directly or indirectly, will incur every penalty of law and will commit a grievous sin. A confessor of the diocese has power except in the event of death or refusal.

At Guastalla, the religious excitement. A troop of monkish soldiers have been brought to the town. churches a couple of these worthies whom will face an Evangelical in discussion, take opposite sides, the one and the Papist, and carry on a lively controversy, in which, of course, the Protestant comes off second best. A debate, a decent miller got up and did much better fight for the Gospel than was put down, because he was orator and not a theologian. The reformed church continues to flourish exceedingly. I am happy to say has set a novel example of liberality to the other churches. At a meeting, late in November, the Christians unanimously decided to relieve the Waldensian Evangelical committee of the burden of the expatriation mission. One of the wealthier offered a hall better suited for the purpose and several workmen at once offered their gratuitous services in rearranging for Divine service the hall. For the maintenance of the order themselves, one and another came to the treasury with his contribution five, ten, and five francs, and their own words express, they hope to make experience of what Dr. Revel had faithfully written to them: "You will see that the truth will become manifest to you in proportion to the sacrifice for it. You will soon become convinced that a man cannot acquire a greater treasure than to enjoy a more blessed peace in a church founded solely upon the Word and an open Bible."

PRIESTLY MANŒUVRES IN TUSCANY.

It would take too long to write of Tuscany, where bigotry and priestly effort have reached their greatest height and gained their greatest successes. The places where suffering and trial have not followed hard upon the declaration of Evangelical sentiments are the rare exceptions which but prove the rule. Leghorn alone would supply a small volume of cases. No sooner was Signor Ribet off for his last autumn holiday of a month, than the statement was handed about that he had made off with 25,000 francs, and could never return. Florence has just seen a young Evangelical turned away from a printing-office because of his faith, whereas in the Evangelical Claudian Press, which had a first visit lately from the gens d'armes, there are only three professed Evangelicals among the thirty workmen of the establishment, no religious test being applied. In Pisa, for six or eight months back, the Gospel had been making considerable head, and the priestly passions have been stirred up in an unusual degree. Serious disturbances have taken place, but the work goes on in the new church, which was secured after immense exertion and many failures. In Lucca, the new church—a freehold property of the Waldenses—was crowded at the opening service in November. Many country-people were there, whom the priests had made believe that the Evangelicals slaughtered and offered up cattle in sacrifice to the devil!

The disappointment of some of the assembly, whose curiosity had been greatly excited at not seeing the ox led forth and slain, was very great, and they were overheard making rather uncomplimentary observations about their priests as they left the church. Signor Ribet, in referring to the dispute as to the merits of the Diodati and Martini versions of the Scriptures, and in defending the character of Diodati, made an excellent hit when he told the audience that the celebrated translator was a fellow-citizen of theirs, a native of Lucca, and that he could scarce be anything but orthodox, seeing that his godfather was Charles V., and that he had been baptized by the Pope of the period, who, along with the Emperor, happened to be in the town on the day when the great Greek and Hebrew scholar saw the light.

It would also be easy to illustrate the present virulent proceedings against the cause of Christ on the part of priests and priestly retainers by reference to the stations already formed along the coast line between Pisa and Genoa by Spezia, the famous Riviera di Levante road, along which so many English travellers have passed. Several friends have, these three or four weeks past, gone over the ground and inspected the congregations at Carrara, Massa, Spezia, Arcola, Saizana, Lerici, &c., and their reports are exceedingly interesting. It will be better, however, to delay till a future number the grouping of these details into a connected narrative.

GERMANY.

Frankfort, December 15, 1864.

GERMAN POLICY—THE YEAR'S ACCOUNT.

The year is drawing to its close. The next number of your journal, in which these lines will appear, will bear the date of 1865. If, from this period of the year, we take a glance backward upon its course, we are not able to say that the events which have made public life in Germany are of a nature to cheer those who love this country. In a political point of view, the year has not been favourable either to national liberties or to the developments of social life; and in respect to religion, if we except certain great and handsome testimonies rendered to divine truth in some public assemblies, and some useful works of Christian faith and love, we are no more able to say that the year has been marked by sensible progress in religious life and in the liberty of the Church. It may be judged of by some recent facts gathered from both these domains.

While recently the Prussian troops returning from the war in the Duchies entered Berlin in triumph, and that city put on its holiday garments to celebrate their victories, Count von Bismark won, in diplomacy, other victories, which will not be to the profit of the public liberties. In effect, he forced the Germanic Diet, which was already so profoundly abased by him, to withdraw the Federal troops from Holstein, which belongs to Germany, and to abandon the Duchies to the discretion of the Prussian Government. What will he do with them? Such is the question about which all Europe is in suspense. To attain this end, it was necessary that Count von Bismark should gain another victory over the Austrian Government, and should induce it to consent to his views. In this he has succeeded. Hereby the Cabinet of Vienna loses the confidence of the minor states of Germany, and its influence over them, yielding at the same time to Prussia, its rival. This policy of the Austrian Government, which is only explained by its apprehensions on the side of Italy and Hungary, has been severely blamed by the address of the Chamber of Deputies, recently discussed and voted. The Ministry has suffered a complete check in its debates, but it nevertheless remains in its place. This is the way in which constitutional government is understood in Germany.

Meanwhile, the Duchies conquered by the allied armies remain deprived of the government of their choice, for which they have so decidedly spoken. Nobody attends to their imprescriptible rights. The Germanic Diet quietly and slowly examines the titles of the different pretenders, and, as if to give a climax to the absurdity of this feudal policy, certain Prussian journals have unburied the rights of I know not what Elector of Brandenburg, which go back to the fifteenth century; whilst other Austrian journals show the validity of the rights of their dynasty over the Duchies, proceeding from I know not what Duke of Lorraine. Europe smiles at all these pretensions, founded upon old dusty parchments, to the possession of a people, as if it were the question of the inheritance of a field, or of a flock of sheep. But what is not to be laughed at, is that such principles can, in the middle of the nineteenth century, control the Governments of great nations. If to these considerations you add the undoubted influence acquired by the policy of Count von Bismarck, you will understand what I said just now, that the year has not been favourable to political liberty.

RELIGIOUS QUESTIONS IN THE GRAND DUCHY OF BADEN AND ELSEWHERE.

In religious questions, the case may possibly be different in character, but I fear it is only in appearance. The universal and very popular movement, the aim of which is to transfer the government of the Church from the hands of the State to those of the communes, involves, in the view of all enlightened men, many reasons for apprehension, that when the last inquiry is made, the Church will only have exchanged one despotism for another. Without doubt, the principle that the Christian Church ought to govern itself, is perfectly just and legitimate. But the masses, in great part without religion, are not the Christian Church. This is what our Liberal Protestants, who are at the head of this movement, have not yet realised. These reflections are suggested to me by new incidents which have occurred in the agitation awakened by the book of Dr. Schenkel in the Grand Duchy of Baden, which marches at the head of the movement of renovation. Your readers will remember that a large portion of the pastors of this small state, to the number of 119, protested against the book in question, and in a petition, supported by arguments, requested the Ecclesiastical Council to remove Dr. Schenkel, not from his theological professorship at the University of Heidelberg, which only depends upon the State, but only from the management of the seminary for the young preachers, which is an institution of the Church. This distinction is certainly deceitful at bottom, for where is the difference between lectures in theology given to students, and the management of an establishment where they finish their studies? However this may be, the Superior Council has not only refused the request of the petitioners, on the ground of considerations in favour of liberty for science, but it has blamed them for their protest, as in their view an assault upon the rights of ecclesiastical authority. Thereupon the Orthodox pastors have met again, and have considered a declaration addressed to the Ecclesiastical Council, and communicated to all the parochial councils of the country. The object of this document was to justify their previous proceedings, and to discuss the reasons alleged against them by the Council. Now observe, that by a decision under date of November 18, 1864, the said authority refuses to receive the declaration of the pastors, and returns it to them, without even entering it upon the minutes, because it cannot be allowed that such a declaration should be made after the former decision of the Council, under the date of August 17, and because the declaration, besides divers false interpretations of the said decision, contains nothing that is new. Moreover, the Council expresses to the pastors its "most serious disapprobation" that they have published and sent their declaration to all the parochial councils of the country.

Such are the details in regard to this discussion. There may possibly have been an error of form in the measure taken by the Orthodox pastors. But that ministers of the Gospel, charged with the conduct of their flocks, and responsible for the immortal souls which have been entrusted to them, should not have the right to protest against doctrines and facts which offend their consciences; that any should deny them the right and the duty without distinction as to their faith religious character.

What will the 119 Orthodox pastors do not know. In the meantime, by their superior authority, they are full of invectives, insults, and even from the party which calls itself and the whole of the press which is its organ. On the other hand, they from different sections of Germany of assent to their principles and protest. The latest of these addresses, signed by the Duke of Westphalia, is couched in the following terms: "In accordance with the decision of the Central Ecclesiastical Society of Saxony, we also declare our dissent to the testimony which our brethren of Baden have borne against the address of Dr. Schenkel; we declare at the same time our deep regret that, in spite of a well founded, it has been decided by the Professor Schenkel in his ecclesiastical capacity to be principal of a seminary of young men and that from motives which call in question all true government of the Church and which violate the essence of its mission of faith." It is apparent that the agitation engaged in, seemingly about principles of ecclesiastical government, is at bottom a pure question of doctrine, and as such will develop itself with constantly increasing clearness in the movement which is going on in all the provinces of Germany.

Truly, the men who combat according to their conscience for Evangelical doctrines comprehend that these doctrines will only be saved amid religious liberty, and by the power of the Word and and of forbidding the students, the future clergy of the Church, to attend the courses at the universities. This has been done for a long time with complete success by the Bishop of Mentz; so that for a number of years the Catholic professors of theology at the University of Giessen have been deprived of all their students, and leisurely occupy simple sinecures. But observe, lately the Bishop of Spire, having wished to follow their example, has not found the Bavarian Government so complaisant as that of Hesse had been; his theological seminary has been interdicted by the Minister for Worship at Munich; he has opened it despite of the prohibition; he has remonstrated and insisted; and at the end of the business the establishment has had to be shut up by force, notwithstanding the intervention of the Pope, to whom is allowed, as to all Roman Catholics, the right to cry out against tyranny and martyrdom. The Government of the Grand Duchy of Baden, already occupied with the Protestant agitation, is also engaged at this very time in a conflict much more serious yet with the Bishop of Friburg, on the delicate question of schools. Thus at all points the fatal confusion of temporal and spiritual interests brings Church and State into conflicts for power as disadvantageous for one as for the other, and especially in regard to liberty and religion.

THE KINGDOM OF JESUS CHRIST.

Happily, however, beneath the agitations which occupy public opinion, the Gospel of Jesus Christ silently performs its work divine in the myriads of souls which are accessible

DENMARK.

REVIEW OF THE PAST YEAR.

The clerical correspondent who sends the following communication has often addressed us from the more northern part of Jutland. Notwithstanding some severe remarks upon the invaders of his native soil, few British readers will withhold their sympathy from a Christian minister and patriotic Dane, who writes under a weight of sorrow caused by the disastrous issue of the recent war:—

Aarhus, December 11, 1864.

When one casts a glance over the year, at the end of which we now stand, one cannot but feel his heart very deeply grieved at the results of the last war, and at its burdens, which we have deeply felt, and shall feel for years. I have myself lived for several months under the occupation of the enemy, when nobody was able to have his home to himself, but had his rooms invaded by an insolent foe, and when nobody knew whether or not he would be imprisoned and ill-used by his oppressors. Now we can breathe freely again, though our hearts are filled with the deepest grief. But we know that all this is from the Lord, and His will is always the best, even if we cannot understand why it should be so. Blessed be the Lord that this visitation has not been unfruitful for us! When our soldiers, in the depth of the winter, with unrivalled bravery, fought for their dear native land, the gratitude of their countrymen poured forth in an abundance of gifts to themselves, their women, and their children. But it was not only their worldly welfare for which their countrymen were concerned. A lady of one of our first families wrote a letter to the Rev. W. Beck, a director of our Home Missionary Society, and one of our most zealous young clergymen, exhorting him to do something for the eternal interests of our soldiers. A subscription was set on foot, and appeals were largely responded to, principally by the Christian peasantry. Several colporteurs were sent to the army, where they aided the army chaplains in their Christian efforts, and were a great blessing to many soldiers. It was principally in Aalen, amongst the defenders of Duppel, that they laboured with remarkable results. These courageous soldiers, who daily went forth with death before their eyes, were moved by the Word of God, and it seemed for a time as if whole regiments would be awakened. I have myself, here in Jutland, assisted at military services, have distributed tracts amongst the soldiers, and have been very glad to see the hunger and thirst after the Word of God amongst many of them. When we remember that the children of God are always a little flock, and that much of the seed does not bear ripe fruit in the ear, we should be the more glad if we see the fruit of this largely-sown seed, for I believe that not a few have been truly converted to the Lord.

And it is not only amongst the soldiers that these hard times have effected much good: their earnest appeals have not been lost on the hearts of us who have not been called to pour out our blood for our dear country. In this city, where I now am a minister, I have seen with joy many seek the house of God in these times of troubles, when they could not freely leave their homes, which were invaded by insolent enemies; and when I instituted a third service, on the evening of the Lord's-day, I was again gratified by meeting a congregation more numerous than I had dared to hope. And as far as I have ascertained, the same has been the case even in other places. What the end of all these troubles will be, it is impossible to say. Would to God that good results may follow, and that His visitations may be to the eternal blessing of many in our dear little country!

But what shall I say, when I look to Schleswig! You remember how often I have said, when I wrote to you on this question, that it was an exclusively political question, and that it was hypocrisy of the Germans to say that there existed a religious persecution in Schleswig. And now am I not justified? At Flensburg, the capital of Schleswig, and the seat of a great and loyal party, where two Danish pastors officiated in connexion with a large and flourishing congregation, with a school of 500 or 600 children, the pastors were deposed, the congregation was dissolved, and the church given to the Papists, of whom there certainly could be but a dozen in Flensburg. But who will now attempt the work of conversion in "liberated" Schleswig?

And how have the Prussians ruled in Schleswig! Ninety-seven pastors and a much greater number of teachers are deposed, and very justly a German paper, the Koelner Zeitung, observes, that this number is very great in a country whose population does not exceed 700,000 souls, for in the southern part of the country there was not a minister to eject, because the Danes had scarcely tried at all to appoint Danish pastors in the exclusively German parts of the Duchy. But a few loyal pastors in the southern part are ejected; in the mixed districts all the loyal pastors are ejected; northwards of Flensburg, where all, with a few exceptions are Danes, pure Danes, says the Koelner Zeitung, many pastors are ejected, and others appointed, who speak Danish very badly. The grammar schools of the entire Duchy are now wholly German, and efforts are made to Germanize the other schools, principally in the cities. Now I may ask, where are those Germans who always spoke of the religious persecution in Schleswig, where Germans had German services, Danes Danish services, the mixed districts mixed services? Do they now come forward and petition their Governments to put an end to the existing persecution? Do they now come forward in the English journals to detect the persecution against the Danes in Schleswig? All are silent, and their silence shows that now their resentment against all religious persecution was not meant, or has disappeared before their desire to Germanize the whole world, were it possible. I may hope that our Christian friends in England now see that this whole question was exclusively political. How the Ecclesiastical Government of Schleswig meddles with politics, and acts hypocritically, that it must shock the heart of every Christian, you may see from a pastoral letter on "Luther's Day, 1864," by Mr. Godt, Superintendent-General of Schleswig. In that letter he commands the clergy of all Schleswig, and the districts of Jut-

and now separated from it, to hold a thanksgiving service on December 4 (Second Sunday in Advent), at which the services shall be founded on Iam lxxxv. 9—14, and thanks shall be offered

God for the results of the peace. Now everybody knows that at least the half of Schleswig, against its own will, has been torn from the bosom of its native land, of which it has been a part from time immemorial, of which the visit of 5,000 Schleswig peasants a few days ago at Kolding, to pay their compliments to our King, was evidence. Nevertheless, this Superintendent-General commands these congregations to thank God for that peace which they deplore with all their heart. Could it be to God that the day may come when truth and justice may again obtain their rights! And may these trials work for our good, that we may strive to enter into our heavenly home, of which none can bereave us.

I had written the above when I saw in the Fædrelandet of December 12th, an article by Rev. Mr. Munk, lately of Flensburg, on the Free Danish congregation, and the Danish school at Flensburg, from which I extract the following statement, which, without doubt, will interest your readers: "A Danish congregation existed at Flensburg before 1848, but the pastor had a very insufficient salary, and besides officiated as curate to the German pastors of this city, and the members of the congregation had to pay all the dues to the German pastor, in whose parish they resided. Accordingly the congregation declined rapidly; in 1800 there was 1,000 communicants; in 1848 but ten. In 1850, the Rev. G. F. A. Grae became pastor of the Danish congregation, and anybody was allowed, as heretofore, to join this congregation, but in so doing was exempted from the payment of dues to a German pastor, besides those to his own. Now, when the pressure was removed, and the congregation had obtained a very gifted pastor, it increased in an astonishing manner. The little church, that hitherto almost always had been empty, was filled, and often proved insufficient to contain the numerous attendants, and this year 600 families, besides the garrison, belonged to the congregation. It has its own unofficial poor-rates, and in 1852 it obtained its own school. This school commenced with twenty-seven children, but on January 1st, 1861, this number of children was 520, with eight teachers, and even now after the war it is 490. A true Christian life pervaded the congregation, so that even the German commissaries found that its relations in this respect left nothing to be wished for. But when the loyal magistrate was deposed, and a disloyal one appointed, the persecution began, and on August 20th both the pastors were deposed, because they declared they felt themselves bound by their oath to their King. They could not even obtain the permission to deliver a farewell sermon to their flock. Another disloyal pastor was appointed, who, however, preached the true Word of God, but on November 30th the congregation was dissolved; its members may hear Danish sermons, but they are to be considered as members of the parish in which they reside, and pay the duties to the parsons of these parishes.

And now a few words on the Prussian soldiers. One would have believed, to read the flaming descriptions of some, that a Christian spirit pervaded this army. By no means! I shall not speak of the cruelties, thefts, and coarseness, committed by many of them, but shall only offer a few remarks on their profanation of the Sabbath. They had a singular taste for making their entries into cities, or their movements from place to place, on the Lord's-day. At Aalborg, Aarhus, and perhaps elsewhere, they passed the churches where services were held, the military bands playing with all their might. I have distributed, myself and by friends of mine, many German tracts amongst the Prussian soldiers; but often I or others met with such remarks as, "We do not care for such books," &c., remarks that I never have met with amongst the Danish soldiers. Their army chaplains did not seem to be very busy. Many of them were sick; but the less one says of them the better. Two of our colporteurs were captured by the Prussians at the conquest of Alsens. They were very ill-used by a Prussian general, and were denied all but the coarsest food, till a Christian officer of rank befriended them.

V.

SYRIA.

DEMAND FOR FEMALE EDUCATION.

Our readers are aware that, in connexion with the efforts of the American missionaries, a wide-spread spirit of inquiry and progress has sprung up on the mountain slopes of Lebanon, about Damaeus, and near the springs of the Jordan. In this general onward movement, the disappearance of inveterate prejudices against female education and the success of educational experiments are perhaps among the most remarkable and cheering features. A correspondent sends the following communication upon the subject:—

Several attempts to raise the females of Syria had already been made both by the American missionaries and also by an English lady, Mrs. Watson. But these were on a restricted scale compared to the extensive organization of the English schools founded by Mrs. Bowen Thompson, at Beyrout.

The superior conduct of the young women and girls trained in these schools disarmed prejudice; and having once gained the confidence of the natives of all ranks and sects, a strong desire was expressed that they should be permanently established. In deference to the recommendation of the late Sir Culling Fardley, and also as a fitting tribute to his memory, the Syrian Asylums Committee laid the foundation for the endowment of the institution for the training of native teachers by a noble grant of 1,000*l*. The original premises have now been purchased, and as funds are supplied, will be gradually fitted up as a regular school and normal training establishment.

During a recent tour in the Lebanon, Mrs. Bowen Thompson was everywhere besieged with entreaties to open girls' schools. Thus, when at Muktara, she writes: "I have just received a visit from the sister to Junblatt Bey. She came to entreat me to open a girls' school at Muktara, as she did not like her little girl to go to the boys' school. She assured me that many Druses, as well as Christians, were anxious for a girls' school. They had one for about three months under the Seleeby's taught by one of my girls, Cecilia; but as she married, there has been none for the last twelve months. She offered me a very good room and a residence for the teacher, if I would send a mistress who could teach the children sewing, knitting, &c. In the course of Sunday and Monday many native women came and entreated me to open a girls' school. I promised to report their desire to friends at home, and if it were possible, to send them a teacher.

"At Deir el Kamer I was met by several who had been with me at Beyrout, and who had not forgotten to read their Bible, though long absent from the school. I was urged by several to establish a girls' school, and was informed that a petition had already been presented to the Consul-General, when he passed through some five weeks before. The petition was signed by thirty heads of families, and they were now awaiting the answer. The Druse women flocked around me, begging me to give them a girls' school.

"At Ain Zakalnah, where nearly half the population is Protestant, we found a native teacher, with a little flock assembled in a very suitable place of worship, reading and praying with the people every evening after they came home from work. It was most reviving to my heart, and the Rev. Mr. Bird, of the American Mission, who has mainly originated this station, has done a great and a good work here. The native teacher, formerly a Maronite, I think, told me he dated his conversion from the time of the former massacres, when he found a Protestant Bible, miles away at Zachle, among some things in a burnt-down house. This man has the charge of the congregation, and the boys' school, under a Druse teacher. He begged very much I would let them have one of my teachers to open a girls' school. I observed the Americans were the mother of the mission, and it was to them he ought to apply. He said, 'Very true, lady; but if the mother has lost her milk, will she not be glad if one who has nourishment will take and feed her child?'

"At Zaachleh the people would take no denial, and many were the petitions urged, and anxiety expressed, that I would forthwith open a girls' school, and several of the upper classes promised to send their children, and pay for them. In various other smaller towns the same request was urged.

"At Hasbaya the good work has already been established for above a year; the flourishing girls' day and Sunday-school is attended by the resident native Christians, Druses from the family of the Sil Naify, and the members of the Mohammedan Governor's family! At the distribution of prizes these three sweet Moslem maidens each selected a New Testament.

"At Banias, the ancient Cæsarea Philippi, the mixed population of Motuale, Moslem and Christians, all united in a petition for a teacher and a girls' school! They said many Franks came there, but it was only to bathe in the Jordan and visit the ruins, but that none came to visit their sick and read to them out of the Book."

Miss Ingram, a lady who accompanied Mr. Thompson in this tour, writes: "It would thrill your heart in every fibre were you here, and travelling over the country, as Mrs. Thompson and I did, to witness everywhere such a craving for education. The people seem to have risen out of the deep lethargy of satisfied ignorance in which they have lived for so long. They are ignorant still, but not satisfied. The Greek Church is increasing its activity. They are building new and beautiful churches and commodious seminaries, that look so inviting, that the youth who are sent to be educated in these establishments must like them much better than their own dwellings. Protestant England and Protestant Scotland must make some extensive and resolute exertion. The feeling of the country is entirely in their favour. The Scriptures are doing their work of true enlightenment wherever they are read, and those who have been reared in the Greek Church are dissatisfied with it."

INDIA.

FEARFUL HURRICANE: DESTRUCTION OF MISSION PROPERTY.

The agents of the Propagation, the London and the Baptist Missionary Societies, and of the Free Church and English Presbyterian Missions in Calcutta and the adjacent country, have transmitted accounts of the disastrous results of the terrible cyclone which had swept over those and other parts of India. All speak of the destruction of mission property, and appeal to British liberality to repair the losses thus sustained, though the full extent of these are not yet known. A most vivid description of one of the many scenes of devastation is given by the Rev. C. E. Driberg, of Tollygunge. He remarks that there has been no such hurricane since 1737. It was blowing a perfect tornado, beneath the violence of which the church and school-house (both happily empty) had given way, when, writes Mr. Driberg—

Somebody said that the dormitory was down, and that some of the boys were under the ruins. Horror-struck, Mr. Berry and myself went to their rescue, but, though the distance was only a few hundred yards, it was not so easy to reach the dormitory—the strongest man could scarcely keep his legs. I was carried off mine, and dashed against a wall, but, thank God, escaped with only a few bruises, and was enabled to bring all the boys safe to our house. We had but one room where we were safe from the violence of the wind and rain. The east side of the house was battered by the storms, all the windows beaten to pieces, and the rooms deluged. At three o'clock the storm was at its highest; everything seemed to yield to it; it appeared as if the house itself would be blown to pieces; a large Cassarina fir fell on it, and shook it like an aspen-leaf. The whole mission compound was in ruins by this time.

The night which succeeded was so still and quiet, that the contrast made it positively painful, with desolation and ruin all around:—

The road was blocked up for miles by fallen poor natives, houseless, and wet, and wandering hither and thither in search

Our house was filled with our school-boys, all stretched in our dining-room and to the other. No food had we to give there was no possibility of making a fire yet. In our villages south of this, which I lately visited, the disasters were heart-breaking. The whole population, heathens as well as Christians, had been made houseless; many lost, cattle destroyed; granaries with stores of grain blown to pieces, and the country covered all over the country. Two Christians and one man were killed by the fall of houses. The deaths among the heathens were greater, though not greater in proportion. Every bungalow church, every school in the [London] Mission Society mission, destroyed. But I fail in giving you any accurate description of the scene of ruin and devastation to your eye; you are paralysed. On Sunday I had an overflowing congregation at Jhanjra, and administered the Holy Communion to nearly every one who was present. I had communicants; none would turn their backs on that occasion to thanksgiving; they were delivered from death that seemed so near. It was a most striking sight when, in the evening, surrounded by the heathen of the village at their request, under the canopy of the temple, I read the 29th Psalm, and returned to the whole village.

At Diamond Harbour, at the extreme end of this mission, the cyclone was still more severely felt:—

In addition to the rain and wind there, the storm-wave rose twenty feet high! and in a sweep away houses, and cottages, and things, and cattle, and grain of every kind perished here. We had a small number of some twelve or sixteen souls; I did not know of them; I am afraid they perished.

The native pastor at Meerpoore, Brojo Nath Das, that—

Huts and trees were falling around him, and people, with their families, came to his aid. Among the largest and strongest, for present, a huge tree fell upon it and the house, barely giving the inmates time to get into the church, which had just been when came the terrible storm-wave upon it swept off the chapel roof, and walls, and windows, into one confused mass. In the evening, Brojo Nath contrived to get his family, and others who were close at hand, on one of the pitched roofs that floated close to them—this was all. At this moment the roof of the house was flung upon them by the violence of the wind, and seven of their number were killed. They floated on, and on, and on, towards the mighty river, which seemed ready to hem up, they and their little ones; but by the mercy of the raft struck against a tree, and enabled to make it fast to it, and so till the waters receded. They lost all together sixteen of the forty who had embarked on that frail raft.

Dr. Mullens, of the London Society's mission at Calcutta, says, that at Diamond Harbour the storm-wave rushed inland for eight miles. "Here," he adds, "the loss of life is greatest. Not less than three thousand people, with five or six thousand farm bullocks, must have been drowned." Relief to the survivors was prompt and efficient. A General Cyclone Fund was at once commenced, a committee was appointed, and food was forwarded to the famishing. A relief expedition was also organised, of which the Rev. J. E. Payne, of the London Society, was a member. He reports, after visiting the districts in question, that about a hundred miles of country have been desolated by the cyclone. The greatest damage done to the property of the London Society has been among the village churches. One new station (Kaorapukur) was almost destroyed. The native missionary's brick-built house here proved a refuge to all the inhabitants—Christian, Hindoo, and Mohammedan—when everything else was under water.

A missionary of the Baptist Society expresses his apprehension that 1,000*l.* will not repair all the damage its property has sustained.

The losses of the Free Church Missions will, it is feared, exceed 5,000*l.* From the extensive district of Mahanad, the native superintendent of the missions reports that the mission premises are a complete wreck. "There is not one bungalow in the mission compound," he writes, "in which we can now put our heads." Similar accounts have been received from Chinsurah and Bansberia, and more are expected from other districts.

The English Presbyterian Mission has not escaped the ravages of the cyclone, but the damage sustained is comparatively slight.

The accounts from Masulipatam, on the Telugu coast, which have come to hand since those from Calcutta, are most distressing. One letter says that the native town is entirely washed away, and that five thousand natives, at least, have perished. Masulipatam is the centre of the Church Missionary Society's operations among the Telugu population; the Society will, therefore, have to tell of losses which it has sustained, both there and at Calcutta, though of these we have at present no intelligence.

CHINA.

DURATION OF ACTIVE MISSIONARY SERVICE.

It would be well if, in every department of missions, some of those engaged in the work would do for their own field of labour what is here done by our correspondent with reference to China. To every considerate mind these statistics must plead most eloquently for additional agency, of the right kind, for the spread of the Gospel in that great empire:—

The numerical results of missionary enterprise in China are not striking, some 3,000 being the number of accredited church members. But it must not be forgotten that facilities for missionary labour, beyond most of the open ports, only date back some five years; and the helps to acquire a pure vernacular, in many places, quite recent; so that it may in truth be said that the Christian Church has but commenced her great work in the land of Sinim.

There is another fact which the Church would do well to ponder in the spirit of prayer—that she cannot reasonably expect great Gospel success among the Chinese unless her agents are efficient and greatly multiplied, so as to ensure a greater number of tried men and good speakers in the great centres of missionary effort. At present, the removals by death, failure of health, and other causes, allow but few, in the whole empire, to give the lengthened service so desirable. Is it reasonable that the spiritual subjugation of 300 millions should be left to some 100 men, who can only show an average of about six years' service?

The loss of men by mortality, failure of health, &c., in the Government and mercantile establishments is great. G. W. Cooke, Esq., in his work on China, gives the following: "Of the 600 men who now form the strength of the 59th, there are 150 in hospital. This regiment has been at Hongkong for eight years, and there are not ten men of those who originally landed now left. I was told, although the statement seems quite incredible, that upwards of 2,000 men have been buried or sent home permanently invalided since the 59th have been at Hongkong." The Chinese Repository for 1847—long before the above gentleman wrote—gives a table showing the mortality of the troops at Hongkong during the five preceding summers. After showing the decrease of mortality, the following reason is assigned: "The new barracks, which are said to be not only unrivalled, but unequalled in the British dominions, by their construction and location so favourable to the health and comfort of the occupants, illustrate the economy as well as the humanity, of the Government by which they have been provided." So that it is plain the mortality and failure of health referred to by G. W. Cooke, Esq., is not avoidable by Government.

The Chinese Repository gives the proportion of deaths to the resident European population in 1847 as 3.50 per cent. But no returns are given of the losses to mercantile establishments by removals to England, &c., which would considerably add to the number of changes.

The above facts show that, in China, the pressure upon strength and vitality is considerable;

nor can missionaries expect to be exempt from the general law.

The following statistics are based on a paper prepared and published by S. W. Williams, LL.D., in 1858, with my own notes on missionary labour in the Canton province from that date to September, 1864. The subject has its difficulties, and with all possible care, some little inaccuracies may be detected; but in this I am only willing to stand corrected, that the Church may know what she is doing for China. I give the names of some missionaries in full, as they are well known both in Great Britain and America.

The Christian countries that have sent missionaries to the Chinese are, chiefly, England, Germany, and America; and from 1807 to 1853—say fifty years—213 men were sent, which gives about three missionaries in every two years to each country. America stands at the head of the list; for, as far as can be ascertained, she sent 113, England 78, and Germany, Holland, &c., 22. The London Missionary Society sent 37 missionaries to the Chinese, which is more than any society or board sent. The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions sent 30, and the American Presbyterian Board 30. All other societies and boards number from 16 to one.

Of the 213 missionaries sent, 87 remained in China in 1858, less than one to three millions; 19 of that number having visited their homes once or oftener; and 23 were absent on account of health, or for other causes.

Of the whole number, 69 have retired, and 89 have died in connexion with their respective missions.

The total period of labour of the 39 who have died in the work is 241 years, an average of 6½ years to each; but the aggregate of Dr. Morrison, 27 years; Dr. Medhurst, 40 years; Mr. Dyer, 16 years; Dr. Abel, 15 years; Mr. Goddard, 15 years; Mr. Pohlman, 11 years; and Mr. Quarterman, 11 years, is 135 years, and leaves to the other 32 only 106 years, or an average of 3½ years.

The total period of labour of the 69 who have retired (5 of whom are still in China) is 378 years, or an average of 5½ years. But deducting the aggregate of Dr. Williams, 24 years; Mr. S. Johnson, 20 years; Dr. Parker, 13 years; Mr. Dean, 22 years; Mr. Milne, son of Dr. Milne, 15 years, or 94 years;—there remains to the 64 others 284 years, or an average of 4½ years.

The statistics of the Canton province date from 1807 to 1864, and approximate to correctness. The total number of missionaries sent by the three Christian countries is 61. Thirty-six of this number have died or retired, one or two having retired only for a time, we hope. The total period of labour of the 36 is about 244 years, or an average of a little less than 6½. Of this total, 7 had visited their homes once or more; but deducting the total of Dr. Morrison, 27 years; Dr. Williams, 24 years; Dr. Hobson, 20 years; Dr. Parker, 13 years; Mr. W. Bonney, 19 years; Mr. Gensehn, 10 years; or 119 years, an average of 19 years and 10 months—five of the six had been home once or more—the remaining 30 have an aggregate of 125 years only, or an average of 4 years and 2 months.

Of the 25 missionaries now in the province (two have very recently arrived, and are not counted), to of 213 years of service has been given, age of about 6½ years. But Dr. Legg's Mr. Lechler's 17 years, Dr. Ball's 22 Happer's 15 years, give a total of 79 in average of 19 years and 9 months. e four has been home once or more. ing 134 years, divided among the other an average of about 6 years and 4 re statistics show that most of the mis- China are comparatively young men, ears having been spent in learning how e sword of the Spirit, which consider- as the average of full service. How can edied? How can a greater number of men be retained in China—men who the idiom and pure intonation of the uage as a sceptre of respect over any nce in our preaching-rooms—men who upwards, and get upwards, the infant scriptural and experimental knowledge can leave a Christian literature behind e legacy of their love? We ask, how can such men be multiplied? The mortality will continue, in all probability, in the same ratio; retirement, from failure of health and other causes, the same too; so that the only means Evangelical Christendom has of bringing about so desirable an end, is the rapid and continuous multiplication of men of energy and power.

I am sorry to state, upon good authority, that the number of missionaries in China is not greater than ten years ago. When, we may ask, will China be spiritually subjugated at this rate? We have an insidious philosophy, permeating the higher and influencing the lower classes, to contend with. We have the opposition of idolatry and superstition, made authoritative by years. We have the flaunting pride of an intellectualism, shallow to a degree, to oppose Christianity everywhere by its withering sneer, and, if I mistake not, the work calls for good men, for wise men, and for men of large experience. "The harvest truly is plenteous, but the labourers are few; pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that he will send forth labourers into his harvest." S.

AMERICA.

New York, December 9, 1864.

HOW OF THE PRESIDENTIAL CONTEST.

hat the election is over, there re- cely a trace of the intense excite- ch preceded it. The victors have e grown tired of congratulating r, and the defeated party have ac- result so complacently, that it is elieve they are greatly dissatisfied. Multitudes of men who did their eir candidates, while they had hope , adopt the declared policy of their almost as heartily as if they had osed it. We look on with wonder ude, while so fierce a storm gives , sudden and so complete a calm. , every department of trade and eels the influence of this decision.

of the war, we know, lies in the od. But we now expect to fight t issue is reached, and we expect to Business men, who before the elec- w not what to do, can lay plans nd if gold goes up under the pros- delayed peace, the Government go up also. The nation braces he struggle, demands of the Govern- almost vigour in the prosecution of nd does not shrink from paying the amount almost equal to its annual income in ordinary times. The greater part of this considerable sum has already been contributed, and there remains no doubt that the whole will be received by the middle of the current month. Some of your readers will be glad to know that the Amoy Mission of that Board is to be reinforced by four missionaries, two male, and two female, who will sail about the 20th inst. Rev. J. O. N. Talmadge will return to the field in which he has rendered such well-known and successful service. He will be accompanied by the Rev. J. Howard van Doren, who has just been ordained to the missionary work, and whose zeal and talents give promise of singular usefulness.

The American Board, as you know, has no need to abridge its great work. One of its most respected missionaries, Rev. H. H. Jessup, lately sailed for England upon his return to Syria. A part of his errand to this country has been to solicit funds for the erection of a Female Seminary in Beyrout. More than two-thirds of the needed sum were subscribed before he left, and the remainder is sure to be contributed. This will add ten thousand dollars to the very liberal gifts which have just been made for the support of the missions of the American Board.

THE SYRIAN MISSION FIELD: NEW COLLEGE AND ARABIC BIBLE.

FOREIGN MISSIONS.

only and confident temper is proving rable to every religious enterprise. o months ago the Board of Foreign of the Reformed Dutch Church all for thirty thousand dollars; an

There are other ways in which this mission-field of Syria is attracting the attention of American Christians. The attempt to endow an Arabic college has been made within the past year, and has met a munificent response from gentlemen of different denominations. Many circumstances are combining to arouse the Oriental mind to unusual activity; and it is seen that the offer of a liberal literary and scientific training will appear very inviting to multitudes of Arabic-speaking youth. If this training can be given under Evangelical auspices, it is evident that it will not even greatly increase the number of native preachers, but help to imbue all the educated and influential classes with Christian knowledge and feeling. This grand undertaking is already beyond the risk of failure. A large part of the funds has been already secured. A part of the faculty, if not the whole, has been appointed, and is on the way to Syria. If British Christians should be solicited to help in this work, they may be sure that in America it has commanded the sympathy and co-operation of the wisest and best friends of missions.

Just at this moment, too, the new Arabic translation of the Scriptures is completed, and steps are taking to give it the widest diffusion. This great work, begun by Rev. Dr. Eli Smith, and completed by Rev. Dr. van Dyck, has been sixteen years in progress. Of the merit of the translation it is not necessary for me to speak, since the British and Foreign Bible Society have rejected all other translations in its favour. The American Bible Society, upon the recent and urgent solicitation of the Syrian Mission, have resolved to electotype at least four editions of this version, and have requested Dr. van Dyck to superintend the work in person. The rapidity with which recent partial editions have been taken up, and the immense field of future distribution among the 120 millions who read the Arabic language, give the very highest interest to this undertaking. The cost of issuing the four editions will be not less than 45,000 dollars. But the society indulges no doubt that the means of performing so important a work will be placed in its hands.

BIBLES FOR THE SOUTH—INCREASED CHRISTIAN LIBERALITY.

While I speak of the American Bible Society, it is proper to say that it continues to send large supplies of Bibles and Testaments to the people and armies of the South. The number of volumes thus sent have been increased by many thousands since I wrote you on this subject.

The Methodist Episcopal Church has reduced the work of benevolent contributions to a very perfect system. The gross amount of the collections made in this denomination in the year closing with October, 1864, was 558,000 dollars. The estimate for the coming year is larger by 64,000 dollars, and reaches the amount of 622,000 dollars, of which the full half is appropriated to foreign missions. No doubt is entertained that this large sum will be contributed.

Similar statements might be made concerning the increased liberality of every Evangelical denomination. Christian men among us are giving upon a scale that has had no example in our previous history. Nor are their gifts regulated by a nice calculation of the proportion between a dollar in gold and a dollar in paper. They are giving freely in proportion to the need; and the fact is almost as pleasant to our patriotism as to our piety. It encourages us to think of our nation as a "vineyard which God's right hand hath planted, and a branch that he has made strong for himself." We expect the vine to be "purged, that it may bring forth more fruit;" but not to be "destroyed," since "a blessing is in it."

DEATH OF PROFESSOR SILLIMAN.

Our religious press has taken notice of the recent death of Professor Benjamin Silliman, a name long known and respected among us, both in the scientific and the religious world. For forty-seven years, from 1806 to 1853, he was Professor of Chemistry and Natural Philosophy in Yale College. In that chair, which he occupied with distinguished ability, and by the Journal of Science, of which he was for many years the editor, he has exerted a very wide influence upon scientific study in America. His simple and unwavering faith in the religion of Christ, and his readiness to avow it upon all fitting occasions, has aided not a little to confute that claim of infidelity, that high attainments in physical science are inconsistent with a hearty acceptance of revealed religion. Happily, he has not stood alone among our scientific men. But his most respectable position, his attractive character and presence, his large attainments, and his long professional life, have enabled him to bear such available testimony for Christianity as could be borne by few others. His death was a fitting conclusion of his consistent and persuasive life. On the morning of November 24th, the day of our National Thanksgiving, after awaking early, and speaking of his own occasions for thanksgiving in his apparent recovery from a recent sickness, he proceeded, according to the custom of his old age, to give utterance to his morning prayer, while still reclining in his bed. This prayer was very full of grateful expressions, and of particular petitions for children and grandchildren. Then, after the Lord's Prayer had been repeated at his request, he recited a part of Watts's version of the 5th Psalm—

Lord, in the morning thou shalt hear;
and asked to have the hymn—

Come Holy Spirit, Heavenly Dove,

repeated to him. After this, while anticipating with joy the more protracted family worship to which his increasing strength promised that day to admit him, and expressing his desire to attend the public thanksgiving service, a shadow passed over his features, he breathed somewhat heavily, and was gone. He was eighty-five years old.

Home Intelligence.

BISHOP COLENZO AND BISHOP GRAY.

The Judicial Committee of Privy Council has at the present moment a new ecclesiastical cause before it;—not, however, affecting matters of doctrine; or at least only in a very indirect manner. Nevertheless, the case involves questions of such grave and wide bearing on the condition of the Episcopal Church in our colonies, and its relations to the mother Church at home, that we are sure our readers will be glad of a short summary of the long and abstruse pleadings which were addressed to the Court for and against their interference.

It will be remembered that the Bishop of Cape Town, assuming to himself the powers of Metropolitan Bishop of the Church of South Africa, summoned Dr. Colenso, as Bishop of Natal, to appear before him and answer to the charge of heresy, involved in the publication of his work on the Pentateuch. Bishop Colenso disputed his authority, and refused to appear; on which Bishop Gray, having first taken counsel with other bishops in Africa, pronounced on the heretic bishop a sentence of deposition. Against this sentence Bishop Colenso appealed to the Queen in Council.

The grounds on which the Bishop of Cape Town bases his jurisdiction may be shortly stated. Some years ago he was the only bishop in South Africa. It was then judged requisite that his diocese should be broken up, and divided into three sees. To facilitate this process, he resigned his appointment, and this arrangement was made. To one of the new dioceses Dr. Colenso was appointed, and it appears that the doctor was consecrated a few weeks before the appointment of Dr. Gray. The new patent by which Dr. Gray was appointed to the circumscribed See of Cape Town contained words that made him metropolitan, and gave him jurisdiction over the other bishops, with no other appeal, on their part, than one to the Archbishop of Canterbury. It is alleged that Dr. Colenso knew and consented to this control over him before he accepted his own see; but the bishop himself denies this, and says that he was not aware he would have to render to Bishop Gray any further obedience than a suffragan is bound to render to his metropolitan. When, therefore, after the publication of Bishop Colenso's unfortunate work, Bishop Gray proceeded to put his patent into actual force by the deposition of his suffragan, the present appeal to the Queen was at once instituted.

The points argued by the counsel for Bishop Colenso are three. 1. That the Cape being a colony in possession of a constitution granted by the Crown, the Sovereign could not, in point of fact, after that create a new ecclesiastical court without the consent of the Colonial Parliament, nor had the Crown power to grant to the Bishop of Cape Town a criminal jurisdiction over another bishop, so as to justify him in proceeding to the act of deposition. 2. That the Crown had no power to issue a patent, nor did it in fact issue a patent, defeating Bishop Colenso's right of appeal to the Crown, and remitting him for redress only to the Archbishop of Canterbury. 3. That Bishop Colenso had never waived his right of appeal to the Crown by any contract, real or supposed, with the Bishop of Cape Town. Such are the pleas on the part of the appellant. The answers of the counsel for the bishop may be supposed. They plead that on the colony of Natal being a conquest of the Crown (which, by the way, the appellants deny), the Crown had a right to declare that the Bishop of Natal should be subject to the Bishop of Cape Town, as a matter of positive and coercive law, and they argue that by the patents the Bishop of Natal was in fact submitted to the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Cape Town. 2. They argue that an archbishop can at common law deprive a suffragan (of which there is one case in English ecclesiastical history, in the deprivation of a Bishop of St. David's), and that in the case before the Court the appeal lies in the first instance to the Archbishop of Canterbury. But, 3, they virtually give up the claim they were disposed to insist on at the outset, that the Crown is ousted of its jurisdiction altogether; and Sir Hugh Cairns, for Bishop Gray, admitted that the Bishop of Natal would have, in the end, a right of appeal to the Crown. All he contended for was that he had claimed that right too soon; he ought first to have appealed to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and in the event of an adverse judgment there, he would have his remedy in an appeal to the Crown.

It will be evident from this sketch that the heretical opinions of the Bishop of Natal do not come into consideration at all. It is purely a case of abstract constitutional law. Its decision, however, one way or the other, cannot fail mightily to affect the position and progress of the churches in the colonies, and the decision of the Court is therefore looked forward to with great interest.

THE ADDRESS TO THE ARCHBISHOPS.

The lay address thanking the Archbishops of Canterbury and York for their pastoral letters in support of the doctrines involved in the decision of the Judicial Committee of Council was presented to their Graces at Lambeth Palace, in the course of last month, by a highly-respectable deputation of the subscribers. The address, signed by 137,000 lay members of the Church of England, was read by the Earl of Romney, after a few introductory remarks. The Archbishop of Canterbury then replied:—

I accept with cordial satisfaction the expression of your gratitude for the pastoral letter which I recently addressed to the clergy and laity of my province under circumstances of no ordinary gravity. Articles of belief, which had ever been held by the Church Catholic, and by all its several branches, seemed to be impugned, and deep anxiety pervaded the minds of a large proportion of the members of our Church. I thus felt myself called upon to give my reasons for having dissented from the recent judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The principle on which I proceeded is the very principle laid down and recognised by that judgment itself—namely, that such rule or teaching only is to be ascribed to the Church as we find to be expressly stated in her articles or formularies, or which are plainly to be involved in or to be collected from that which is written. The doctrines in question seemed to me to be so "plainly involved in or to be collected from" the articles and formularies of our Church, that I had no alternative but to dissent from a judgment which denounced the contrary; and it is most gratifying to me to find that the course I then pursued is so consonant with the views and feelings of that large and important body of Churchmen whom you represent, and that there is so resolute a determination on their part to maintain and uphold the cardinal doctrines of our Church.

This was followed by a reply from the Archbishop of York, who said:—

I thank you mostly sincerely for the address that has just been read, so far as it relates to myself. I thank you for the support which it gives to me, whose experience in the episcopal office has been short, and who would gladly have left the leading part in these discussions entirely to older and wiser prelates. Nothing but a strong sense of duty would have drawn from me the Pastoral Letter to which the address is a reply. I do not conceal from myself that these are times of severe trial. The person of our Lord himself, and the Divine doctrine that fell from His own lips, will hardly escape the criticism which has begun with the book that reveals them; but, on the other hand, past ages have seen the same sort of cloud storm the sky, and the storm has passed and the Sun of Righteousness shines still unchanged in the heavens, Author of light and life to them that turn towards Him. I am persuaded that this will be the issue now even if the storm be long and many hearts fail because of it. The duty of Christian teachers at this time is not difficult to see. The Church of England is founded on the Word of God—that is her law and her doctrine. She has no other weapon against sin and evil in the world. Our duty is to be more and more active in preaching that Word—more earnest in the study of it, and of all that can throw light upon it—more sedulous in presenting its warnings and consolations convincingly to our people—more diligent in instructing our children—more careful that our preaching shall not be an echo of some past generation, but an application of eternal truths to the needs of men and women in this somewhat luxurious and self-indulgent, but intellectual age. If this is the effect of our present troubles, the Church of Christ may emerge from them chastened and strengthened for her work of turning souls to Christ.

It is remarkable that even some writers in the secular press, who have referred, in an unfriendly and depreciatory tone, to the course adopted by the Archbishops and those who have identified themselves with their sentiments, have felt themselves compelled to quote the concluding sentences of the northern Primate's reply, as giving the best possible advice under existing circumstances.

THE CLERICAL SUBSCRIPTION COMMISSION.

According to a report in the newspapers, the Royal Commissioners have unanimously agreed to recommend—

1st. That the declaration prescribed by the Act of Uniformity—viz., "I do hereby declare my unfeigned assent and consent to all and every thing contained and prescribed in and by the book intituled the Book of Common Prayer"—shall not be required of or from any clergyman of the United Church hereafter; and 2ndly, that there shall be from henceforth but one form of subscription and declaration—viz., "I assent to the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion and the Book of Common Prayer, and of ordering of Bishops nd Deacons; I believe the doctrine of ed Church of England and Ireland as t forth to be agreeable to the Word of l in public prayer and administration of ments I will use the form in the said scribed, and none other, except so far as ordered by lawful authority."

THE BISHOP OF LONDON'S FUND.

Bishop of London recently presided dual meeting of the Islington Church n Society, and stated that the pro-de by his fund, for overtaking the destitution of the metropolis, was ouraging. The desired fund is a sterling in ten years, at the rate of a-year. The Bishop said that st year, which was now closed, they ved in actual money 99,900*l.*, while promises to the extent of 71,000*l.*
He was thankful to say there was no m of interest, every week producing ble sums. And these contributions ed an infinite amount of Christian in other ways. Then, as to the e:—

the year they had provided the means eighty clergymen to the diocese, each g a population of 2,000 supplied, in l, or more than the tenth part of the million. Of Scripture-readers and mism fifty-nine additional had been pro-rather beyond than below the ten nate. Again, means had been provided seven mission-stations, each the centre place of worship; and grants had been twenty-four permanent churches, represents, derived from one source or another, 240,000*l.*

REREDOS DISPUTE AT TORQUAY.

ars that the Tractarians are proceed-st and too far for the aged Bishop
. It is something new to find him the ardour, checking the impetupositively prohibiting the practices mi-Romanists in his diocese. Yet what has lately occurred between a Tractarian clergyman in Tort. John's Church in that town has r repair, the principal feature in the a being a new chancel, which is in the highest style of mediæval art.
her innovations, a reredos was fitted back of the communion-table, the as wealthy individuals. This reredos abscise piece of sculpture, professing the crucifixion, but really bringing ly to view only a crucifix, and that, aged, that, when put in its place, it form an integral portion of the hen the Bishop of Jamaica, who duty for the aged prelate in the western diocese, went to consecrate the chancel, he was so struck with this piece of Popish innovation, that he refused to proceed, but reported the matter to the bishop, who at once adopted his coadjutor's views, and refused to consecrate or even to licence the place till an assurance were given him that the reredos should be removed with all convenient speed, and that in the meantime it should be concealed. The incumbent very reluctantly, and after many evasions, was forced to comply so far as the temporary concealment went, but we believe the offensive piece of furniture has not yet been removed.

PROTESTANT ALLIANCE PRIZES ON THE PAPACY.

On the 9th of last month a numerous-attended meeting was held at Freemasons' Hall for the distribution of the prizes offered by the Protestant Alliance to the successful candidates for examination in Barrow's work on the supremacy of the Pope. The chair was taken by the Hon. Arthur Kinnaird.
There were about 200 candidates, of whom fifteen obtained money prizes, the highest 50*l.* and a gold medal, and thirty-six certificates of merit. The circumstances connected with the examination and the prizes are well described in the following extract from the address of Mr. John McGregor:—

That was the second examination held by the Protestant Alliance. The first took place about seven years ago, on which occasion there were thirty-six candidates. Two or three gentlemen distinguished themselves on that occasion. One of them afterwards went to a university, and, having been ordained, was selected by his friend
Mr. Maguire as his curate; while another wrote an answer to "Essays and Reviews," which was characterised by one of the Quarterly Reviews as the most able reply that had appeared. On this occasion they had a larger number of candidates, a very much larger number of prizes, and, perhaps, also a corresponding increase of interest. The expense occasioned by this second examination—already well repaid by the interest and instruction connected with it—in prizes and other matters was about 500*l.* The number of candidates was about 200, and they were examined in London, Dublin, Bristol, and Edinburgh. The examination took place in January last.

The meeting was afterwards addressed by the Chairman, by Dr. Davis, by Colonel Walker, and the Rev. Robert Maguire, who reminded the meeting that, by a curious coincidence, this meeting was held on the three hundredth anniversary of the day when Pope Pius IV. promulgated the creed which went under his name, and which separated the Roman Catholic Church from all other churches in the world. The meeting was altogether one of considerable interest.

OBITUARY.

The Presbyterian community of London has lost two of its most distinguished ministers—the Rev. Dr. Archer, for thirty-three years minister of Oxenden Chapel, who died at Chelsea on the 23rd of November; and the Rev. James D. Burns, of Hampstead, who died at Mentone, in the Maritime Alps, on the 27th of November. For the last six or eight years, owing to failing strength, Dr.

Archer's appearances in public have not been frequent, but both on the platform and in the pulpit, his ready eloquence and the warm heart and energy which he threw into his effort, made him a great favourite, both in London and the provinces. Mr. Burns was a man of great beauty. He has written many hymns and short poems, which are calculated to retain an enduring place in our literature.

Monthly Survey of Missions.

TURKEY.

We congratulate the American Board on the progress towards self-support of missions in Turkey, as indicated by recent intelligence from both the Western and Eastern portions of the Ottoman empire. A meeting of the native ministers and lay representatives held at Broosa, in Western Turkey, has resulted in constituting an organization, called "Union of the Evangelical Armenian Churches of Bithynia." The constituent members are ordained native Evangelical ministers, and one delegate from each of the churches, the ministers having the privileges of membership, excepting that they may not vote. The Union intended to promote the closer fellowship and co-operation of the churches, the improvement of their general spiritual condition, education, and kindred objects. That it is Presbyterian rather than Congregational in its structure, is apparent from the fact, that provision is made for receiving appeals from members of the churches against sentences pronounced upon them in cases of discipline, the decision of the Union being final.

Similar action is reported from the field of the Central Turkey mission, where an ecclesiastical organization has been formed by the native converts, the name of which, as literally translated, "The Presbyterian Assembly of Aintab and Vicinity." In the former case, it is understood that while missionaries will not have the responsible vote in this ecclesiastical body, and will not be subject to its discipline, they will be invited to attend its meetings, and take part, by invitation, in its ecclesiastical acts, so far as they may deem it well to do so. Neither the native ministers and churches, nor the missionaries, expedient that an ecclesiastical body in Turkey should be originally connected with America.

The Central Turkey Mission has sustained a heavy blow in the death of one of its colleagues appeared to regard as its most distinguished member—the Rev. Zenas Gossett. Occupying other posts, he had arrived at Marash, where he was about to fill a responsible position in the Theological Seminary. Genial and gentle—with mental power and energy, and above all, with sterling piety, it seemed, as he was but a young man, as the Lord had lengthened service before him. "We do not understand this providence," said Dr. Pratt; "we are crying out for men—for help—and God takes the strongest and most hopeful man we already have!"

The results of an average of ten or twelve years' labour by the American mission in Eastern Turkey are thus stated by one of the labourers from another field, after he had taken part in the annual meeting at Erzurum, where their operations were brought under review: "Some three thousand Protestants enrolled, and nearly five hundred communities gathered into churches, with an annual contribution of 1,200 dollars to the cause of the Gospel—these are only the first fruits of the great preparatory work accomplished by progress among a thinking people, where scores of villages seem almost brought to a point of deciding for the truth." It is also noticed that there is a giving way of opinion on the part of the Armenian ecclesiastics and others, and a growing conviction that the truth is with the Evangelicals.

PERSIA.

The mountain districts of Persia are much disturbed. The Rev. Mr. Shedd, a servant, in travelling to the plain, fell among thieves, was badly stoned, and lost fixtures." The long-expected collision with the Turkish Government seems approaching, and in this state of things the Gospel is unwelcome :—

approaches to Tekhoma, and probably Tiary, are all guarded ; no foreigner can enter the without a hazard of life. The helpers resident are silenced, and in danger of either being riven out. One young man from Oroomia, temporarily located there, has just returned, aped by secreting himself for days in caves and out of the way places, and being exposed ings and sufferings. Mar Shimon (or his savage uncles and father, who control him) is o be playing a double game, but is known to be secretly, and sometimes openly, favouring to the Turks, and so also to our helpers, and the Evangelical work. In some cases he has agun the work of finding the helpers, and instigating violence against them.

INDIA.

young men have been baptized at the Free Church Mission in Calcutta. Writs of opus were contemplated in two cases by the heathen relatives—and in one case was taken out—but were not served. These converts all came from the Rural Mission about fifty miles north of Calcutta, which is exclusively worked by native agency. re baptized in that city, in order to prevent tumult and outrage. But thither their friends followed them, and gave "incessant trouble." For three days the ies and their converts were "almost in a state of siege." The young men displayed mess and sincerity.

ative missionary of Indapore (Rev. Narayan Sheshadri), when on a visit to Jaubna, eleven adults and five children. He is careful to state that this is not the result te movement," but adds that it may certainly be termed a "family movement," most averts being related to those who had already become Christians.

r baptisms are reported by the United Presbyterian missionaries in Rajpootana ; one re, and three in Beawr. The Ajmere convert (a Jati or Jain priest) is the first ptized at that station, and he attests his sincerity by having given up a considerable of property and all his means of worldly support. Of the other three, one is a ho has for months walked sixteen miles every Saturday to listen to Christian returning on the Monday. The Rev. Mr. Shoolbred depicts with graphic power s which accompanied their baptism. With looks of prying curiosity the audience the filling of the glass vessel which served as baptismal font from the lota (brass of a Brahmin—a precaution the missionaries still think it necessary to take against nations made, that they mix the water with blood and other impurities. One Lalla, who had for nearly three months daily attended Mr. Shoolbred's preaching, still grave suspicions that the Christian rite of baptism must have something in it he initiatory formulas of his own priesthood :—

s glance [writes Mr. Shoolbred] never ceased to rest on me, watching my every motion, as ed up close at my feet, with no sign of life in him except the long protruding neck and re. When it came to the sprinkling of the water he had risen to his feet, as if drawn up by aetic force, and pushing forward his head until within a few inches of mine, he had scanned se eagerness every movement of hand and lip, and carefully noted every word I uttered. ds of his—"A bāt ghani dāchi hai" (this is a most excellent thing)—gave vent to the elings of his heart, and to his thorough conviction now that our religion depended on none icks and mummeries with which he had become so familiar through association with the he Sauts, but, in its sublime simplicity, attested its origin to be divine.

a is an old man, but with "an eye whose fires age has not quenched." When, me of the crowd, he first listened to Mr. Shoolbred's preaching, he became deeply l. The inquiries which he made on that occasion and on the morrow, when he e missionary, and joined in the family worship, being answered to his satisfaction, ted his renunciation of his former belief, in the following emphatic manner :—

day he again appeared, and after worship followed me into my room. Bending low at my esented me with two halves of cocoanut kernel, the usual offering presented to a Guru from ecomes his disciple ; and although I disclaimed any title to such worship as they are in the aying to their religious teachers, he could scarcely be restrained. Three months have passed meeting, and poor old Lalla has not been once absent from our morning worship. Some-rings with him quite a number of his neighbours, with their wives and children. I cherish hat in this we have the beginning of a most important movement, which, by the blessing of issue in Christianising many of these poor Indian weavers.

only is the name of Havelock yet fragrant, but his personal influence is still orthern India. Six adults have been received into the Church by baptism at i, and of these two—a brother and a sister—originally Mussulmans, are the orphan of an old servant of that Christian soldier. "I have no doubt," writes the mis-the good influence under which they were thus brought was the original means of impressing them with a conviction of the excellence of Christianity, and that the seed thus sown has borne fruit after many days." Another missionary (like the former, in connection with the Church of England Society), during an itinerancy, visited a bazaar in Kumal. Here he met with a banker, who took him home, with some friends, and there, with them, listened attentively while he explained the doctrines of Christianity. A Brahmin, who was present, tried to establish his views; but as the company thought them less deserving attention than the teaching of Scripture, he left in disgust. The missionary adds:—

The banker then asked me how it was that Europeans, having such a holy religion, there were so few among us who followed the precepts of it; whether we had not two Bibles in use; how it was that such a number could live a life according to their own inclinations? He then mentioned some godly officers, whom he knew, among them General Havelock and a son of his, and thought it a pity we had not more like them.

Details of the losses sustained by the missions at Calcutta and the adjacent country from the terrific cyclone by which they have been visited, will be found in our "Foreign Intelligence."

In a letter from Umritsur, the Rev. T. S. Fitzpatrick, of the Church Missionary Society, writing of the prosperity of the Punjab, observes:—

A few days since, a very respectable and well-informed Sikh, whom I have known for twelve years, but who does not know a word of English, told me that his nation is now so impressed with the wisdom, power, and justice of the English, that it is a common saying amongst them, that God has imparted a sixteenth portion of himself to them. . . . For several reasons, I am more than ever drawn towards these people, and am led to hope that we are not far from the eve of a great movement amongst them in search of divine truth.

The Rev. C. Reuther, of the Church Missionary Society, after attending a mela, or fair, at Dalamow, on the Ganges, in the province of Oude, writes, that though the managing Brahmins knew that missionary influence goes directly against their trade, yet they were all very friendly, invited him to their houses, and heard the Gospel gladly. The place has acquired celebrity on account of its having been the abode of a great Hindoo saint, and hence, too, bathing there is considered most meritorious. The Brahmins, however, laughed, even before the pilgrims, at the idea of having their sins washed away by the Ganges. The people listened eagerly to the preaching of the missionaries. "They literally pressed upon us," says Mr. Reuther, "to hear the Word of God."

The conversion of two Brahmins is reported from the Masulipatam Church Mission by the Rev. R. Noble, who writes:—

It has pleased the Lord to bring out from our third class a fine young Brahmin (Siviramakrishnamma) nineteen years old, to make an open avowal of faith in Christ. He was summoned before the collector and magistrate, and, after openly avowing his belief in Christianity, as he was leaving, he was seized by his family and friends; but the magistrate, hurrying from his seat, ran in among them, and succeeded most kindly and energetically in extricating him. The following day another young Brahmin, in his twentieth year, who has read with us two years, and who had long been very favourably disposed, came forward to embrace Christianity. There is great excitement in the town, and many of our boys have been withdrawn.

We regret to hear of a revival of heathenism at Bombay. Increased wealth is assigned as the cause. "A number of our most ignorant and superstitious people," writes a native pastor, "have acquired large fortunes by the cotton trade. Now these people are completely in the hands of crafty priests, who move them to do almost anything they please. Hence new temples and idols are springing up in our midst; and old forsaken rites and ceremonies are being revived. A great many of our enlightened classes are also carried away by these things. They are in the minority, and they now find that it is of no avail to oppose the old orthodox party."

A society has been formed in Edinburgh for promoting the spiritual interests of Europeans in India, other than the servants of the Government. It is proposed to send out an agent to inquire and report how this may best be done.

CEYLON.

At several points in the Kandian country numbers of Singhalese have renounced Buddhism and embraced Christianity. Three villages are named in which the good work is most apparent, all situated within a few miles of the town of Kornegalle—a station under the charge of the Rev. J. I. Jones, of the Church Missionary Society. About thirty have been enrolled as Christians at Talampitiya, and thirteen at Kudagama; while at Korigammana (now occupied by an agent of the Baptist Society) there are also several believers and inquirers. Thirteen of these converts have been baptized; twelve were the first village already named; the thirteenth was a young priest who had only thrown off his robes a few days previously, giving up, with them, a very considerable income, derived from his office in a heathen temple. His knowledge of the truth was derived from John Edward Hunapolo, formerly a Buddhist priest, like himself, but who had been baptized some years before, and to whose zeal in spreading the Gospel the whole movement seems largely attributable. The missionaries appear to have scarcely visited these villages for five years; but, after that interval, some of the baptized converts traced their first inquiries respecting the Gospel to the preaching of Mr. Jones. Hupola is a man of learning, and in controversy more than a match for his former colleagues in the priesthood. A number of them made their appearance at a village where there were some Christian converts, and producing a Bible, challenged them to a discussion upon its contents. The priests were aware that Hupola and the older converts were absent, and showed a bold front accordingly; and the young and timid disciples were depressed. But Hupola being sent for, and unexpectedly making his appearance, the Buddhists evaded all controversy, and beat an ignominious retreat. The result was, that on the following Sunday the Christians had a larger congregation than ever, numbering several who, up to that time, had opposed the preaching of the Word. In this same village, one of the candidates for Christian fellowship was urged by his friends to join a devil ceremony. His reply was, "No; I will do anything to help you that I lawfully can; I will give you all the grain in my store, if you need it; but I will have nothing to do with devil ceremonies."

The Bishop of Colombo writes to the Propagation Society, "We are on the eve of a great movement, I trust towards Christianity. The crowds that listen to our preaching now are quite without precedent, and I am assured by the oldest missionaries that they have never seen anything like it before." The Bishop says that both the Church Missionary and the Propagation Societies have been instrumental in bringing about this result.

CHINA.

A missionary of the American Methodist Episcopal Board at Fuh-chau reports the baptism, twenty-five miles from that place, of eight converts, all adults.

The missionaries at Baypay (Amoy) report a steady increase in the number of worshippers. Persons from at least fifteen different villages around that place now regularly attend Divine service in the English Presbyterian chapel there.

SOUTHERN AFRICA.

It is said that the Episcopal mission to the Orange Free State is likely to prove a failure, owing to its Tractarian tendencies, among a Bible-loving people. Bishop Twells has identified himself with a clergyman of the Romanising class, who was rejected by the Propagation Society, on account of his ultra-sacramentarian views. The people remonstrated, but to no purpose. We learn that "the inhabitants of one of the three parishes have met together and refused any grant for the support of any mission not Evangelical in its principles and practice. Thus one source—the most liberal of all—has been cut off. More than this, the inhabitants have memorialised the Volksraad to withdraw the Government grant—request the Raad will only be too happy to accede to. So far, then, as the most important wish is concerned, the mission will be unaided."

WESTERN AFRICA.

A missionary of the American Board on the Gaboon reports that Mr. Du Chaillu, who had been residing at Camma, but was about leaving for an exploring tour in the interior, has given his premises at Camma to the mission; and the brethren hope to send an efficient helper to occupy the place. Five persons have been received into the Church by baptism. One of these," observes the missionary, "is a woman, we might say, an honourable woman"—the first Mpongwe woman ever received to the church in Gaboon:—

Her admission produces much talk. It is felt the more by her people, as she has signed the profession pledge, and manumitted her three slaves. She has been more than two years in coming to these decisions. She was formerly in great reputation as a fetish woman, or great doctor. Her husband came with her, or before her, and they knelt side by side for baptism. Two of those released were slaves. Many others are now asking admission to the church.

EASTERN AFRICA.

Bishop Tozer has quitted the interior of the country, and is now at Zanzibar. He writes, after his arrival there, in an encouraging strain:—

This morning we had the good news that the Sultan had allowed us to rent a large house close to the water side, on very easy terms. Nor is this all. The Consul has promised me 50*l.* a-year on his own account, unsolicited, and one of the other residents has offered me a similar sum. All this sounds almost too good to be true, but it is peace after war—sunshine after rain—and the morning joy after the heaviness of the dark night.

MADAGASCAR.

As the memorial churches in course of erection in Madagascar will necessitate a large outlay of money, it has, of course, been thought desirable by the missionaries to obtain proper title-deeds from the Government. But—says one of them—

Some months ago they [Government] refused to acknowledge the validity of the grants of sites made by Radama II., and though they had drawn up another document, which, if verified, would have amounted to a title-deed—or, at least, given us a right during the pleasure of the Crown to hold these places—as yet that document has not been forthcoming, and, as I hear the Government refused to let the Roman Catholics buy a piece of ground for a chapel, I am afraid we, too, shall not get proper title-deeds.

One Sunday the Queen had 300 bullocks distributed to upwards of 28,000 civilians, who had repaired her rice banks, and at the same time a “kabary” was held. On this occasion, certain of the speakers gave utterance to opinions most adverse to religious liberty:—

They were in favour of things as they were in the late Queen's time. What she liked, they like; and what she did not like, they don't like. They also added that if many more new things were introduced here, they would have to clear away the cactuses now overgrowing the rock at Ampamano, in order to be able to throw the criminals down again, as they used to do in olden times.

ABYSSINIA.

Theodoros, the ruler of Abyssinia, regards it as an insult for any one to question his lineal descent from King Solomon. The Rev. Mr. Stern, the missionary, having stated, in his confiscated papers, that Theodoros's mother had been a vendor of kosso, a medicinal fruit (Mr. Stern was quite right), the monarch became very angry, and wished to know the source from which he had derived his information:—

As he would not mention the name of his informant, the King ordered him and Mr. Rosenthal to be beaten and put to the Abyssinian rack; i.e., the wrist of the hand and upper part of the arm of both gentlemen were firmly tied with ropes, in consequence of which the blood was forced out of the tips of the fingers. After the prisoners had confessed the rack was removed, but we may imagine how dreadfully they suffered. Whether the efforts made by the English Government in behalf of the prisoners will not be too late, and whether they will lead at all to a satisfactory result, is still doubtful.

CANADA.

Within twenty-four hours after the occurrence of the fearful cyclone at Calcutta, there was an awful hurricane in Canada. How far the influence of the hurricane extended we are not informed; but although of the briefest duration, lasting only two minutes and a half, it swept away the Indian church, on the Rama station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society together with four of the Indian houses, laid prostrate a mile of fencing, and seriously injured some parts of the mission premises. Happily, no lives were lost in the mission station. Provision has been made for the restoration of the place of worship for the poor Indians without delay.

NEW ZEALAND.

While war has been devastating some other parts of the island, the last annual letter from the two Church missionaries in the Kaitia district show that during the year they have met with much encouragement. Thirty adults have been admitted by them into the visible Church of Christ.

In another district—Opotiki—we read of the natives having worked hard all the year to get the timber sawn for their new church, and to raise money to pay the carpenters for erecting it, the cost being more than 600*l*. During this period, the people gave every indication of loyalty, and sent deputations to the Governor to assure him that they had no intention of joining in the war. As the year drew to a close, however, they came to another determination. The change was brought about thus: A feast was being held, the Queen's flag had been hoisted, and there was great rejoicing, when a Roman priest appeared upon the scene, bringing a letter from the rebel party of Waikato. The missionary, at first, did not believe this; but he goes on to say:—

When I asked the priest whether he had brought the letter, he hesitated a little, and then answered in the affirmative; and in going out with me, he told me the contents of it, which were that all the Maoris in the Bay of Plenty and the East Coast were to come at once and drive the Europeans away, of whom the writer spoke in an offensive way. From that moment the people, step by step, became more deeply involved in the war.

So, too, we read that at Turanga—

The priests have stated, without reserve, that they do not belong to the English nation, and that ives will embrace the Romish faith, the Emperor of the French will take them under his nunts from the Sandwich Islands mention the sailing of the missionary ship, Morn-for Micronesia, on her ninth voyage. The association of Oahu had resolved to be first week in the present month as a week of prayer, and of special effort to pecuniary difficulties of the times.

POLYNESIA.

op Patteson, of the Melanesian Mission, has had a very narrow escape from death :—d in the course of his missionary travels landed at an island in the South Pacific, had ad-hundred natives, and was returning to his schooner, the Southern Cross, when, as the off, the natives, by one of those sudden and unreasoning impulses which sometimes move mpted to detain the boat by force. They were unsuccessful; but as it was pushing off they lower of arrows, by which two of the boat's crew were mortally wounded. It was with ulty that the boat regained the ship; but happily the Bishop was unhurt.

Literature.

cut.-General Thomas Jackson. By Pro-L. DABNEY, D.D., of Richmond, Vir-Edited by Rev. W. CHALMERS, A.M., Vol. I. Nisbet and Co.

he present American conflict, the only who seems to have won from both sides admiration is Stonewall Jackson. Here d by a personal friend what manner of as—how nature made the warrior, and moulded him into the good soldier of ist. It is a remarkable story, and in mmon place it is unspeakably refreshing ith such strength of character and force It is inevitable that Dr. Dabney should e "peculiar institution" which is the all these troubles; but no apology will the friends of freedom to slavery, any the cause in which he fought will blind d readers to the personal worth of the om among the many incidents, amusing iring, with which the volume abounds, the following tale for the times :—

ictions of the sin committed by the Go-of the United States, in the unnecessary m of mails, and the consequent imposition n the Sabbath-day, were very strong. . . ce he related with peculiar satisfaction. t proceeding on the Sabbath-day to Divine ith a Christian associate, his friend prop-ly at the post-office for his letters, on at there was probably a letter from a dear hose health was in a most critical state, for aught he knew, demand his immediate he dissuaded him by the argument, that ty for departing in this from the Sabbath t known, but only suspected. They went church, and enjoyed a peaceful day. On r it was ascertained that there was a letter d, from his afflicted relation, announcing ming state of disease; but there was also e, arrived that day, correcting all the r distress, and stating that the health of r was restored. "Now," said Jackson, riend causelessly dishonoured the Sabbath, ave suffered a day of harrowing anxiety, next day's news would have shown utterly ; but God rewarded him for his obedience, ily shielding him from this gratuitous He sent him the antidote along with the Memorials of the Rev. William Bull, of Newport Pagnell. By his Grandson, the Rev. JOSIAH BULL, M.A. Nisbet and Co.

It will be long before the sheep tire of the pas-tures green; it will be long before we ourselves tire of the song, as from these pastures green the lark springs upward towards heaven's gate. And it will be long before the Church of Christ has had too much of John Newton's kindly sense and rich experimental wisdom, or wearies of the exquisite melodies which we owe to the Bard of Olney. This book is full of both Newton and Cowper, and contains many interesting details regarding those two great philanthropists, Wilberforce and Thorn-ton. But apart from these celebrities, there is charm sufficient in the subject of the memorial, the genial, witty, eccentric, and truly devoted William Bull, the first of an illustrious line. With its amusing anecdotes, the book is very light read-ing; yet it contains many a weighty lesson. Our only wonder is, how the editor has been able, after the lapse of so many years, to bring together such a multitude of minute and curious facts; but we thank him heartily for thus enabling us to live that old time over again, and in such charming company.

Nichol's Series of Standard Divines: Puritan Period.—Nichol's Series of Commentaries: Puritan Period. Edinburgh: James Nichol. London: Nisbet and Co.

THE issue of Dr. Thomas Goodwin's works ("Stan-dard" series) has reached the ninth volume, which consists, for the most part, of an elaborate treatise upon election. Charnock's works are in course of publication, and two volumes are now in the hands of subscribers. These last comprise the well-known "Discourse of Divine Providence," and the discourses on the Existence and Attributes of God. A copious introduction by Dr. M'Cosh, containing a sketch of Charnock's life and an essay upon the Puritan preaching, the Puritan lecture, and the philosophical principles involved in the Puritan theology, greatly enhance the value of this above former editions.

Supplemental to the "Standard Divines," their spirited publisher has commenced the issue of a series of approved commentaries and expository discourses upon continuous portions of Scripture by the same class of old writers. He engages to furnish, at intervals of three or four months, three volumes, each carefully edited, got up in good style, and of a size which itself reminds us of the Puritan Divines (crown quarto), for 16s. 6d. It is probable that eight or ten times that amount would not purchase many of the works which the subscribers to this series will thus be able to obtain. The project is a real boon to students of limited means, and we gladly commend it to public notice. Two volumes are already issued—the first containing Airay's Lectures on the Philippians (1618) and Cartwright's Commentary on the Colossians (1612); and the second, King's Lectures on Jonah (1618) and Rainolds's Sermons on Obadiah and Haggai (1613.) Cheap as is the rate at which these works are issued, however, some who need them most may be the least able to subscribe for them. Opulent laymen, knowing such cases, would do well to act upon the advice given by the Rev. T. Binney, in his new work on "Money," and supplement an inadequate ministerial stipend by a present of valuable books, among which might well be included Nichol's Series of Commentaries. In not a few pulpits, much that is defective would be remedied by the preparatory use of these helps to the study of Sacred Scripture.

The Leisure Hour: 1864.—The Sunday at Home: 1864. The Religious Tract Society.

THE contents of these volumes are as varied and attractive as any of their predecessors. This is perhaps saying less than is demanded by strict justice; but periodicals which have secured the well-deserved popularity now attained by the Leisure Hour and the Sunday at Home may well dispense with what to those who have not seen the works themselves may appear a too partial style of criticism. The illustrations, both in colours and on wood, are as numerous as ever, and in some of the former we notice a completeness of execution which shows a great advance upon some of the plates in colours issued some time since. We observe with satisfaction that the most powerful organ of public opinion in the empire awards its praise to these works, as capable of affording greater interest than any of the sensation novel class. We may add, that even the columns of a newspaper would, by many persons, not favoured with extensive libraries and ample stores of information, be perused more intelligently and with greater mental advantage by the light of these pages than in its absence. Take, for example, the American war. In every telegram and letter figure the names of Generals Grant and Lee, or of Mr. Seward and Mr. (now Chief Justice)

Chase. In the Leisure Hour we meet with their portraits, as obtained from America, with details of their personal character and history. In the same way, the Schleswig-Holstein war, the Shakespeare and Calvin celebrations, and we know not how many other topics, current during the year just closed, are illustrated by pen or pencil—generally both—either in that periodical or in the Sunday at Home. It is scarcely necessary to say, that nothing of a questionable character, in doctrine or ethics, finds a place in pages whose careful editorial supervision is guaranteed by the Religious Tract Society.

The Word of Promise. A Handbook to the Promises of Scripture. By HORATIUS BONAR, D.D. The Religious Tract Society.

WE are acquainted with several collections of Scripture promises, in which some attempt has been made to classify them. The work before us, due to the facile hand and warm heart of Dr. Bonar, differs from all that we have before seen upon the promises. In the first place, it professes rather to be a selection than a collection; in the next place, its arrangement is simple; and in the third place, the author has so interwoven matter of his own, that the book is an agreeable one for regular perusal as well as for reference. The table of contents exhibits the order of subjects and the texts quoted, and there are two chapters preliminary upon the sureness of the word of promise, and the arrangement of its promises. The original matter introduced in the course of the work occurs in the form of introductory paragraphs before each section of the promises. It is an elegant little book, and an appropriate companion for every Christian.

Essays, Thoughts and Reflections, and Letters. By the Rev. HENRY WOODWARD, A.M. With a Memoir by his Son, THOMAS WOODWARD, A.M. Fifth Edition, enlarged. Macmillan and Co.

THE memoir of Mr. Woodward carries us far back. He was born in 1775, and died in 1863, having been rector of one parish for upwards of half a century. His father, Dr. Richard Woodward, was born in 1726, and was in succession Dean of Clogher and Bishop of Cloyne. The family is an honourable and an ancient one; but we are chiefly interested in the fact of its connexion with some of the brightest names in the history of the Church in Ireland. Mr. Woodward, the subject of this memoir, was ordained when little more than twenty-two, and, according to his own account, when he was a stranger, in his personal experience, to the power of vital religion. A great spiritual change subsequently passed over him, and he was not only a new man as it regards himself, but in relation to his work. In his work he laboured abundantly, and the Divine blessing so rested upon what he did, that great good was wrought by his means. The brief and unvarnished record of his life and labours will be acceptable to many besides those who were favoured with his acquaintance.

oir is followed by the literary remains, two general heads of "Essays" and "Thoughts and Reflections." The "Letters" mention the title are, we suppose, those contained in the memoir.

There are forty essays on a variety of subjects, moral, partly theological, and partly on what may be called miscellaneous matters. It is evident that some of these have been contained in periodical publications, and taken as a whole they are manifestly the gleanings of a few years. In their style they are generally simple, showing that they were the free utterances of the author's thoughts. The entire absence of everything like ornament or art in the composition, and the plain and earnest tone of the essays, will not like every reader, and to show that the aim was neither reputation nor popularity to do good.

in the Desert for Christ's Flock. By J. H. P. F. Shaw and Co. Spring. By the Author of the "Feast of the Passover, and the Feast of Remembrance," Shaw and Co.

These two nice little volumes together, they are similar in outward appearance and their general character. The first is a collection of chapters or meditations on sacred subjects. The chapters are the devout utterances of a pious man, who breathes throughout an atmosphere of earnest affection. A number of beautiful passages are appropriately introduced. Every page is filled with faith, hope, and charity. We highly recommend it as a book which will be useful for perusal in quiet moments, and as alike suitable either for personal possession or as a present to a Christian friend.

Every work might be spoken of in almost the same terms; the chapters are fewer, and the number of other poetical pieces are, in part,

The first chapter is entitled "The Refreshing Springs," and the remainder of the book is devoted to hope, joy, consolation, and strength. The subjects are treated of in an easy and cheerful manner, and as the language comes from the heart, it is addressed to the heart. In these days, when we are so much inclined to meet with books which remind us of the glow and fervour of other times.

in the Way. Original Hymns and Songs. By ANNA SHIPTON. Morgan and very beautiful book—to the eye, and to the ear. It is elegantly printed, and otherwise arranged, but the contents are worthy of the title. A series of hymns and hymn-like poems here to us is a string of pearls such as a true poet only could give us. We do not like to be content with our praises, and we are somewhat weary, or seem to be so; but in this case we find no inducement to severity, and we are glad to have the opportunity to commend a work which is alike honourable to the pen, the head, and the heart of the authoress.

The Child's Commentator on the Holy Scripture. By the Rev. INGRAM COBBIN, M.A. Jackson, Walford, and Hodder.

THE whole of that portion of the Bible which admits of being thus dealt with, from Genesis to Revelation, is here presented, in consecutive narratives, so that this book has less the character of a commentary than of a series of brief expositions. Much that, unexplained, must be obscure to the juvenile mind, is invested with intelligent interest, by a reference to Oriental customs, Jewish antiquities, and similar kinds of information; while direct practical lessons are not forgotten. Engravings, some of which are coloured, illustrate the text.

Going to the Dogs; or, The Adventures of Frank. Showing how he was Brought up to Follow neither Trade nor Profession, and what his very Genteel Bringing up brought him to. Virtue Brothers and Co.

THE title of this book sufficiently indicates that it is a tale, and that it has a moral. It is scarcely to be expected that in these pages we should give an account of the plot; and even if we were inclined to do this, we might be tempted to occupy more space than we can afford. Suffice it to say, then, that there is enough of the romantic and the striking to keep up the reader's interest. As for the way in which the story is told, it reveals considerable power on the part of the writer. Last of all, but not least, there is a religious element running through the volume, which exempts it from the blame so often deserved by works of fiction. The author not only knows the ways of the world, but is no stranger to the best of all ways; so that while this is not what we should call a religious novel, it is one that may be placed in the hands of all young people; and they may profit by it.

The Chamba Mission: How it came to be Begun, and how it has been Carried on to the Close of 1863. Nisbet and Co.

THE leading facts relating to the origin of the Chamba or Chumba Mission were given in the November number of Christendom (p. 555). This little book is from the pen of the founder of the mission, and gives the whole history in detail.

The Collager in Town and Country: 1864. The Religious Tract Society.

A PENNY monthly magazine, well adapted for distribution in the homes of the poor, whose educational advantages have been but scanty, and to whom, therefore, instruction must be imparted in the simplest form. Every number is as it should be, illustrated.

Original Fables and Sketches. By Mrs. PROSSER. The Religious Tract Society.

A SERIES of reprints from the Leisure Hour, containing much wholesome advice, in the garb of innocent fiction.

Monthly Retrospect.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE is occupied at the present moment with theological questions, as well as in her Protestant communions only, but even in the boasted unity of the Church, there are indications of a schism. Not, of course, that theological, as political, disputes can be carried on in France with the same amount of freedom as in England; but each country, according to its national temper, has its own way of showing its interest in these questions. Ultramontane doctrines, as we have often had occasion to deplore in these columns, are to be in the ascendant; but it seems that the Emperor and his Ministers have not yet patronised a return to the principles of independence that prevailed in the Church; and the Archbishop of Paris has placed himself at the head of the reaction. Among the Protestants, the war between the Orthodox and the Rationalists widens as the day for the elections to the consistories approaches. We refer our correspondents for a graphic account of the excitement that prevails among all the members of the Protestant denomination, both those who are Unitarians and those who are only Protestants in name. We may add that the reaction has found its way into the secular newspapers, though not much to the advantage of orthodoxy. All the French papers that notice the question, so far as we have seen, are on the side of M. Coquerel and the Rationalists, whom they absurdly identify with toleration and charity. This is easily explained. The French press is divided into sections of Popery and infidelity; and both of them, though from different motives, are opposed to the spread of Evangelical views. Add to this, that the venerable Guizot, has identified himself with the cause of orthodoxy, and the old political system of government of which M. Guizot was the ablest upholder, to have an opportunity of wounding him through the sides of the Evangelicals notwithstanding these obstacles, we are glad to learn that the Evangelical party anticipate success.

In Germany the jars that arise in the relations between Church and State are on the increase. In some of the minor States, indeed, the Church has been placed in the thralldom of the State, but only to be placed under the control of what our correspondents describe as universal suffrage, which is justly regarded as the more formidable of the two. This is well illustrated by our correspondent in the case of Baden, where the test of the whole Christian body avails nothing to remove a heterodox teacher, from his theological professorship, which is in the gift of the State, but from his office of pastor, which is in the gift of the young men in the practical work of parishes, which was the creation of the State. This is not proceeding upon any legal ground, such as the proper construction of a law of the own Court of Appeal, but upon the vague and undefined plea that it is necessary to fetter the free aspirations of theological speculation. It will be seen, however, that the tyrannical overriding of the conscience of the Church is not altogether new. Divine Providence, as usual, brings good out of evil. The Church, tied up by the use of her ancient forms and modes of action, is driven to adopt others more adapted to the present circumstances; and the cordiality and unity exhibited in these binds of the same Church, and even the Churches of different States, in a bond of union and love that would probably never have been allowed if each had been left to its ancient and regular modes of organization.

The crisis through which Italian liberty is now passing becomes daily more sharp. The change of capital is now finally determined upon; the transfer is made with all convenient speed; and Italy, having thus performed her part of the drama, waits, with great impatience, the advent of the day when it will behave herself. Hitherto there has arisen no reason to suspect the Emperor of France. Nay, he has lately given a singular proof of his determination to carry out his policy irrespective of the will of the Pope. Our readers are well aware that the brave men of the south, whose atrocities, as they are reported on good authority, shock the ear, whenever they are pressed by the Italian soldiers, take refuge in Rome. But it new convention has been entered into with the Italian Government, by which the French authorities in the city undertake to secure and deliver up every brigand who may be foundeltering himself in Rome, and who is demanded by the Italian authorities. In this there is no reference to the authority of the Pope whatever. This is a deeper stab at the temporal authority than the previous one, for here is no recognition whatever of the Pope's sovereignty in his own city. But neither this nor the former convention has yet been able to draw forth a single remonstrance from the Papal Government. The Pope is stripped of one estate after another of his ancient sway, but he makes no sign. It must not be supposed, however, that because Popery is thus under the ban, that Protestantism is in corresponding favour. The best that can be said of the authorities is that they are indifferent; some even of the agents of the present liberal Government are, on questions of the Church, decidedly reactionary. For an amazing instance of the petty spite and the gross ignorance of some of these people we refer to the letter of our Italian correspondent.

We have more than once recorded our opinion, in these pages, that the late Polish insurrection was more religious than secular—Roman Catholic rather than national. A report, lately issued by the Russian Government, takes this view of the question, and states that the insurrection was planned, the leaders sheltered, and even the agents of assassination hired, in the Polish monasteries. Of course, allowance must be made for the fact that the report is published to justify to the world the measures of severity that the Czar has taken against the monks and nuns. The great majority of these establishments have been suppressed—partly on the ground that they did not contain the minimum number of monks required by law, and partly because clear proofs of abetting the rebellion were found in some of them. But the suppression does not appear to have been conducted vindictively, for provision was in every case made for the subsistence of the expelled monks. In the other parts of his dominions, the Emperor Alexander shows a strong desire to ameliorate the condition of his subjects, and to elevate them in the social and political scale.

The position of the Turkish missionaries and their converts is not much altered since our last. We regret to observe that the Constantinople correspondent of the Times has thrown himself zealously into the cause of the Turks and of the English Embassy. We should have regretted still more, however, if he had been able to assign any solid grounds for taking such a course. But, on the contrary, his statements only run over again the old and already refuted accusations of missionary indiscretion, and of the danger to which English influence in Constantinople was exposed, if exerted on behalf of the missionary cause. We, in our turn, might be tempted to ask, what is the good of influence, or what is it supposed to consist in, if it cannot keep our own countrymen and co-religionists out of prison? We are willing to wait, however, for the results of that interference which Lord Russell promised to make on behalf of the missionaries; and if a better state of things can be settled for the future, we are willing to let bygones be bygones.

The American President has addressed his annual message to Congress, in which he declares his determination to continue the war till slavery is abolished, and the Union restored. The financial affairs of the country are not satisfactory. The national debt has already reached upwards of 500 millions sterling; and new and extraordinary projects are suggested with a view to raise additional supplies. The military situation is curious. General Sherman has undertaken a march right through the hostile State of Georgia, with what object is not known. He is evidently making for the seacoast; but whether to capture and hold one of the cities there, or whether to be taken on board the Federal fleet, cannot yet be ascertained. Hitherto, he seems to have met with no enemy to bar his progress, nor is it known whether the Confederates could collect in time a force sufficient to dispute his march. The Confederates, on their part, have also had great success. The march of Sherman has left open the State of Tennessee, into which the Confederates have poured, and now shut up the only available Federal force in Nashville, the capital of the State. If that fall, the Federals admit that they will no longer be able to hold either Tennessee or Kentucky; and great excitement in consequence prevails at Washington. There are indications of fresh hostilities being about to commence between Lee and Grant. On neither side is there the smallest indication of the cessation of the war.

HOME.

There is a general feeling of uneasiness abroad as to the state and prospects of the National Church. The lines of demarcation between different parties become more sharp and marked than ever ; and a mutual feeling of bitterness and distrust begins to take the place of that co-operation and sympathy which at the first alarm respecting the decision of the Judicial Committee on "Essays and Reviews" prevailed for a moment between the Tractarians and the Evangelical body. None can be surprised at this result who knows the insidious manner in which the former body turned the alarm to their own party purposes. The Church was in danger according to them ; and that danger was only to be averted by the adoption of a policy which we do not hesitate to say would have amounted to an ecclesiastical revolution. The Royal supremacy—that sheet anchor of the liberties of the Christian laity—was to be swept away, and the whole control over the doctrines and discipline of the Church was to be handed over to the "spirituality," under which imposing title was thinly veiled a reference to the bishops and their creatures. Of course the specious pretexts were easily seen through. An important communication to the Record, under the signature of "A.," was among the first to raise the note of alarm, and the attention which that writer drew to the insidious schemes that were on foot so embittered the Tractarian party, that another writer, incorrectly supposed at first to be the Bishop of Oxford, took the field against him in the Churchman, and denounced him with a virulence and an acerbity which Billingsgate could hardly surpass. These letters, whatever else they prove, and whoever may be responsible for them, plainly demonstrate that the union between the High and the Low Church is already at an end. We cannot pretend to be sorry for this conclusion. No good could have come of such an alliance. We trust we need not at this time of day make any protestation of our repugnance to the views of Bishop Colenso and the Essayists ; but after all, we are not sure that they are the worst of the enemies with whom the Church has to contend within her own borders. It is very sad to say with the Rationalists, that the Scripture contains, but is not itself, the Word of God ; but is it less heterodox to say with the Tractarians, that the Scripture neither is nor contains the "whole" Word of God, but must be eked out and supplemented by the doubtful echoes of tradition ?

The same controversy, though in another aspect, has been raging between the High Church and the Rationalists. Mr. Keble, the author of the "Christian Year," addressed the editor of the Times on the constitution of the Court of Appeal, and contended that questions of doctrine ought to be left for the decision of the Church, which had a "common law" for settling such questions as inspiration and the perpetuity of punishment, as well as the State had for the regulation of its affairs. This brought out a writer who is generally understood to be Dean Stanley, and who challenged this whole doctrine of the Church's common law. A learned controversy then arose, in which Professor Pusey took part, on the point whether the Fifth General Council had condemned Origen's doctrine of the limited duration of punishment, and, if so, whether the decrees of that Fifth Council were binding on the Church of England. It elicited from Mr. Keble a statement that though all Scripture was inspired, yet all was not inspired with an equal amount of important truth, which his antagonist rather unfairly twisted into an admission that Scripture was not all equally inspired. Mr. Fitzjames Stephen, well known for his legal defence of the Essayists, took part in the dispute, by insisting that what the High Churchmen wanted was not a change in the court, but a change in the law, and warning the people of England that no greater danger to their liberties could arise than that theological opinion should be at the mercy of the ever-varying views of the Bench of Bishops. So the controversy stands at the present moment—a singular proof of the interest which these questions are exciting in the public mind.

The growing importance of Church questions is still further seen in the way that secular politicians already begin to appreciate them, and are striving to turn them to political account. Whatever estimate may be formed of Mr. Disraeli as a statesman, no one would deny him the faculty of being wise in his generation, and gifted with the power to discern as quickly as most men the questions that, to use his own phrase, "loom in the distance ;" and Mr. Disraeli is now steadily and zealously engaged in building up his party upon the advocacy of ecclesiastical privilege, in the hope of thereby securing Church support. At a meeting held in the course of the month, for the support of certain religious objects in the diocese of Oxford, Mr. Disraeli delivered a remarkable speech, in which he pledged his party to the support of Church-rates, and to the Church side of all the questions that have lately been in dispute between the Church and Dissent. But he went further. While he professed to recognise the existence of the Evangelical and the Tractarian parties, as both constituent portions of the Church of England, he poured forth the vials of his contemptuous sarcasm upon its rationalising members, as mere heretics at second hand, and gave in his adhesion to such a modification of the Court of Final Appeal as would enable the Church to have jurisdiction over her own doctrines. On this point, indeed, he was more than usually mysterious; but one point he thought it safe to make clear, that the spirituality should decide upon doctrinal questions. It was supposed that Mr. Gladstone had also given in his adhesion to the same principle; but, from a correspondence that has recently been made public, it would appear that the right honourable gentleman refuses to commit himself to any opinion. A memorial was, some time ago, sent up from certain clergymen in the diocese of Exeter to the Government, setting forth the disadvantages of the present Court of Appeal. It was sent to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for presentation, with a request that he would give it his support. Mr. Gladstone, in his reply, stated that he agreed with the memorialists in thinking the present constitution of the court unsatisfactory; but added that it appeared to him, that it belonged to the Bishops, in conjunction with the Queen's Ministers, to consider in what way the constitution of that court might most properly be amended.

The Prison Ministers' Bill of 1863 took the Protestants of this country by surprise. It is well known that the Roman Catholics, elated by their past success, meditate a fresh aggression, by having Romish chaplains, paid out of the poor-rates, attached to the different workhouses of the county, for the spiritual instruction of the paupers of that denomination. We are glad to see, however, that the Protestants are resolved not to be caught napping a second time. A meeting of the vestry of St. Pancras was held on this subject a few days ago, at which it was unanimously resolved that the project, which it appears is recommended in the report of a select committee of the House of Commons, should be resisted, and resolutions were passed declaring that there is no restriction on Romish paupers now in workhouses to see their clergy at all proper and seasonable hours. It was also unanimously resolved that communications should be made to the guardians and vestries of the different Poor-law unions throughout the country, so that a joint and energetic resistance may be made to this new advance of Popery towards recognition and endowment in England.

A good deal of excitement has been raised in the South and East of Scotland by one of the railway companies—the North British, we believe—adding to their practice of passenger trains that of running goods trains during the Lord's-day. All the religious bodies there have protested against this open and wanton violation of the Fourth Commandment; and the practice has been condemned also at several public meetings, convened and presided over by laymen. The case is too gross to be defended even by that portion of the press which habitually defends all infractions of the Sabbath rest; and while they resort to their old arguments in favour of Sunday passenger trains, which, on this occasion, was only incidentally brought into the dispute, they are compelled to admit that for this running of goods trains no sufficient excuse or defence can be offered.

The Roman Catholic hierarchy in Ireland some time ago announced their intention to raise and to head a new agitation in that long-disturbed country. They issued circulars soliciting aid and co-operation in a movement for striving—of course by legal and constitutional means—to bring about the downfall of the Protestant Establishment of Ireland, and the adoption of such a system of tenant right as would be just—that is, agreeable—to the Irish peasantry. Men wondered why a hierarchy which had so little to complain of—which were allowed so much of their own way—would plunge into the perils and discomforts of a popular agitation—and why they should do so especially at the present time; but the reason is becoming plain. It seems they can hardly help themselves. They must put themselves at the head of some secular movement, if they would not see their spiritual power slip out of their hands. That there is great danger of this happening may be judged from the circumstance that at Skibbereen, on the west coast of Ireland, where the population is almost exclusively Roman Catholic, the Romish priest has been burnt in effigy, and insults have been cast on the Romish bishop of the diocese because of his opposition to what is called the Fenian agitation—a secret movement of a seditious, if not reasonable nature. It seems that the leaders of this secret society pay as little regard to priests as to sovereigns, and it is with a view to divert these people from associations so dangerous to their order that they propose to commence an agitation of their own.

Evangelical Alliance.

NOTE.—The Evangelical Alliance is responsible only for what is inserted under this head.

WEEK OF PRAYER, JANUARY 2—7, 1865.

Christians residing in and around London are earnestly invited to be present at the following meetings, to be held, during the Week of Prayer, in Freemasons' Hall, Great Queen-street, Lincoln's inn-fields, in accordance with the invitation which has been issued to Christians throughout the world:—

ARRANGEMENTS.

Mornings, at Eleven o'clock.

- Monday, Jan.* 2.—Subject: Thanksgiving for Blessings upon Individuals, Nations, and Churches; together with Confession of Sins. Chairman: The Right Hon. Lord Calthorpe. Address by the Hon. and Rev. B. W. Noel, M.A.
- Tuesday, „* 3.—Subject: Pastors, Teachers, Evangelists, and Missionaries; and especially Missions among the Jews and Heathen. Chairman: Joseph Tritton, Esq. Address by Rev. Capel Molyneux, M.A.
- Wednesday, „* 4.—Subject: The Children of Christian Parents, Congregations, and Schools. Chairman: Captain Trotter. Address by Rev. W. L. Thornton, M.A.
- Thursday, „* 5.—Subject: Sunday-schools, and all actively engaged in Christian Work. Chairman: John Corderoy, Esq. Address by Rev. James Hamilton, D.D.
- Friday, „* 6.—Subject: Spiritual and Temporal Blessings on our Nations; "for Kings and all in authority;" the Sanctification of the Sabbath; the Cessation of War; the Abolition of Slavery; and Removal of all Oppression. Chairman: Sir R. Morton Peto, Bart., M.P. Address by Rev. Archibald Macmillan.
- Saturday, „* 7.—Subject: The Christian Church; for increased Holiness, Activity, and Harmony among its several Sections. Chairman: Robert Baxter, Esq. Address by Rev. William Pennefather, M.A.

The following Evening Meetings will be held in the same place, commencing at Seven o'clock, when Addresses will be given on the progress of the work of God in different countries:—

- Tuesday, Jan.* 3.—Subject: The Recent Revival in the Principality of Wales, and its Results. Chairman: The Hon. William Ashley. Address by Rev. Owen Thomas, Minister of the Welsh Chapel, Jewin-crescent.
- Wednesday, „* 4.—Subject: Times of Refreshing in Scotland. Chairman: Thomas Chambers, Esq. Address by Rev. Donald Fraser, of Inverness.
- Thursday, „* 5.—Subject: Fruits of the Revival in Ireland. Chairman: The Lord Radstock. Address by Rev. Robert Knox, D.D., of Belfast.
- Friday, „* 6.—Subject: Syria and the East. Chairman: James Spicer, Esq. Address by Rev. Daniel Bliss, D.D., of Beyrout.

"Prove me now herewith, saith the Lord of hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it."—Malachi iii. 10.

THE REV. DR. BLISS.

The Rev. Daniel Bliss, D.D., of Beyrout, and one of the missionaries of the American Board, is now in London, on his way from America, to take the charge of the new Arabic College to be established at Beyrout. At the last meeting of Committee of Council, the Rev. Dr. Bliss was introduced and kindly welcomed by the members. Several drawing-room meetings have been held, at which interesting particulars have been given relative to the Gospel in Syria.

DENMARK.

The following letter has been received, signed by several Danish pastors and schoolmasters, on the subject of the memorial from the German

Branch of the Evangelical Alliance, addressed to the British Branch, assembled in Conference at Edinburgh:—

Address to the British Organization of the Evangelical Alliance.

"Dear and honoured Brethren in Christ,—In the name of the German Branch of the Evangelical Alliance, eight German theologians and clergymen have forwarded to you a letter, which is found printed in No. XXVIII. of the Evangelical Alliance Intelligencer for this year,* in which those theologians, with a view of awakening the sympathies of the English people for Germany, and accordingly removing those entertained in behalf of Denmark, pretend, 'not as German politicians, but as German Christians,' to justify rar of Germany against Denmark 'for the y of the Duchies (Schleswig and Holstein) righteous and holy one.'

* See Evangelical Christendom, August, 1864, page 408.

'We shall not, dear brethren in the Lord, in this enter into any examination of the causes obvious now than ever, we venture to say) of breadful war waged by Germany against our native country, which, as it was to be fore-has succumbed in the unequal contest; we in this respect with you, dear brethren, he Evangelical Alliance cannot undertake amination of such political matters. But the said theologians, in their eagerness to that this war has been not only righteous, oly, have brought forward for this purpose, five different heads, various very grave tions against us, we cannot keep silence to ; but we pray you, for the sake of truth and urch, our country and ourselves, to listen o us, while in defending ourselves we shall our to keep strictly to the admonition of postle, and write in the spirit of Christian iesa.

efore we proceed, we wish to premise the ration, that the way in which the words eswig-Holstein' are used in the letter is tly misleading; for the Duchy of Holstein, ish not a single Danish clergyman or school-r has had any employment, has nothing ver to do with the matter in question.

ow, as to the second, third, and fifth heads ; accusations, against our unbelieving hearts he general destructive influence of our con-and doings in the Church and in the school, sh to express our deep and heartfelt regret ing how brethren in the Lord, who 'in the reek of this year have lifted up their hands, ing the Prince of Peace to grant peace on and goodwill toward men,' in such an extra-urly easy way hurl out their accusations and unce their severe condemnation of their ren and fellow-labourers in the service of the as also of the teachers of the youth. 'Who hou that judgest another man's servant!' ve a right to ask with the Apostle Paul; the so, as those German divines cannot have had porpunity of knowing us personally, nor of acquainted with our doings by their own al experience. They should not have for- a, that in times as these the accounts ick their judgment has been founded were unlikely to have been influenced by blind a. And now, when it is particularly stated us, that 'in the period of the Danish ny the people have been sadly estranged the ordinances of the Church and from reli- in general,' and 'that many of us have been ieving Rationalists, who by general unfitness, n some instances by immoral conduct, have all esteem and influence,' every Christian r must think with horror that we have been s and robbers, instead of shepherds (St. x. 1), and that the Danish Church, by e we have been taught and sent out, must fallen off from the truth of the Gospel. But not so, dear brethren. In spite of all our and sins, we thank God that we may ven-o state that in the recent times the Lord has raisted in mercy our Church, so that His and His sacraments are honoured and loved uch people; and we, the children and its of this Church, have partaken of His ig, so that in the Schleswig congregations, in the Church, as in the school, we have been endeavouring to teach the pure truth of the Gospel, knowing nothing for our salvation but Jesus Christ and Him crucified, wherefore we also have the hope that when the political tempests have been appeased, it will be known and testi-fied that our labour has not been in vain. And when our accusers have represented all our 'German predecessors'—those who have suc-ceeded us are left unmentioned—as 'pious and zealous' men, and, in strict contradistinction to them, have depicted us Danish-educated clergy-men almost as children of perdition, we leave it to your consideration, dear brethren, whether you do not think that those German theologians, in composing their letter, may have forgotten the words of our Lord about the mote and the beam. We, at least, are of opinion that if those words had been duly minded by them, they would scarcely thus have condemned us, whom, we think at least, they will not deny to be their fellow-labourers in the Church of Christ, nor praise so highly those whom they call their own in every sense of the word. We teachers, in particular, cannot but regret that men who wish to be valued for their discretion should have written down an accusation as the one, 'that not a vestige of Christian spirit has been perceptible in the Danish teachers;' and we must protest against the asser-tion, that we should have degraded the school by instilling into the children political objects, unless, indeed, they think that we have been guilty of this crime, because we have taught the children to honour the King as well as to fear God.

L. XIX.—VI. NEW SERIES.—JANUARY.

"There is yet another fact we wish to mention—namely, that accusations, essentially the same as those of the letter, have been raised against us, and have met with their refutation, at the meeting of the Evangelical Alliance assembled at Berlin in September, 1857; and we are indeed surprised to see the name of the revered Dr. Tholuck among the other names by which this letter to you has been signed; for it is not more than one or two years since he recommended to professors and students the perusal of a book, composed by G. Schumacher, formerly a clergyman in the Duchy of Schleswig, which contained the gravest accusations against the conduct of the Danish Government in Schleswig, as well as against many persons mentioned by name. Now, this book has found an elaborate and complete refutation, founded on facts, and it was proved to be nothing but a lampoon in the true sense of the word; but just for this very reason we had expected that the revered Dr. Tholuck should have been taught to see how cautious one ought to be in believing everything, especially in times and circumstances in which the passions have such sway, and how carefully one ought to try the spirits, both those that are judged and those that judge others.

"And how necessary this is will be evinced, we hope, clearly and distinctly by what we have to say with regard to the first and fourth head of the accusations, which we shall examine more mi-nutely, as we are enabled to prove by positive reasons how little trustworthy all these statements are. For when we are told here: 'It is an un-deniable fact that more than 150,000 Protestants have been deprived of their original German pas-tors,' then this statement is not true. No less than some thirty pastors fled at the approach of the Royal Army in the year 1850; they left their congregations, and stayed away for months, without giving their lawful Government any explanation of their conduct. About all these pastors it cannot be said with any semblance of right that they have been taken away from their congregations. Nor can this be said about those who had been installed by the Revolutionary Government, 1848-49, in offices from which they had expelled those that had been called before by his Majesty the King; for even our antagonists must acknowledge that it was perfectly just that these have been reinstated and the others removed. And as for the rest, it must be expressly stated that it was by no means all the clergymen appointed by the Revolutionary Government that were deprived of their offices; some of them continued in them, while others were removed to other places. Now it shall not be denied, that perhaps some 40 clergymen were divested of office in 1849 by the commission installed for the administration of the Duchy; but it must be expressly stated, that the reason was their downright refractory behaviour towards the said commission, of which, however, only one member was a Dane, while the two others were the Prussian Count Eulenburg and the English Colonel Hodges. By the Danish Government, properly so called, only very few clergymen have been deprived of office, and the reason of their deposition was in most cases, that these clergymen had refused to read the prayers used in the Church from times of yore for his Majesty the King and the Royal Family. Consequently the assertion of 150,000 Christians having been deprived of their original German pastors will be found quite misleading. A stronger expression must be employed, when we come to speak of the next assertion, that more than 80,000 inhabitants have been deprived of their German native language in church and school, instead of which 'a language totally unintelligible'—we suppose, the Danish—'has been introduced.' For when by these words the authors of the letter are alluding to the districts, which may now be called mixed as to the language, though formerly only the Danish language was spoken there, we shall not here enter into a more detailed examination of the mutual relations of the two languages, but only state that, as anybody very easily may ascertain by visiting the place itself, many parishes in those districts to this very day still are so Danish, that either all or the greater majority of the inhabitants, both young and old, only speak Danish; so that, even before 1848, several 'German' pastors, holding office in these parishes, have spoken in favour of the introduction of the Danish language into church and school. But now, when it is further pretended 'that in the performance of Divine service that language, totally unintelligible for the inhabitants, has been exclusively used,' then the authors have uttered a palpable untruth, it being not only law, but a law strictly obeyed, that Divine service every Sunday and festival should be performed alternately in the Danish and the German language. And when it is further stated, that all the holy acts—baptisms, marriages, and burials—have been performed in the same unintelligible language, this is another downright untruth, it being, according to the law, left to the choice of every inhabitant whether he wished to have any of the ministerial acts mentioned performed in the one or in the other language, and we dare protest that no instance can be produced of this right having been withheld for any one. But now to conclude—for we can but smile at the authors of the letter being unwilling to grant that who have held office in the mixed poor credit of having understood the language—when under the fourth head that the 'Gustavus-Adolphus Union Bible Society have been dissolved or that this is a mere fiction, whereas it is that the Bible Society formerly existing in the Duchies has been dissolved; but that it mingled disloyal politics in its reports, and besides, a particular Bible Society immediately formed for the Duchy whose efforts have been crowned with more success than those of the former, as proved.

E

"This, dear brethren in Christ, is what we have to say to you, before whom we have been accused. We have spoken the truth as best we could, as Christians, and this is the truth, the 'undeniable facts' which have been set before us, some are greatly exaggerated, the rest are untruths. We need not tell you how it has given us to see how those theologians, whose names also in our country command great respect, have come from the way of truth. We certainly think that they have done so out of but only for want of discretion, and have not postponed their judgment to their own experience, they had satisfied themselves about the truth of those reports on which they founded it. Nor need we to tell you, we have been rejoiced and comforted by your impartial and truly Christian Verily, it was more than we could expect, such powerful voices were raised against us we have not been heard.

"There is still one thing which we omit to mention. We are men who in the last six months have, with all our power, been much humbled under the powerful light of the truth that we trust that your Christian love for us a willing ear, when we come to speak of our cares, not in behalf of ourselves, but of numerous congregations, who use the Danish language in church and school, shall limit our observation to these (I do not mean to admit that what has happened in Schleswig has been just!), because the most manifest injustice has been committed. We also appeal through you to those theologians who, as they are true Christians, least of all can appreciate the nation, without even any religious scruple, with the greatest wilfulness, disturbs the life of the Church in the Danish Duchies of Schleswig. In proof of this assertion we produce neither doubtful nor exaggerated facts, but facts obvious and easily sustained by anybody.

"That revolution which accompanied the invasion of the Austrian soldiers into the Duchy left almost all the congregations north of the border who, with unfeigned faithfulness, remained to the King. Their pastors were men of love and confidence with the King, there was no reason whatever to expel them from their offices, the less so as they in the month of February given them which had been demanded of them, would submit to the Prussian-Austrian government, as long as the country was in the lies. But in order to get rid of these n—no matter whether they were natives lucky or of the kingdom, whether they called to their offices before or after ly because they continued loyal to their new plan, unheard of in history, was nd acted upon, without any consideration eparable injury thus done to the Church. is left to the choice of these clergymen o break their oath of loyalty to King IX. of Denmark, and thus remain in ces, or to keep their oath and be deposed. tion was asked of these clergymen, and rother clergymen, who had been appointed intendents of the Church, whether they d it must be well observed, that this has ne before the King has signed the peace many—in any respect considered them- und by their oath of loyalty which they n to him. Nobody was found wavering, praised! All who were asked declared til the King himself, by concluding the ad released them from their oath, they t disengage themselves from it. The nce was, that these clergymen, very few , were deposed from their offices expressly nt of this declaration, and other clergy- e sent in their stead, to many of whom sh language of the population is a foreign cult one, in which they only very im- can express themselves. Yet this is greatest offence given; but instead of stors and teachers, who are now re- from their congregations, because they : perjure themselves, others are sent who almost exclusively are still—until fusion of the peace—the subjects of the Denmark, many of whom have in former rorn the oath of loyalty to the late King, VII. (and accordingly bound themselves t the law of succession sanctioned by him), ne of them even to King Christian IX.

Now when these men, before they have ally released by the King from their offer themselves to be used for purposes ey cannot but know are contrary to his , we leave it to them to defend before i their conscience their interpretation of ial oath—namely, that it should only bind obedience towards the lord of the country as he is in possession of power, but not to towards him when fortune declares him—we can only think with horror of i interpretation, and we mean that the the very bond that should hold when weak. But now, dear brethren, you may ourselves what must be the condition of l congregations, who think in the same as we of the meaning of the oath of a bject. How can they, who in the ty of their mind consider the very doubt bliness of an oath as a horrible sin, receive en as spiritual guides, who in a manner ehensible to them are deviating from their ry notions of loyalty? When these appear in the congregations, lifting up ad to bless them, must not this very hand their hearers of the oath which has been y the same hand and not have been i in a lawful manner! The greater the s in these congregations, the more rooted ag of indignation and offence with which lled at this proceeding of the German powers against the life of their Church and their schools. Nor have they remained silent at all this. Many congregations have almost unanimously petitioned for permission to retain those men who had hitherto been trusted with the office, expressly stating how much injury would be done to their church by such a proceeding. But the congregations have met with a most decided refusal; therefore the churches are now left empty in many places; an impassable gulf is opened between clergyman and congregation, and their lamentations sound over to us, who, expelled and banished as we are, cannot bring any help. Verily, if those eight German theologians have effected nothing else by writing their letter to you, dear and honoured brethren, they have given us a welcome opportunity to bring before you the sighs and complaints of those many congregations.

"We recommend them to your sympathy and that of all Christians; indeed, they are deserving of it.

"In the name of the Danish pastors and teachers from Schleswig, assembled in Copenhagen, the 23rd October, 1864 :—

"F. R. C. VON BULOW; ALETH HANSEN; J. M. L. HJORT; J. KROG; N. L. FEILBERG; H. F. FEILBERG; W. MUNN; C. D. MOLLER; C. J. NIELSEN; H. ROTH; S. B. THIEGE, Professor; J. P. TRAUSTEDT, Pastors and Teachers from Schleswig."

The following reply to the above letter has been adopted and forwarded to Copenhagen :—

"Evangelical Alliance, 7, Adam-street, Strand, London, Dec. 6, 1864.

"Beloved Brethren in the Lord,—We have received, and have read with profound interest, your address to us of the 23rd of October last, in which you express your grief at what you deem the unjust accusations made against you by the German brethren; whose letter was published in a former number of our Alliance Intelligencer; and give your reply to them.

"It affords us unspeakable satisfaction, and is the occasion of real thankfulness to God, that you do not fail to appreciate the difficulties of the position in which the letter of our German brethren placed us, and that you should express yourselves as you do respecting our reply, when you say, 'We need not tell you how much we have been rejoiced and comforted at reading your impartial and truly Christian answer.' And we think it will still further be to you a source of pleasure to be informed that our German brethren, as far as we know, have taken no exception to it, nor have they urged us to express ourselves in a manner which might harmonise better with their opinions.

"For various reasons, which it is unnecessary for us to enlarge upon, or indeed to specify, we cannot regard it as our province to enter into the conflicting statements brought before us by our German and Danish brethren (equally beloved for the Lord's sake) in such a way as would alone qualify us to pronounce upon them; nor, indeed, if it were, could we form a deliberate and satisfactory judgment without seeking much larger information and a much clearer understanding of all the facts than we either possess or could easily obtain. And you, dear brethren, will not, we are sure, expect this from us. You will be satisfied to know that our minds are greatly relieved by the address you have kindly sent us, and that it is our intention to give the same publicity to it as was given to the letter to which it is a reply.

"We must, however, do you the justice, and allow ourselves the gratification, of adding that we are very thankful to observe the Christian spirit in which, as we think, your address is written. You do not forget that the writers of the letter are your brethren, since they are partakers with you of the same adoption; and they, we are persuaded, when they shall read your address, if they shall be convinced by it, will deeply regret that they have indulged harsh thoughts or said erroneous things concerning you; and if, on the contrary, it should fail to convince them, they will, nevertheless, while retaining their own views, not only concede to you a similar liberty, but honour and love you as true servants of Christ and their brethren in Him.

"For ourselves, we assure you, as we also gave them the assurance, that we most sincerely sympathise with all who suffer wrong in the kingdom of our Lord, and for His sake, be they Germans or be they Danes. When, therefore, you bespeak from us 'a willing ear' to the sorrowful complaints of those of your countrymen who are in a very special manner sufferers by the late unhappy war, and the consequences which have followed it, your appeal to our Christian feelings finds us already predisposed to entertain it; and we desire, through you, to convey to them our sentiments of sympathy, and the expression of our prayerful hope that the God of all grace will sustain and comfort them under their trials, and in the end cause these afflictions to subserve their true happiness and His glory.

"Our hearts were exercised with many sorrows while that war was raging. We deplored that Christian nations, professing the same Protestant faith, should be engaged in mortal conflict with each other, and we thought with unfeigned distress of the multitudes who, without fault of their own, were made widows and fatherless by the ruthless sword, as well as of the various forms in which tribulation had to be endured from its ravages by thousands of comparatively unoffending citizens and peasants. But we remember that it is sometimes by 'terrible things in righteousness' that the Lord corrects the nations, and accomplishes His designs of mercy towards His own people. We fervently join our prayers with yours that out of these great calamities which the country of our Danish brethren has suffered, she may, through the hand of a gracious God healing her wounds, and drying her tears, by the restoration of peace, spring up again to new prosperity, and shine forth still brighter than aforesaid among the kingdoms of Europe as a noble community of Christian people, fearing God and blessed by Him. Thus may the Lord graciously exalt those whom He has humbled, and lift up those whom He has cast down.

"We shall still rejoice to cultivate friendly relations with you, and, through the medium of the Evangelical Alliance, to interchange, in every practicable way, those offices of brotherly love which so much tend, by their blessed influence, to cement the hearts of true believers to each other. And more especially in these times of rebuke when not only do irreligion and ungodliness abound among the masses of the people, but so many in our own country, as well as among the Protestant nations of the Continent, who ought to be pillars in the churches, instead of earnestly contending for 'the faith once delivered to the saints,' seem to apostatise from it, some passing over to Popery, and others verging to the very confines of infidelity, we feel how needful it is that the Church of the living God should be united in bearing its testimony to 'those things which are' still, as they have been from the beginning 'most surely believed among us;' and in holding up before the face of an unbelieving world the majestic glory of our crucified and risen Redeemer, and the oneness of all the redeemed in Him.

"In the believing recognition of your agreement with us in these sentiments, as in all the fundamental doctrines of the Gospel, we commend ourselves, beloved brethren, to your affection, and heartily pray that peace may be on you, and mercy, and upon the Israel of God."

"Brethren, the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit.

"CALTHORPE, President.

"JAMES DAVIS, Secretary.

"H. SCHMETTAU, Ph. D., Foreign Secretary."

NEW MEMBERS.

The following persons have been admitted to membership since April last: The Right Hon. the Earl of Kintore; William Long, Esq., Great Cumberland-place. Rev. T. D. H. Batterby; Rev. W. J. Pollock; E. J. Grayson, Esq.; and Rev. J. E. Saull, of Keswick. Rev. Colin Campbell; Rev. G. F. Head and Rev. T. C. Webster, of Lancaster; Richard Usher, Esq., Mrs. Usher, and Andrew M'Cormick, Esq., of New Ross; Henry Maull, Esq., and Mrs. Maull, Ramsgate; Captain John Hancock, R.N., and Brownlow North, Esq., Edinburgh; James Shaw, Esq., C. W. Shaw Esq., J. T. Bristow, Esq., and John Lytle, Esq., of Belfast; Rev. Dr. Jenkins, Pimlico; Rev. H. W. Plumtre, Eastwood; Major-General Walker J. O. M'Queen, Esq., Miss J. Shaw Stewart, Mrs. H. Hoseason, and Miss Louisa Douglas, of Edinburgh; Rev. W. H. Bonner, Plaistow; Rev. William Wilson and Mrs. Wilson, Sheffield; Mrs. Graham Dixon, Mrs. Bartley, Colonel Heyland and Mrs. Heyland, of Jersey; James Fenning Esq., and Mrs. Fenning, Clapham-park; Rev. A. F. Buscarlet, Naples; Rev. J. Collie, Genoa; Rev. J. M'Dougall, Florence; Rev. Mr. Figu and Rev. John Williams, Milan; Colonel and Mrs. Colin M'Kenzie, of Calcutta; G. S. Bristow Esq., Rev. H. N. Dupont, Rev. S. March, Rev. H. H. Carlisle, Charles May, Esq., and J. C. Sharpe, Esq., of Southampton. Ambrose Bann Esq., Stamford-hill; W. J. Johnson, Esq., Fleet street.

JAMES DAVIS, Secretary.

HERMANN SCHMETTAU, Foreign Secretary.

Evangelical Christendom.

THE ENCYCLICAL LETTER.

unnecessary for us here to enter into any description, or to present any summary, of the Encyclical Letter recently issued by the Pope. The document, which has been the subject of comment for weeks in all European countries, must be familiar to our readers. Suffice it to say that, at this moment of crisis and of peril for the Roman Church when the Pope is himself conscious that his throne is rocking on the waves of revolution which he can neither control nor guide, he has published an elaborate manifesto, in which the Papacy is identified with the straitest sect of Ultramontanism. The pretensions of the priesthood are elevated to a standard which scarcely have suited the atmosphere of Europe in those mediæval ages, when a monk or clerk, and an educated man were synonymous terms. The training of the young and the direction of opinion in the old are alike claimed for the Church. The temporal and the spiritual are mixed up in that utter confusion which is so thoroughly characteristic of Popery. The advance of the world in scientific knowledge and political improvement is blindly ignored or angrily condemned, and it is boldly proclaimed to be heresy to affirm that the Papacy can ally itself with modern civilization and progress. Such are the main contents of this astounding production, which Protestants see that combination of recklessness, folly, and self-confidence displayed by the ancients a kind of madness, with which the higher powers struck down the heathen intended to destroy, and on which all thoughtful Romanists have looked with amazement, with misgiving, with shame, and with distress.

It is with feelings very different from exultation that we regard this Encyclical Letter. There is so much infidelity and so little faith in these days, and the taunt of the scoerner is so apt to be directed against all that is called holy, whether Catholic or Popish, that we cannot, without deep regret, behold religion in any degraded condition. Not to laugh, not to point the finger, but to take a garment, and to veil this humiliating and deplorable spectacle, is the prompting of a good heart upon the occasion. If infidelity could in any case, or by any arguments, be justified, it would be when religion is thus degraded. "Non Deos vulgi negare solent;" said Epicurus, "sed vulgi opiniones Deo applicare profanum;" and the materialistic followers of Epicurus in our time may paraphrase and apply these words of their master, by declaring that it were better to have no opinion of God at all than one so unworthy of Him as that proclaimed by the man who calls himself the spiritual father of Christendom. For what could be a more unworthy opinion of the omnipotent and all-wise Creator, than that He has endowed man with faculties impelling him to the pursuit of knowledge, and implanted in him instincts which declare authoritatively that it is his duty to make use of these faculties, and yet made it a sin for him to push onward to the end which they urge him? To say that there is evil in the world is one thing; that progress in art and science is not necessarily connected with religion, is another; but to affirm, as this Encyclical affirms, that the evil is more powerful than the good, that the energy of the human intellect, working in various provinces of nature, is alien to nature's God, that the animating spirit of modern civilisation which has brought unnumbered blessings to man, which has added the numbers of the human species, checked disease, shed the golden smile of the sun's rays upon the bleak hill-side and the waste morass, harnessed the latent powers to the car of humanity, and sent knowledge in a thousand forms into the abodes of ignorance, is not divine, but diabolic—this is to utter an opinion of the Most High which may well be alleged to be more dishonouring than unbelief. One of the earliest effects of this Encyclical will be to send a number of minds, in startled and impetuous recoil from such religion, into the dark embrace of infidelity or atheism.

It is some consolation to reflect that the document is pre-eminently and distinctly Popish, and that its Popery cannot easily be confounded with the unpolluted Gospel of Christ. No candid infidel can turn upon Christians and say, This is what your faith conducts to. The whole affair is Romish. The references to Scripture are few and far between, while Fathers and saints are quoted in almost every sentence, and there is an ostentatious display of reverence for the Virgin Mary. The impression conveyed is not that certain powers and agencies which it denounces are opposed to God or to the great doctrinal truths of Christianity, but that they set themselves against the Church of Rome. The ideal of duty suggested is submission to the Pope and dogged resistance to all improvement. This is not what can be accepted as Christianity; it is the essence and perfection of that spirit which has converted primitive Christianity into the Romish apostacy, and by casting out which the Church of Rome might be restored to what it was in the days of the apostles.

It is indeed this consideration which lends its highest interest and importance to the Encyclical. It is especially adapted, under the blessing of God, to promote that separation between the Popish and the Christian, in the Romish communion, of which the signs of the time appear to give indication. Within the Church of Rome there are two powers and parties, between which there has hitherto been no explicit declaration of war, but which are naturally and irreconcilably hostile to each other. The first of these parties, while devout in spirit and unbending in attachment to the central truths of Christianity, is bound by slender ties, either of belief or of affection, to the Papacy. It is a learned party. It has engaged in those critical studies in which Protestant theologians showed the way. One of its leading minds, Dollinger of Munich, has attained a recognised and lofty place among the theologians of Europe. It is a national party. Without explicitly denying the supremacy of the Pope, it favours the theory of national churches, and its Italian section, headed by Passaglia, declares boldly for a free Church in a free State. It does not flatly reject the dogma of Papal infallibility, but it qualifies and circumscribes it, and refuses to anchor by it, instead of sailing onward in the current of modern ideas. It is on the side of freedom—religious, political, and social—being firmly persuaded that “truth, like a torch, the more it’s shook, it shines,” and that the religion which is divine has nothing to fear from conscience honestly listened to, or reason justly interrogated. Among laymen and politicians, the most eminent representative of this party is M. de Montalembert, a man whose sincerity of devotion to Roman Catholicism has never been called in question, and who scruples not to affirm that the doctrines of the Church of Rome admit of association with constitutional government on the English model. The other party in the Romish communion is that of the Ultramontane. Its views are embodied in the Encyclical Letter. It condemns all that the antagonistic party approves. It scorns learning, holding that a good Catholic requires to know only what his priest tells him, and preferring legends about the saints to critical inquiries into the historical records of Christianity. It fears and denounces science. It detests freedom in every form, and would gag the press and annihilate the platform. It is anti-national, leaning towards the centralisation of all ecclesiastical authority in Rome. Such are the two parties which agree in assuming the name of Roman Catholic. They are to be found in all countries where Roman Catholicism is known, and their existence is, perhaps, the most important fact in contemporary history. They are not, as we said, as yet arrayed in mutual hostility, but the breach between them is gradually becoming wider. Except in Italy, indeed, the party which opposes the Ultramontanes is cautious, fearing, and anxiously wishful to avoid being called anti-Papal. In Italy, Passaglia and his followers are restrained by no timidity or delicacy, but proclaim openly that the temporal power of the Pope ought to be divorced from the spiritual, and a Church free from pontifical domination established. In France, also, there begin to be heard ecclesiastical protests against the policy of the Vatican, and announcements, from the lips of priests, that Ultramontane Romanism is no longer a faith for an intelligent man. Abbé Guettec, writing in the Union Méridienne, declares not only that the Encyclical is "a defiance to all modern society, the proclamation of a complete rupture between that society and the Roman Church," but affirms that the rupture in question was "long since an accomplished fact." Pius IX. he pronounces "a vain and ignorant man, if ever there was one," who has thrown himself into the arms of the party of reaction. "The General of the Jesuits," he says, "governs the Romish Church in the present day. No one doubts the fact, and those who for certain motives deny it, know as well as we do that it is so." The Pope "understands that the modern mind will be too strong for his word," and that the only thing to be thought of is, "how to unite, by in-dissoluble bonds, those who, by fanaticism, by feeble-mindedness, by interest, are tempted to make a complete sacrifice of their understanding, their conscience, their free will, to follow blindly the Pope, under pretence that, being the vicar of Christ, and infallible, he is sure to lead them to salvation." Utterances like these, though they are as yet not the rule, but the exception, have deep significance. Nevertheless, it is on the whole true that the Liberal and reforming party within the Church of Rome has been desirous to avoid rupture with the authorities of the Church, and to remain on terms of cold civility with the Ultramontanes. On the side of Rome, however, there has been no forbearance. Every attempt, on the part of the Liberals, to introduce intellectual movements within the Romish communion, or to associate the clergy with scientific enlightenment, has been sternly checked. A quarterly Review, set on foot by the party in Great Britain, whose ability, candour, and breadth of sympathy had at once commended it to watchers of the intellectual and moral horizon, was summarily put down. The project of a clerical congress, in which opinion on the relation of the Church to science might have found expression, was condemned. Last of all comes this Encyclical, which is directed pointedly and emphatically against the advance party in the Roman Catholic communion. It leaves for that party no ground to stand upon. It presents a summary of their most cherished ideas, of their highest aspirations and dearest hopes, and brands the whole with the name of heresy. With peremptory arrogance, it bids them be assured that compromise is impossible, that what they have sought to veil as the weakness of a few ecclesiastics is essential to soundness in the faith, that their fond endeavours to prove the Church to which they lovingly cling reconcilable with progress and civilisation, are unpardonable insults to the Papacy. As in the sixteenth century, so now, Rome scourges from her bosom those children who ask for a purer faith and a more liberal culture, and announces, with the relentless austerity and obstinacy which drove Luther and Calvin from a Church they could have died to serve, that no terms can be made with men who appeal to reason, to Scripture, to conscience, or to God, against the doctrine that Papal infallibility can make evil good and good evil.

The Encyclical, therefore, amounts to a declaration of war on the part of the Ultramontanes against their opponents within the pale of the Church of Rome.

The Pope calls the civilised world to witness that he has drawn the sword and thrown away the scabbard. Are there any circumstances to countenance the belief that the opposite party will be driven by it from their negative and pacific attitude into one of more pronounced hostility? Are there any indications that the publication of the Encyclical, by Pius IX., may correspond to the launching of the bull against Luther, by Leo X., and mark the stage at which the breach between Rome and the modern reforming party became irreparable? This momentous question admits, we think, of an affirmative answer.

The counsellors of the Papacy have not only done their utmost to drive the enlightened party into avowed hostility, but have prepared them allies of a more influential kind. The grasping, centralising, domineering policy of the Ultramontane has given offence to nations famed for their devotion to the Roman See. In order that all ecclesiastical appointments throughout the Romish world may be in the hands of the Pope, engagements entered into with Portugal have been violated, and Spain and Austria have felt that the burden laid upon them by the Papacy is too heavy for them to bear. In France and in Italy the dogged opposition of the Pontifical authorities to Italian and Imperial policy has prepared Victor Emmanuel to set up a Church not Popish, but national, and has extorted the practical admission from Napoleon III., that the conciliation he so long expected to effect between Rome and modern civilisation is hopeless. This we take to be the meaning of his appointment of Prince Napoleon to a place in the Privy Council, and of the highly significant allusion, in the official declaration respecting the Encyclical, that its publication was permitted with exception of whatever might be "contrary to the liberties, franchises and maxims of the Gallican Church." In short, the policy of the Vatican has been directed, as if by express purpose, to favour the erection of National Churches and to provide kingly protectors for the reforming party, if it should resolve upon rupture with the Pope.

We are now in a position to appreciate the full importance of the Encyclical Letter. Did we resign ourselves to the guidance of hope and enthusiasm, we might regale our imagination with visions of Italy, France, Austria, Portugal, and Spain casting off the yoke of Rome, establishing churches on a national basis, and effecting a second Reformation as comprehensive as the first. Were the nationalisation of the church once achieved, their emancipation from the thralldom of Romish error would become a matter of the highest probability. The Pope and the Ultramontanes are entirely correct in regarding Papal infallibility as the keystone in the arch of Roman Catholicism. When that goes, all goes. The testimony of history is distinct and emphatic that nations which have cast off Romish supremacy have abandoned, or by one, the peculiarities of Romanism, its Mariolatry, its saint-worship, its theory of sacerdotal or sacramental salvation, its penances, its indulgences, its mass. Henry VIII., when he made himself pope in England, was a zealous opponent of the doctrines of the Reformers. All that in him lay to keep England true to Romanism, while independent of Rome—all that could be effected by the State, the dungeon, the gallows—he did; but his efforts were unavailing. The new truth came in the wake of the new freedom, and covered England from shore to shore. Thus, as now, the policy of Rome was fitted to bring about this result. Then, as now, she set small store by doctrinal adhesion, if the claim of supremacy was rejected. Thus, as now, it was reckless in offending monarchs and people, and disposing them to listen to arguments in favour of more complete reformation. Should Victor Emmanuel carry out the scheme of a free Church in a free State—should Napoleon III. assert in their entirety the Gallican liberties—the Papacy, to judge by all analogies, would persist in inflicting such annoyances and affronts upon both sovereigns, that would feel themselves compelled to cut the doctrinal moorings by which their would still be held to Rome. The National Churches would thus gravitate that body of Christian doctrine which, in its substance, is held by all Pro-churches. The unity of the Catholic faith—a unity consisting not in allegiance earthly potentate, ecclesiastical or civil, but in acceptance of the grand truths Christian religion—would become apparent, and the hand of fellowship would ely be held out to Protestants. For such an extension of communion the ant churches are prepared by the sifting controversies to which all sectarian ces have in this century been subjected, and if they beheld Italy and France g Papal supremacy and Romish error, how gladly would right-minded Pro-disregard formulas, badges, systems, and recognise them as the national s of one Catholic Church !

TO SABBATH-SCHOOL TEACHERS AND OTHER CHRISTIAN WORKERS. 57

t perhaps we look too far into the future. Such changes as we indicate must esult of time. These, however, are days in which revolutions partake of the of all other things, and the facts of the present situation—first, the existence of of vast extent in the Church of Rome earnest in the Christian faith, profoundly d with the importance of religion, devout in spirit, but no longer in the strict pish ; and second, the impetuous tendency of monarchs and peoples to cease omish, and to become national—have not been exemplified since the sixteenth

Were the movement of opinion in Roman Catholic countries a mere infidel to throw off constraint, it would assuredly end in nothing. The succession d theories and philosophies is of very slight importance in relation to al or spiritual advancement of the race. Clouds they are without water, out the light, but giving no rain. It is because the party opposed Ultramontanes is animated with a genuine faith, it is because Dollinger maglia are religious men, that we regard their views and proceedings isfaction and with hope, and deem it possible that they may lead from the of Rome that remnant of true Catholicism and genuine Christianity which been extinguished by Papal domination or stifled under Romish superstition. ults, however, are with Providence. For us the matter of chief concern is hend clearly the monitions and lessons of this extraordinary juncture, and to t them into practical duties. The intelligence of Europe is ceasing to be ; for us it is to strive that it cease not to be Christian. And how shall we ive ? First, as always, by prayer to Him who sitteth above the floods, king that He would send forth a spirit of wisdom, of courage, of energy, of faith,

His people at this time ; and, secondly, by combining a calm and firm adhethe truths of the Gospel, in their simplicity and in their clearness, with patient ation for the prepossessions, the peculiarities, the partial knowledge, of men struggling onwards to the light—with singleness of eye to the glory of Christ prosperity and extension, not of our denominations, but of His Church—diness at all moments to assist Evangelical Christians on the Continent with with prayer, with all the resources, spiritual and material, which the y has placed at our command. B.

SABBATH-SCHOOL TEACHERS AND OTHER CHRISTIAN WORKERS.

LESS DELIVERED AT FREEMASONS' HALL, JANUARY 5, 1863, BY JAMES HAMILTON, D.D.

eld is the world. In cultivating it He invites His people to be fellows with Him. To every Christian is confided a portion of seed-corn—facts, recepts, principles—which, if they only find a lodgment in a living spirit, and sanctify. The pastor amidst his flock, the teacher amidst his class, the parent amidst his children, should remember, "This is my field. Here the Lord set me, and said, Occupy till I come. His field is the world; my little allotment within these four walls. O that I may be wise to win souls! O that I may them all brought to a clear and early decision, and choosing that good part which shall never be taken from them!"

58 TO SABBATH-SCHOOL TEACHERS AND OTHER CHRISTIAN WORKERS.

The ground is fallow. You never saw a field in which wheat sprang up spontaneously; and there never was a mind in which holy desires and devout affections grew up of their own accord. The ground is fallow; and if there be no instruction and no good influence—no opening of the heart and no putting in of sacred truth when the angel-reapers come, they will find no harvest there.

But you have got the precious truth, and in a certain, though subordinate sense you have a powerful influence. Break up the ground, and sow.

Break up the ground. The backwoodsman finds his lot a jungle or a block forest trees. Not a sunbeam can reach the cold dead soil, and the very rain poisoned as it soaks through the brown fir needles—the felted arbor-vitæ leaves. But against this brooding and primeval incubus the feller comes up, and as before the strokes of his nimble hatchet one colossus after another crashes down, a bright opening is cleared, and for the first time since the flood a following summer is rippling in the sunny breeze the rye or Indian corn.

And so the evangelist in Tahiti or Tinnevely—the City missionaries and Bible women in London—the preachers in the wynds of Glasgow—the teachers in our ragged schools—they are pioneers. Their ground is not only fallow, but filled with a fearful overgrowth of superstition, sottish ignorance, and astounding immorality. And yet, answering prayer and prospering noble effort, how often has the Most High given to these faithful labourers a glorious recompense, and in the very heart of the devil's jungle permitted them to see a garden of God.

But most of us have a task less formidable—at least, as far as concerns gross darkness and disgusting vice—and a task which ought to be exceedingly attractive for the field is already enclosed; the objects of our effort are our own—our own children, our own scholars, our own people. And when you think of the possible results—or, rather, of the inevitable alternatives—is there any effort, any watchfulness, any self-denial, any instance in prayer you can grudge, if haply you may save some—nay, if haply (and wherefore not?) you may save them all?

That our meditation may be practical, we offer a few hints, which, perhaps may suggest to some minds thoughts not less practical, and still more useful.

1. Be definite. What do you wish to do? To save souls. To impart that knowledge which saves and sanctifies, and to follow it up with the most powerful motives. First of all, you wish to see the Saviour loved, and trusted, and revered and then to see your children walking in the truth—open, ingenuous, affectionate, unselfish, guileless followers of the Lamb of God. You long to see them such that you may hope their path through life will be beneficent and holy, and that heaven will hereafter be their home.

2. Be diligent. Look well to the state of your field, your flock, your family. Even if the good seed is growing, weeds will be growing also, and these it is the business of a good husbandman to notice and uproot. Not always finding fault, but watching for the welfare of those who are dear to you; and in the spirit of Him who does not break the bruised reed nor quench the smoking flax, noticing every effort at well-doing in such a way as may lead on to yet greater things than these.

3. Be hopeful. Love is the essence of the Gospel, and where the spirit of the Gospel is imbibed there will come forth a character benign, effusive, cordial—not easily "puffed up," not easily "provoked." But love "hopeth all things," and is business so arduous as yours, my friends, it is of the utmost moment to be bright-hearted and hopeful.

Nearly all the men who in this world of ours have achieved any great success, or rendered any enduring service, were men of an eager, ardent spirit: that is, they not only had a profound conviction that their cause was good, but they seem never to have doubted that, sooner or later, it would triumph. Such a man was Luther; with pope and emperor, monks and politicians all against him, he sang, "God is our Refuge," and never doubted that the Gospel would be published and welcomed through the length and breadth of his beloved Germany. Such a man was our own Latimer; in the straightforwardness of his own genial spirit publishing the glad tidings cheerily, with much confidence in the native sense of Englishmen, and with unfaltering confidence in the truth of God; gay even as he went to martyrdom, because persuaded that "such a candle would be that day lighted in England, as should never be put out." Such men were Whitfield and Wesley, John Howard and John Williams; they were strong in the goodness of their cause, and remembering that their Master could not be defeated, they would not permit themselves to be daunted. And such a man was the Apostle Paul. Everything was adverse. The Gospel was a novelty. The Greeks were disdainful; the Jews were fiercely hostile; and amongst professed believers many failed "to adorn the doctrine." Still, that doctrine Paul knew was the power of God unto salvation, and, with stout heart and elastic, he went on proclaiming it, amidst stripes and imprisonments, "in tumults, in labours, in watchings, in fastings," and for his ardent, unquenchable zeal growing millions will arise and bless his memory.

Your work is hard. To instruct the ignorant; to reclaim the vicious; to eradicate long habits of evil; to create and foster elements of worth and nobleness in natures base, sensual, selfish; to make the lying truthful, the cunning open, the dishonest upright, the idle industrious; to bring to Christ the careless, and to train to Christian excellence converts who have everything still to learn; is not this hard work? Is it not so hard, that if you could not hope for higher help, it would be altogether presumptuous and chimerical?

But that higher help is promised, and, daily claiming it, you should proceed on the assumption that it is given you. God is with you. He is evermore on the side of truth and goodness, and in this most arduous business He who has invited you to be His fellow-workers ensures your success. In due reason ye shall reap, if ye faint not.

The Christian and the Christian teacher should be an embodied Gospel, full of that "peace and good-will" by which it brings "glory to God." A sombre temperament or splenetic humour may coexist with a certain amount of religious principle or devotional feeling; but if the mind were fully surrendering to the "joyful sound," it could hardly be desponding or gloomy. And there is a contagion in genuine happiness. Instead of imagining that religion is another name for sourness and severity, spectators would perceive that it is the secret of true blessedness—the source of a joy to which they themselves are strangers. And thus "the lively hope" shining in your looks and movements would not only disarm hostility, but might awaken in many a mind the wish to share it, and your hortatory or preceptive instructions would be prodigiously facilitated and enforced by the prepossession of your cheerful countenance.

True, many of the objects of your solicitude may be at present uninviting and unpromising; but the philanthropist is like the man who takes up a lump of earthy ore and espies in it a bar of precious metal: he is like the man who gathers rags from the dust heap or the kennel, and foresees them converted into sheets of virgin paper, ready to receive the bright thoughts and fair pictures projected on them by the poet's pen or the artist's pencil. He is one who in an island of dirty savages describes a commonwealth of intelligence and piety not come as yet; and who in convict-ship or prison recognises a gymnasium for moral discipline, the probationary school from which, by God's blessing on well-directed effort, may yet emerge many renovated and ennobled character. And he is one who in a ragged class, or in the new recruits of a reformatory, hails so many problems for Christian zeal, and hope to see as many trophies of all-conquering and all-transforming grace.

And so, in order to be successful, you must be sanguine. Let your scholars and inmates see how exalted are your aims and hopes on their behalf; and even when you are met by some outburst of ingratitude or depravity, however much you may be dismayed or afflicted, you must not be disheartened. In reproving, beware of that tone which makes the transgressor despair of himself, and which tells him that there is no recovery for such a reprobate. And cherish every hopeful appearance. The beginning is usually small; the first indications of better things are usually confused and feeble, and mixed with much infirmity. But the Lord Jesus "did not break the bruised reed, nor quench the smoking flax." Under His benignant fostering, fanned and cherished by the Spirit of all grace, many a time has the smoking flax flamed up into a burning and shining light: many a time has the bruised, down-trodden seedling been tended and sheltered and nurtured till it grew up into a tree of righteousness.

"Now the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that ye may abound in hope, through the power of the Holy Ghost."

ANCIENT AND MODERN PILGRIMS TO THE HOLY LAND.*

PILGRIMAGES to the Holy Land began at an early date, and as M. de Pressensé remarks, it would be very curious to trace their history. This, however, it is not our purpose to do at any length, as it would not only require a considerable amount of research, but more space than we can spare. We shall therefore content ourselves with repeating a few of the facts mentioned by M. de Pressensé, and with adding a few from the stores at our disposal. There are no traces of such pilgrimages in the apostolic age, and it is not till we come to the time of Constantine the Great that we begin to meet with them. The idea of pious visits to places famous in sacred history seems to have been unknown to the Ancient Jews, who, like the Christians of the early Church, entertained more spiritual views of religious faith and duty. But when the Church degenerated from its first heavenly-mindedness, and began to value earthly ceremonies and distinctions, then, and not till then, did it begin to reckon pilgrimages among religious virtues. The practice was common among the pagans, and exists among them at the present day in India and elsewhere. It was adopted by the Mohammedans, and in some cases even by the Jews. Helen,

* Le Pays de l'Evangile. Notes d'un Voyage en Orient. Par Edmond de Pressensé. (The Country of the Gospel. Notes of a Journey in the East. By E. de Pressensé.) Paris: Ch. Meyrueis. 1864.

Peregrinatores Medii Aevi Quatuor. Burchardus de Monte Sion; Ricoldus de Monte Crucis; Odoricus de Foro Julii; Wilbrandus de Oldenburg. (Four Pilgrims of the Middle Ages; two of whom are now edited for the first time; and two in a more correct form than before. By J. C. M. Laurent.) Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs. 1864.

Die Pilgerfahrt des Ritters Arnold von Harff von Cöln durch Italien, Syrien, Aegypten, Arabien, Aethiopien, Nubien, Palästina, die Türkei, Frankreich und Spanien, etc. (The Pilgrimage of Count Arnold von Harff from Cologne through Italy, Syria, Egypt, Arabia, Ethiopia, Nubia, Palestine, Turkey, France and Spain.) Edited by Dr. E. von Groote. Cologne: J. N. Heberle. 1860.

Sacred Scenes; or Notes of Travel in Egypt and the Holy Land. By Rev. F. Ferguson, M.A. Glasgow: Adamson. London: Jackson, Walford, and Hodder.

the mother of Constantine, may be said to have founded the custom in connexion with Christianity, and ancient writers tell us of her extraordinary zeal and devotion in discovering and adorning the supposed scenes of Scripture events. Her example was contagious, and from that time the fashion was determined. Persons of all ranks counted it a holy and a meritorious act to go to Palestine, to worship at the so-called holy places, which became more and more numerous as ages rolled away. The ingenuity of priests and monks pretended to discover, one after another, almost every celebrated spot mentioned in the Bible; while the credulity of pilgrims greedily swallowed the fictions which were repeated to them. If we are to believe these shameless impostors, everything has been found out, from the place where Adam was created, to the upper room where the disciples met after the resurrection. We believe that a certain number of the sites identified were genuine, but our faith does not accept the larger portion of them. A careful study of the New Testament, and of the history of the Holy Land on to the days of Constantine, shows it to be morally impossible for the monks and priests of later days to have been anything but deceivers in a great many cases.

The churches and monasteries which were erected by the first patrons of pilgrimages would have sunk into ruin but for the zeal with which these pious journeys were advocated. This zeal, however, was unabating, and presented so many inducements to pilgrims, that the trade became almost universal. Men of all sects and of all nations hastened to Jerusalem and the surrounding lands, and monasteries and churches were built and endowed even amid the solitudes of deserts and the crags of the mountains. There is, for example, upon the traditional Mount Sinai a monastery which has existed for thirteen hundred years, while some in an Egyptian wilderness were founded even earlier. Like churches and monasteries were scattered broadcast over all Palestine, and some of those which still exist there are of very ancient origin. Money was found for the building, endowing, and adorning these places; men were found in swarms ready to spend their days in them; and pilgrims were never wanting; for poor and rich, indigent and affluent, were alike accepted. There were not a few to whom a pilgrimage was the fulfilment of a vow, or the performance of a penance; but whatever the motives which urged them, they went as we have said. The mutations of European Governments, and the changes of affairs in Palestine itself, put no stop to the stream of misguided souls which flowed into the Holy Land. In course of time the Crusades began, and hundreds of thousands of our fellow-men went out to Palestine to return no more. Doubtless many must have had no other prospect, but they had learned to think that to die there was to die at the very gate of heaven. The Crusades left enduring marks upon the face of the land, but the infidel once more came into peaceable occupation, and pilgrims had to run fresh risks. Yet the infidel did not suppress pilgrimages; he annoyed and plundered the pilgrims, but he was content to show his superiority, and to be enriched. All this was known, but the greater the danger, the greater the merit, and, in any case, a successful pilgrimage was like a successful voyage to Ophir; the spiritual merchant came home laden with pardons, and benedictions, and indulgences, and relics—enough to enrich himself and his heirs for ever. Still further to tempt those who wanted to win heaven's favour in this way, there were all along the land-route, and wherever pilgrims were likely to touch, monasteries and churches, full of relics, and lavish in pardons and blessings. We are alternately amused and saddened as we peruse the records of those who have written the story of their pilgrimage to Palestine. Undoubtedly the collapse of the Crusades lessened the number of pilgrims, but certainly not to the degree that M. de Pressensé supposes.

It was not until the period of the Reformation that the general question of pilgrimages was revised, and not till then that the records of pilgrims began to take the shape of regular books of travel. Pilgrims did not travel in the ordinary sense of the word. They were on their way to heaven, and the best route thither was through the Holy Land. They did not want to see anything unless it was connected with some pious tradition, or some devout and holy saint or angel, or some wonderful scene in Satanic history. St. George and the dragon were placed on the same level as Adam and Cain, or any other scriptural characters. Merit was the one commodity sought for, and marvels were accepted as a matter of course. The Reformation, however, opened the eyes and mouths of many men, and the effect became apparent in the matter of pilgrimages everywhere. Rome has ever since been less able to flaunt the whole paraphernalia of her lying wonders before the world; and though they have not been renounced, they have become less popular; and that of the comparatively few who now go on pilgrimage to Palestine, only a small minority believe the fictions of the monks: indeed, some of the old fictions seem to be quite forgotten.

We could write a long chapter about the disgraceful perversion of religious truth and character which the old pilgrimages fostered. There is no reason to think that Chaucer's pictures of his pilgrims to Canterbury are essentially false, and we know how vile some of his pilgrims were. Nor is there reason to doubt that many of the pilgrims to Palestine were as vile as any that Chaucer has painted. The idea of holiness was that of merit, and whatever a man's personal character, merit could be acquired to any extent by a pilgrimage. And so they who rebelled against heaven in their life, believed they could evade the claims of justice in the death. By accomplishing a pilgrimage, they could make heaven itself their debtor to any extent that could possibly be required. To show that we do not exaggerate our reference to the merits obtainable by pilgrims, we take a single paragraph from the work of Arnold von Harff (1496 to 1499), where he is speaking of Bethlehem. He first mentions the altar where Christ was circumcised, and at which there was granted indulgence and remission for all sins, both as to punishment and guilt. In the same Church there was the altar where the three kings prepared to offer the gifts to the infant Jesus; there was granted indulgence for seven years and seven times forty days. At the place where Christ was born (in the same church) there was allowed forgiveness, again, of all sins as to their punishment and guilt. At the manger hard by there was also granted remission of all sins, as to their penalty and guilt. This was not amiss for a single church: a man might visit it, and in the matter of pardon only could obtain more than three times as much as he required. And so lavish were the dispensers of pardons, that they would give complete absolution for visiting a spot commemorative of an event which never occurred, or for visiting relics which were unquestionably spurious. The writer just referred to leaves the chapel where the manger had been, and where they showed a round hole into which the star dived which had led the three kings to Bethlehem! He then comes to a grotto, wherein lie many of the innocent children whom Herod slew, and where an indulgence of seven years and seven times forty days is granted. Not far away he finds another grotto, with a chapel named after St. Jerome, and containing his tomb. Here the pilgrim was told that St. Jerome translated the Bible from Hebrew into Greek, and from Greek into Latin, which was a curious piece of history, but decorated with another indulgence of seven years and seven times forty days. The number forty, so common in these indulgences, is a reminiscence of the forty days of the Saviour's fasting and victory over Satan.

But passing from these base corruptions, let us just glance at what an Jewish traveller says upon a single point. We refer to Benjamin of Tudela, who died in 1173, after travelling in the East. Among other places, he went into Hebron. Here, he says, there had been a Jewish synagogue, but the Christians (he probably means the Crusaders or their contemporaries) made six tombs, which they called after the names of Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, Rebekah, Jacob, and Leah, saying to pilgrims that these were the tombs of the patriarchs, and making money by the business. The Jew who would pay what was asked was allowed to pass through the iron gate into the caverns below, and to see the real tombs. We suppose that the tombs, which Benjamin says were of Christian manufacture, are the same which the Prince of Wales and his suite were allowed to see three or four years ago, as a very great favour. Hence we must conclude that the monkish frauds have been in some cases adopted by the Mohammedans, partly for the sake of gain, and partly from superstitious motives.

The four mediæval pilgrims whose "progresses" have been edited by M. Laurent, furnish new illustrations of the rapacity which has made merchandise of the very dust of Palestine, and of the iniquity which in the name of Christianity has converted the land into a magazine of fetters for the souls of men. The first of the four is called Burchardus de Monte Sion, and wrote probably about A.D. 1283. He was one of the most popular of all who had written accounts of the Terra-Sancta, the Holy Land, and not without reason, for on most questions he is accurate, and says precisely what he saw. Even now, his little treatise is of real value to the student for its topographical and other information. When we call him accurate, we mean that he is so to the best of his ability, and that he does not seem to invent strange tales, like some old travellers. To say that he was credulous, is to say what is true of every pilgrim that ever went on pilgrimage. Take an example. Burchardus tells us that at the distance of about two bowshots from Tyre there was shown among the sands the place of the preaching of Jesus Christ on that occasion when the woman exclaimed, "Blessed is the womb that bore thee," &c. There was also shown the stone upon which the Saviour then stood. This stone was never covered with sand, although the sand used to be blown about and to cover various objects as snow does among us in winter. We do not know of any conceivable reason for laying the scene of Christ's preaching at Tyre on the occasion referred to; but we are sufficiently satisfied that the identity of the stone and the little miracle connected with it were priestly falsehoods. When he got to Sarepta, they showed the good man the chamber where Elijah lodged with the widow. At Antaradus he saw "the first church which the blessed Peter erected in honour of the blessed Virgin." Upon Mount Tabor they showed him the ruins of the three tabernacles or cells which were constructed according to St. Peter's wish. He went to Nazareth, and saw there the place where the angel saluted Mary, but he does not say a word about the wonderful cottage of the Virgin which soon after took its flight over sea and land to Loretto, in Italy. If any such cottage had existed, we may be sure he would have heard of it. His silence condemns the Popish fraud from beginning to end. We may remark that, at Loretto, they say the "holy house" was removed from Nazareth, in 1291, but no writer is known to refer to it till 200 years after.

Time would fail us to tell of all the wonders which the old pilgrims saw in Palestine. They were not merely exhibited to them at Jerusalem, but were scattered at convenient distances over all the land. The reader will remember the indulgences which were so common when Arnold von Harff went on his pilgrimage, in 1496. It was but very little more than two hundred years earlier that the traveller, Burchardus, whom we have been speaking of, visited Palestine. The earlier one was a priest, the later one a layman; both of them, but especially the layman, can tell us of the strange things they saw; and yet, who would believe that the priest literally knows nothing of the entire system of indulgences? It is nevertheless a fact. A huge fiction which scattered indulgences broadcast over the world, was not known till 1283. This fraud, which has since brought untold millions into the Romish treasury, which is even now a chief source of its wealth, sprang into active life about 1300, when a plenary indulgence was promised to all who would visit Rome. The pilgrims who went on that occasion are said to have been more than two millions in number, and every one of them brought something to give to the priests, who were unable to receive the gifts in the usual manner, and raked them into heaps as they fell in showers upon the sacred floor. The vices and crimes of the pilgrims were almost as great as their gifts and their piety; but vice and crime were nothing compared with the gain, and so indulgences became an institution, and a mine of wealth to popes and priests all over the world. When Burchardus wrote, they had to be content with more material devices. At Hebron, for instance, there was the "Age of Damascus"—the Field of Damascus—where Adam was made. In this field there was a reddish earth or clay, which was trafficked in, not as a simple curiosity, but as a charm to preserve a man from mischief. Like the wood of the cross and Peter's chains, the clay never became less; so that, however much was dug and carried away, the hole always filled up again. This was very poor compared with indulgences, the inventor of which—Thomas Aquinas, we believe, first threw out the notion—ought to be placed at the head of the Popish calendar.

We must give the names and probable dates of the other three medieval pilgrims, but no more, as we are impatient to take up M. de Pressensé's book. The second pilgrim, then, is Ricoldus de Monte Crucis, an Italian missionary monk, who travelled in the East about A.D. 1300. The third pilgrim is Odoricus de Foro Julii, an Italian from Friuli, who visited Palestine apparently a little later than Ricoldus. The fourth pilgrim is Wilbrandus of Oldenburg. All of these are curious, and throw much light upon the pilgrimages of the olden time; but just now it is exceedingly important that what modern pilgrims have to say should be attended to. From what we have said, it will be plain enough that modern pilgrims may aid us in comparing the character and measure of superstition in Palestine with those of the superstitions of the middle ages. Not a few of the miraculous objects which were formerly shown have been lost or destroyed, or allowed to fall into neglect, in spite of their miraculous powers, while some have been supplanted by others. Antoninus the Martyr (A.D. 570) relates that he saw two waterpots at Cana, and repeated the miracle of changing water into wine—by what sleight of hand we know not. At a much more recent date six waterpots have been shown at Cana, all broken; but when Dr. Clarke went he found that two of the six waterpots were whole!

But it is not merely as against superstition that careful accounts of the Holy Land are to be coveted; they are of inestimable worth for the illustration and confirmation of the Scriptures. Let any one examine the lists of names in the book of Joshua, and he will find a good number of places mentioned there, and nowhere else in Scripture. Not a few of these names are equally unmentioned by uninspired writers. Judge, then, of the satisfaction we must feel when we see modern travellers exploring the nooks and corners of Palestine, and detecting one after another the sites or modern representatives of the villages and towns of the Old Testament. So too, with the New Testament. The tourist goes and visits Bethlehem, Nazareth, Cana, and Nain; he climbs the Mount of Olives and gazes upon Gethsemane; he wends his way to Bethany, and goes down from Jerusalem to Jericho. Jerusalem itself, though not in its glory, stands before him in its solemn grandeur and venerable decay. He can go to Lydda and Joppa, and Cæsarea, and on to the coasts of Tyre and Sidon. He can explore the Sea of Tiberias and catch and eat its fish. He can, for himself that Chorazin, and Bethsaida, and Capernaum, have fallen according the word of the Redeemer; so fallen indeed, that the site of some of them is uncertain, and all have crumbled into dust. He can see over all the land traces of that Roman power and activity which are so conspicuous in the New Testament. The whole country is as the Bible describes it: there are the Jordan, and Siloam, the Pool of Bethesda, and Jacob's Well: there are Lebanon and Hermon, the mountains of Moab and the plain of Jezreel. The very cedars of Lebanon still linger on the mountain sides. The succession of invaders and conquerors, the long ages of oppression and degradation, and the natural effects of time, have alike failed to erase altogether the Palestine of the Bible. The ancient customs many of them yet linger on; the corn is threshed upon the floor, the women grind at the mill, the householder goes up to the housetop, and hospitality gives water for washing the stranger's hands. Everything serves to remind us that these are indeed the hills, the valleys, and the plains over which Israel of old wandered, and where Christ and His Apostles walked. The effect of all these things upon the pious mind is elevating, strengthening, and instructive, and we can scarcely understand how any one can find in Palestine anything that does not shed a new light upon the sacred page, or anything that does not reveal new evidences of its truth.

Even M. Renan has succumbed in part to the inexorable logic of facts, although he has strangely misunderstood some of those facts. M. de Pressensé also felt the force of what he saw, and he describes in glowing terms the emotions which he experienced. In the very first sentence of his preface he says: "The tour which I made last spring in the East has left to me ineffaceable impressions—a kind of luminous track in mind and heart;" and again: "This land of the Gospel has given me a new intuition of the glorious past; it has seemed to reanimate itself for me, and that upon the ground which I trod, He who fills for us the past, the present, and eternity, lived again, as in ancient days, in all the reality of His divine humanity; that He disengaged himself as well from the cold fogs of metaphysics as from the gilded clouds of legend, and that He showed himself to me, as He appeared to St. Peter and St. John, to Mary of Bethany, and to the woman who laid hold of His garment, or the sinful one who wept at His feet. I hope to bear this impression into the work which I am preparing on the life of Jesus; but if these notes of travel, written for the most part under my tent, and in the places which I describe, are able to retain some traces of them, not too soon effaced, they will have attained their end." And again: "I have related not only what I have seen, but what I have thought and felt, mingling freely the present with the past, narratives with reflections, and sketches of scenery with judgments upon men and things." In one respect he has occupied the position which falls to the lot of most who visit Palestine; he has not been a discoverer. His aim was not scientific exploration, which is necessarily left to men of science and of leisure; nor antiquarian research, which few are qualified for; but observation upon things in general, and some of the least disputed points of sacred topography. He was about to write a life of Christ, and in the hope and belief that the Holy Land would supply him with new and useful ideas and impressions, he went thither. We quite believe that his labour has not been lost, and that in his agreeable volume he has supplied to others what will profit them.

The outline of the book is soon indicated. A preliminary chapter is given to the subject of pilgrimages and travels to the Holy Land. This supplies varied information and suggestions, and although limited in its range, tells us all that most will need to know in that department of history and literature. The second chapter is also preliminary, and describes the chief geographical divisions of the country. The remainder of the book is made up of the author's journal, or notes made from time to time as he proceeded. This journal commences on board the steamer from Marseilles to Alexandria, and the first date is March 1, 1864. On the 6th of the same month Alexandria was reached ; but it need not detain us, nor need we stay to relate our author's experience in the land of the Pharaohs. Suffice it to say, that after seeing Cairo and some of the ruins and remains of greatest interest in Lower Egypt, M. de Pressensé and his friends re-embarked at Alexandria for Joppa, or Jaffa, which they reached on the 17th of March, landing at ten P.M. After a glimpse of Jaffa, the travellers crossed the luxuriant plain of Sharon, passing by way of Lydda and Ramleh, and traversing the hilly and desolate district which lies nearest Jerusalem. The deep emotion which all writers describe, or nearly all, who speak of their first view of Jerusalem, the Holy City, befel M. de Pressensé, and he tries in vain to say what he felt. "I cannot express it," he says ; "the soul is overcome with emotion ; it is for the moment stupefied. Behold, then, the great sanctuary of humanity, that altar bedewed with blood divine ! It is fallen and dishonoured enough ! In Jerusalem I seek, I see, none but Jesus. The heart bears with difficulty the burden of such a shock. That hour, so expected, so desired, which crowns so many others, and which answers to all that there is great in life, surprises you like the most unlooked for event. Behold, then, those hills which one has pictured to himself so many times ! Behold that corner of the world where heaven abased itself, and where the Son of God strove, suffered, and conquered. What can we say ! Adore and bless Him who has given us this great day among the days of this brief and miserable existence."

Jerusalem, with all its sorrows and ills, abounds in attractions, but we have not space to repeat what our pilgrim saw and says upon the subject. He visited the principal places of attraction in and around the city, including the Mount of Olives and Bethany. From what he says, the superstitious pilgrimages which are even now made to Jerusalem are characterised by much that is to be deplored and condemned. It further appears that the social and political condition of the country is as bad as it well can be. These are things of which we who are so highly favoured should not lose sight. We do not know what may come of the movements which we will here enumerate, but we trust they will be overruled to good. First, there is the project for reconstructing the harbour of Joppa, and the formation of a railway to Jerusalem from that place. And then there is a scheme for supplying Jerusalem with water from Solomon's pools, in connexion with which there is at the city a company of English sappers and miners engaged in making a scientific survey. These are hopeful signs, and if carried out, will powerfully affect the state of the country.

To return to M. de Pressensé. He went to Bethlehem, and Hebron, and the Dead Sea, and saw what remains of Jericho. He then turned his steps northward, and soon found himself at Shechem, or Nablus. Here is Ebal, and here is Gerizim, and here is the Well of Jacob, and here are the last remnants of the Samaritan race and religion. The place is replete with objects of interest, but our travellers can only scan them hastily, and they only pause to pay their respects to Sebaste, where once the city of Samaria stood. The route followed led them among hills and valleys to Jenin, which is the En-Gannim of Scripture ; thence it took them over the plain of Jezreel, with Mount Gilboa on the right, Mount Tabor further on on the same side, and the range of Carmel on the left. Our pilgrims had crossed the path which the prophet took when he outran Ahab's chariot. From Jezreel's plain they went up to Carmel, and thence to Nazareth (which will never cease to have its charms), and on to the Sea of Galilee. Here there is not only the lake, but many associations of the most agreeable character connected with the Gospel history. These are inviting themes, but we must be content to mention them only, and to say that M. de Pressensé seems to have drunk in the true inspiration of those hallowed spots which it was allowed him to visit.

The remainder of the pilgrimage must be told in a few words. From the sea of berias our friend went by way of Safed, across the mountains of Naphtali, to the sources of the Jordan, and away to Damascus; hence to Baalbek, and finally to Beyrout, where wanderings in Palestine and Syria end with so many. From Beyrout the way home was diversified by a call at Smyrna, and a railway trip thence to Athens; a look at Constantinople, another at Athens, and another at Venice, where for the present we bid adieu to one who has our best thanks for his most instructive and graphic narrative.

The materials for Mr. Ferguson's book were chiefly acquired during a tour to Egypt and Palestine early in 1862. The author introduces a considerable amount of information drawn from reliable sources, and this, added to his own observations and sections, helps to fill his pages with useful and agreeable matter. In the first place, he travelled over the more frequented parts of Lower Egypt, after which he went from Alexandria to Joppa and Jerusalem. Of Jerusalem he writes with considerable fulness. In the Holy City he went about with open eyes, and, indeed, he seldom fails to pass some judgment upon the more important objects and places which came under notice. After exploring Jerusalem, and, of course, making excursions to the Dead Sea, Jordan, Jericho, Bethlehem, and Hebron, he proceeded northwards on the usual track. Passing Bethel and Shiloh, he went on to Nablus, to see the Samaritans, Ebal, Gerizim, Jacob's Well, &c. After this he crossed the plain of Samaria to Nazareth; thence to Tiberias, round to Cana, to Nazareth again, and to Carmel. From Carmel he went north again by Acre, Tyre, and Sidon, to Beyrout and the Dog River. From Beyrout he went eastward to Damascus, where his narrative rather abruptly closes, through, what we think, a mistaken arrangement with his publishers. It is an earnest Christian book, full of varied information, and as evidently cost its author considerable research and thought. There is a pervading didactic element in the work, which will place before the reader numerous reflections connected with Holy Writ, and which, from its spiritual, intelligent, and scriptural features, admirably illustrates the difference between ancient and modern pilgrims.

C.

Foreign Intelligence.

FRANCE.

—, France, January, 1865.

THE POPE'S LAST ENCYCLICAL.

The great religious event of the last few days is the publication of the Encyclical letter, addressed by the Pope to all the cardinals, primates, archbishops, and bishops of the Roman communion. All your readers doubtless acquainted with this document, I have no need to give any analysis of it. Pius IX. has thought proper to point out and condemn, under the name of errors or heresies, eighty propositions on the most varied subjects relating to religion, morality, philosophy, politics, and civil legislation. There are some points on which all pious men will agree with the Roman Pontiff; those, for example, wherein he disapproves of Pantheism, Naturalism, absolute Rationalism, &c. the Pope is not satisfied with contending against the different forms of infidelity. He claims for the Romish Church supremacy over the State. He attacks freedom of conscience and religious liberty, freedom of the press, freedom of public education, popular suffrage—in a word, all the ideas and institutions of modern civilisation, and concludes his letter by saying that it is an error to believe that the Roman Pontiff can agree with and reconcile himself to liberalism and progress.

What can be the motives which have induced Pius IX. to promulgate such an Encyclical, in present circumstances? Is it a reply to the Franco-Italian Convention? Is the Court of Rome anxious to show that it will never enter into any arrangement with the new kingdom of Italy? Is it an indirect warning to Napoleon III.? Is it an act of bravado, intended to prove that the Papacy is ready to struggle to the last extremity against what-for the acts of a liberal tendency which marked the commencement of his reign. All respect, then, for the intentions of this weak old man, and pity for his weak and bigoted scruples!

But the Cardinals who are Pius IX.'s Ministers and counsellors would have acted wisely in employing every effort to dissuade the pontiff from committing so serious a mistake as this. Very far from playing the part of a new Gregory VII., an Innocent III., or a Sextus V., the Pope has gratuitously exposed himself to the ridicule and contempt of the nineteenth century. He resembles old Priam, who essayed to reappear upon the field of battle, and threw at his enemies a telum imbellis sine ictu. This crusade of the Papacy against modern society is not formidable; it is simply ridiculous; and whatever is ridiculous is disastrous to those who know not how to avoid it.

DISSATISFACTION OF THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT.

It is curious and instructive to examine what took place in France after the appearance of the famous Encyclical. This investigation will throw new light upon the religious condition of our country.

Napoleon III., and the members of the Cabinet, on reading the Pontifical manifesto, did not conceal their displeasure. They saw in it an act of hostility, and even ingratitude, and they were right. What! while the Emperor of the French resorts to every possible expedient to maintain his relations with the Roman Court, and even risks his popularity

French Government will make to it.

Secondly, the Minister of taking the advice of the Council addressed to all the archbishops a circular, in which he interdicted reading the Encyclical from the respective dioceses, in an office Minister of Worship justifies by the text of the Organic Law that the document cannot be the sanction of the civil power contains propositions contrary franchises, and institutions empire.

I shall not attempt to ascribe prohibition like this is against principles of religious liberty; this matter for too long a dissertation suffice to say, that such is our The Organic Articles, which, as Napoleon I., have determined of the Romish Church to the reserve to the political authority of interdicting the publication of all bulls, briefs, and other Papal which might be opposed to the laws of our country. The State followed the example of kings since the Council of Trent its procedure to what was strictly approach the Court of Rome with having committed a very serious mistake. These moderate bishops have submitted without remonstrance to the interdict of the civil power, and deem themselves happy to be able to maintain complete silence upon this affair. Thus, M. Darboy, Archbishop of Paris, has not uttered a single word of adhesion to the Encyclical.

ATTITUDE AND CONDUCT OF

Now let us consider what has the members of the episcopate

But there are other bishops—those who obey the inspirations of the Jesuits, the fanatics and violent men—who have pursued a very different line of conduct. The Archbishops and Bishops of Cambray, Nevers, Montauban, Bourges—and many others—have addressed to the Minister of Worship letters in which they bitterly complain of the restrictions which are imposed on their communications to the inhabitants of their respective dioceses. They speak, in every variety of tone, that as journalists, Protestants, Freethinkers, Jews, &c., we have a right of publication and attack upon the Encyclical, it is odious and intolerable that the heads of the Church should not, in their turn, have the right of communicating and justifying Pius IX.'s letter.

But these prelates here commit a sophism which has been justly refuted by the Constitutionnel newspaper, the organ of the Government. The bishops may, as individuals, or as private persons, reprint and dispose of the Encyclical, adding to it their own comments. But they cannot communicate it in the churches, in their episcopal capacity, &c. This is a legitimate distinction. A judge, for example, is free to make known, by means of the press, whatever opinions he may think good and likely to be of use; but when he is seated upon the bench, and pronounces a sentence, he must confine himself to the provisions of the statute bearing upon the case. So, too, a professor may say what he chooses in a newspaper, a periodical, or a book, but when he speaks before the students, in an academic hall, he owes to the Government which gives him a salary from the public treasury an altogether different responsibility. The bishops ought to understand the justness of this distinction; but they find it very convenient to receive the money of the State, without contracting any obligation towards it.

Lastly, two prelates, M. de Dreux-Brézé, Bishop of Moulins, and M. Matthieu, Cardinal-Bishop of Beauvais, have openly violated the injunction laid down by the Minister of Worship, and have read the Encyclical from their pulpits. We shall see what the Government will do under these circumstances.

The conflict is very excited, and may be productive of most serious consequences.

OPINIONS OF THE POLITICAL PRESS ON THE ENCYCLICAL.

The journals of Paris and the departments have naturally filled long columns with their remarks upon the Papal Encyclical. It deserves notice, that with the exception of the Monde, a Jesuit paper, and the Union, the representative of the old Legitimist party, all the organs of public opinion, even the most moderate, such as the Journal des Débats and La France, have unanimously censured the letter emanating from the Vatican. They accuse the Roman Pontiff, in language more or less respectful, of reviving the disused maxims of the middle ages, and of having no perception of the wants of the present time. The Journal des Villes et des Campagnes, which is in direct communication with the Archbishop of Paris, and which has a large number of priests among its subscribers, expresses no very favourable opinion of the Encyclical. All this proves that the Jesuits do not possess any great influence in France, in spite of the incredible efforts which they have made to obtain an ascendancy over and mislead the public mind.

Most of the political and literary journals come to the conclusion that the Church should be separated from the State. This is just now the universal theme of the press. As the two powers cannot work in harmony, there remains, they say, but one thing to be done, to pronounce a divorce, or separation, on account of incompatibility of ideas and temper! But the bishops and priests will by no means consent to give up the money they receive from the public treasury. Here is a fine prospect for the Pope! He runs the risk of the Romish Church in France becoming a mere voluntary association! How is it that Pius IX. displays so little foresight or common sense?

VIOLENT CONTROVERSY AMONG THE PROTESTANTS.

I shall not detain you long, on this occasion, with reference to the internal struggles of our Churches; for I have already often spoken of these conflicts in sufficient detail; and at the moment of my writing, the Protestant elections have not yet commenced in Paris. They are to take place on the 22nd of January, and you will probably know the results before the publication of your next number. God grant that they may be favourable to the cause of Evangelical religion!

While awaiting that decisive moment, the controversy in the Protestant press continues, and seems to become daily more violent. The Lien, and its subordinate, the Liberal Protestant, are incessantly abusing the Orthodox, as being exclusive and intolerant persons; they accuse them of committing persecuting, inquisitorial, and illegal acts—dissimulation, and other scandalous charges of the same kind. It is a melancholy spectacle to see writers still calling themselves members of our holy and glorious Church, having recourse to such weapons, and using invective in the place of serious and logical argument.

Nothing is more difficult than to obtain from these advocates of the negative school sound reasoning and plain proof. They constantly evade the true point of a controversy, and are for ever harping upon their great words—forbearance, toleration, charity, and brotherly love—as if these were magic terms, before which all the fundamental doctrines of the Gospel must disappear. This proceeding only demonstrates how the Rationalist journals have to act towards their readers, the great majority of whom possess no kind of acquaintance with religious things, and suffer themselves to be led astray by empty sophisms.

L'Espérance, which represents Evangelical religion and the essential principles of our communion, maintains the struggle with energy and perseverance. It has recently published articles in which the real state of things is explained in a manner as luminous as it is striking. Every Protestant elector, if he has taken the trouble to reflect upon the subject, must be fully aware that the present conflict involves the foundations of the Gospel and of the Church.

INTERFERENCE OF FREE-THINKERS AND DEMAGOGUES.

Several political journals, whose editors are avowed infidels, or men completely indifferent to the truths and promises of the Christian religion, warmly espouse the cause of M. Coquerel and his friends.

One of these journalists, M. Charles Dolfus, has recently inserted in the Opinion Nationale an article in which he says that "Christianity must be absorbed in humanity,—that the man Jesus must be put in the place of Jesus-God,—that the supernatural must fall with all its doctrinal appendages, &c." Well, M. Dolfus, being a Protestant by birth, has demanded that his name should be inscribed upon the parochial register, and he will vote for the candidates proposed by M. Coquerel. In truth, these are singular allies!

The democratic spirit which prevails among the working classes is also turned to account in order to gain votes for the negative candidates. The Orthodox are represented to the electors as the enemies of liberty, and the partisans of political as religious despotism. What pitiable

THE ORTHODOX CANDIDATES FOR

L'Espérance has published a list of names recommended by Evangelical writers to the electors. The first I mention is M. Guizot, who enjoys an illustrious reputation, nobly acquired by his political, and literary labours. Then comes M. Mallet, who has long been distinguished by his liberality and his zeal for the reformation of religion. In the third place, I may mention General Chabaud-Latour, who has rendered great services to the country in a capacity, and is devoted to every good cause. Messrs. Theodore Vernes and Alfred Assolant are also a very honourable character, and are attached to families which have diligently to the interest of the flocks in Paris. The sixth candidate, M. Laffon de Ladébat, by a mutual understanding, been chosen by the other party. It would be a great loss to French Protestantism if such men were not elected. X.

Paris, January 19,

THE WEEK OF PRAYER IN PARIS—THE STATISTICAL ELECTIONS.

If ever a Week of Prayer were desired, it was this year in Paris, and the few who to pray felt it, and the prayers were heard. But the extreme pressure for time avoidable hurry in France on the first of the year, renders it a peculiarly valuable one for religious gatherings. It was changed to the second week, it was the wishes of many. As it was, a rapid united meeting for prayer was held in the evening in a different church, pastors of various denominations being present. A handful of English met in the Central Chapel, every day; and private meetings were held here and there.

The one absorbing topic is the present election, the result of which I hope to see in a postscript. Every nerve is strung either side—by the advocates of a developing Christianity, to be perfect in science and knowledge and recondite art, and by the representatives of primitive Christianity, once and for ever perfect in Christ, God manifest in the flesh; t linking themselves to the wicked, and looking to the world for help and cheer, and receiving from the unbelieving mass what they seek ; the second looking upward to Jesus, and seeking with uprightness to enlighten their fellow-men and clear away the dust thrown around the simplest facts. The warmth on both sides is extreme, and the choice of electors is made clearer and clearer. "The choice must be made" say the Radicals, "between the authority of conscience and the authority of the Presbyterian Council ; between the Gospel and Confessions of Faith ; between the Christianity of Christ and the Christianity of the Orthodox ; between Christian toleration and Pharisaical exclusiveness ; between liberty in union and liberty in isolation ; between a vast Church accepting within its bosom every shade and every tendency, in order to harmonise and pacify them by charity, and narrow sects which engender fanaticism or which end in failure ; between progressive reform, which will gradually conquer mankind, and the motionless or retrograde dogma which becomes more and more repugnant to the conscience of our contemporaries ; between freedom and slavery ; between the letter that killeth and the spirit that giveth life. The choice must be made between those who acknowledge that the truth emanated from God is revealed by its own brilliancy, and those who suppose that religious truth can have no effect without the stamp of an external authority ; between those who believe, with Jesus, that the love of the Heavenly Father is the very essence of religion, and those who substitute for the love of the Father dry and barren theories ; between those who, with Samuel Vincent, affirm that Protestantism is the religion of modern times, and those who, with M. Guizot, despair of the future of French Protestantism."

"The choice must be made," say the Orthodox, "between Divine revelation and natural religion ; between the sovereign authority of the Word of God and that of reason and conscience ; between the Bible divinely inspired and the Bible mingled with legends and errors ; between the Gospel and a Christianity accommodated to the errors and passions of the world ; between the religion of Jesus Christ and that of wise men and philosophers ; between the Spirit of Christ and the spirit of the age ; between Jesus Christ the Son of God and Jesus Christ a teacher of morals ; between Jesus Christ the Saviour and Redeemer and Jesus Christ a mere model, not even attaining the highest degree of human perfection ; between Divine hopes and hopes resting on the sands of ephemeral systems ; between immortality and vain aspirations ; between life eternal and death ; between the Christian Reformed Church and a humanitarian, deistical, or pantheistical Church." So stand the parties. Every elector is sought out and visited by agents on both sides, and strange indeed are the facts elicited by these visits ; ignorance, indifference, the most absurd notions, are found to prevail in many places ; and in others, whole companies of Protestant men are wondering which side is right, and are glad to learn the facts of the case.

The question is a delicate one how far men who are legally electors, and yet do not belong to the Reformed Church, having adhered to some other form of worship, should vote. Some will do it without scruple voluntarily, as exercising their legal rights, throwing their weight into the Orthodox side ; others, and among these the men who on conscientious grounds, such as the separation of Church and State, object to all national churches, will not go up to vote. Nay, however much these latter sympathise with the Orthodox, there is among them an under current of feeling that, when the disruption occurs, supposing that at some future time the Orthodox are compelled to leave the National Church and relinquish State assistance, it will be the resurrection of the Protestant Church of France ! It may be the means of purifying and invigorating the Christian body throughout France ; but at the same time, it will be leaving the golden candlestick without light, to fall into darkness before the gloomy shrine already preparing to claim universal adherence, under the yet unnamed and undeveloped religion of the future.

January 20.

PASTOR JUILLERAT'S CIRCULAR.

The last and most touching circular I give you in full ; it is from the venerable Pastor Juillerat, President of the Reformed Consistory of Paris :—

To the Faithful of the Reformed Church of Paris.

My beloved Brethren,—I did not intend to speak in the great debate at this moment submitted to your consciences, but rather to leave to younger and stronger men the honour of defending the faith and independence of the beloved Church of Paris, to whose service I have been wholly devoted for forty-eight years. The recent attacks made upon me by a journal, which sought to throw insinuations upon my good faith, would not have sufficed to modify my resolution, for I know, my beloved brethren, that you all, without exception, have done true and prompt justice to such manoeuvres. But I learn that certain of my lay colleagues in the Presbyterian Council and Consistory are the object of attacks and insinuations no less perfidious, and that the most false and odious insinuations are carried against them from house to house. I can and must hold my peace no longer; silence would be almost cowardly.

I therefore come forward, my beloved brethren, and I say to you, under the eye of the God of truth, before whom I shall shortly appear: These men who are outraged and calumniated are Christians, true, faithful Protestants; for more than thirty years I have seen them at work; in the days of peace, as in the times of difficulty through which the Church has passed, their devotedness no less than their piety, their moderation no less than their zeal, have never failed. In not maintaining them in the post already confided to them, and which they have valiantly occupied, universal suffrage would strike to the heart not only the Protestant Church of Paris, not only the Protestant Churches of France, but the Protestantism of the whole world.

You will ratify, my beloved brethren, this public testimony, that, in such serious circumstances, I owed to them from my Christian affection and gratitude; you will give to the re-eligible members, as well as to the two new candidates, whom I separate from my old colleagues neither in my sympathy nor my confidence, a majority which will insure the advance of the kingdom of God. You will believe my emotion, you will believe your old pastor, remembering that he has always preached concord with firmness, and that, almost at the commencement of a ministry of nearly sixty years, he had the privilege, during the stormy outburst of 1815 at Nismes, to hold aloft, not without some peril, the banner of the pure Gospel and religious liberty.

JUILLERAT.

An article in the Siccle of this morning is very like a forlorn hope on the Liberal side, who have not hesitated to call the whole nation to take their part against the Orthodox. Sunday is the day appointed for the elections.

THE ENCYCLICAL AND M. CAYLA'S NEW PAMPHLET.

One word on the Encyclical. I have just received the new pamphlet of M. J. M. Cayla, whose "Pope and Emperor," and many other pamphlets, have from time to time obtained universal attention. The "César Pontife" will cause many an ear to tingle. It begins with the Pope's letter, shows the opinion of the press in the various European states, discusses the two expedients of the Liberals, Gallicanism on one hand, or a Free Church in a Free State on the other; rejects them both, the first as retrograde, the second as throwing all power into the hands of the Jesuits; and concludes: "*Let Cæsar be Pontiff! Let him call a national council in Paris, or any other city, and convoke all the archbishops and bishops of France, with curés delegated by the free choice of the faithful. Let the question then be put to the clergy, Are you for the French Constitution? or are you for the Encyclical? Those who adhere to the latter to be considered as having resigned their functions. Let Cæsar be Pontiff, not like the Pope-king, who calls himself the Vicar of Jesus Christ dying on the cross to redeem mankind, while he exhibits the luxury and pride of earthly kings. That would be to return to mediæval times, which we all repudiate. Let Cæsar be Pontiff—that is, let the State, without arrogating the least authority over consciences, become the only protector, guide, and counsellor of the national clergy. . . . The time seems come to cut the cable, and reject all foreign interference in our National Church. . . . Our answer to the Encyclical is in these words, as terrible to the temporal Papacy as those written on the palace of the King of Babylon: Cæsar Pontiff!" Now what will Cæsar say?*

THE REV. H. G. GUINNESS IN PARIS.

The Rev. H. Grattan Guinness is preaching in Paris. The refreshment is unspeakable to turn away from the exertion of diving into science, and the weariness of contesting disputed points, to receive the full, clear flow of God's everlasting truth. To be placed in presence of eternal things in the glorious old way of Christ's Gospel, to hear things called by their right names, and to see a man in earnest, really believing that his fellow-men before him are to live or die eternally, and that not one of them need die, but believe and live, nerves one for future work, and gives one present spirit. He is interpreted to French audiences, which have hitherto been crowded. Last night, at Taitbout Chapel, where, however, the auditory was not very numerous, the series of questions addressed to the consciences of Christians was most solemn.

ITALY.

THE POPE'S ENCYCLICAL LETTER.

The Pope's Encyclical Letter is addressed to his "venerable brethren, all the patriarchs, primates, archbishops, and bishops, in communion with the Apostolic See," and is dated from St. Peter's, Rome, "December 8, 1864, the tenth anniversary of the definition of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary, the Mother of God." In this document Pius IX. reminds the prelates that his predecessors have never failed to state and condemn the errors against the fundamental principles of religion spread throughout society, and in particular against the Roman Catholic Church. He adds that from the commencement of his pontificate he has invariably rebuked these errors in his Allocutions delivered at the Consistories, and in his frequent Encyclical Letters to the bishops. Seeing, therefore, that errors and false opinions are constantly upon the increase in religious and lay society, the Pope declares that he addresses himself to the bishops upon the present occasion to excite their zeal to confute error, and to arrest the evil which false ideas of religion, philosophy, and politics inflict upon the modern world.

The Encyclical Letter then proceeds to enunciate the gravest errors which must first be confuted. These are stated as the opinions of those who say that civil progress requires society to be governed without reference to religion, or without any difference being made between the true faith and heresy; that liberty of conscience and of public worship are essential in a well-organised Government; that the will of the people, as displayed by public opinion or by other means, constitutes a supreme law and a true right, and that accomplished facts in political affairs are to be regarded as rightfully in force; that religious orders are not entitled to exist, and ought, consequently, to be suppressed; that family society is dependent solely upon civil law, so that the Government has the exclusive right of regulating the relations between parents and children, and of directing instruction and education; that the clergy should not be permitted to take part in public instruction, because they are opposed to progress. The Pope further condemns the opinions of those who hold that the laws of the Church cannot have binding force unless they are promulgated by the civil authority; that excommunications pronounced against usurpers of the rights and property of the Church are an abuse; that the Church has not the right of punishing those who violate her laws; that the ecclesiastical power is not by divine right distinct from, and independent of, the civil power; that obedience may conscientiously be refused to those decrees and decisions of the Holy See which do not affect points of faith. All these opinions, and several others, are rebuked, proscribed, and condemned. In the latter part of his letter the Pope proclaims a jubilee, granting "to each and all of the faithful of both sexes, throughout the universe, a plenary indulgence during one month, up to the end of the year 1865."

The text of that part of the Encyclical which refers to liberty of conscience is as follows:—

As you are well aware, venerable brethren, there are a great number of men in the present day who, without making any distinction between true religion and heresy, . . . and contrary to the teaching of the Holy Scriptures, of the Church, and of the Fathers, do not hesitate to affirm, "that the best condition of society is that in which the power of the laity is not compelled to inflict the penalties of law upon violators of the Catholic religion, unless required by the considerations of public safety." Actuated by an idea of social government so absolutely false, they do not hesitate further to propagate the erroneous opinion, very hurtful to the safety of the Catholic Church and of souls, and termed delirium by our predecessor, Gregory XVI., of excellent memory—viz., liberty of conscience and of worship is the right of every man—a right which ought to be proclaimed and established by law in every well-constituted state, and that citizens are entitled to make known and declare, with a liberty which neither the ecclesiastical nor the civil authority can limit, their convictions, of whatever kind, either by word of mouth or through the press, or by other means.

Appended to the Encyclical is a formidable "catalogue of errors," consisting of eighty propositions. It embraces errors of "Pantheism, Naturalism, and Absolute Rationalism;" the second list is headed "Moderate Rationalism." These two embrace the ordinary infidel opinions of the day; the third catalogue of pestilent notions relates to "Indifferentism, Toleration," and is as follows:—

That every man is free to embrace and profess the religion he shall believe true, guided by the light of reason.

That men who have embraced any religion may find and obtain eternal salvation.

That the eternal salvation of all who have never been in the true Church of Christ may at least be hoped for.

That Protestantism is nothing more than another form of the same true religion, in which it is possible to be equally pleasing to God as in the Catholic Church.

In Section IV. are lumped together Socialism, Communism, Clandestine Societies, Biblical Societies, and Clerico-Liberal Societies, of which the world is simply reminded that "pests of this description" have been frequently rebuked in the severest terms in various of the Pope's former Encyclical Letters and Allocutions. Then follows "Errors respecting the Church and her Rights," among which are—

That the Church has not the power of availing herself of force, or any direct or indirect temporal power.

That the Roman pontiffs and œcumenical councils have exceeded the limits of their power, have usurped the rights of princes, and have even committed errors in defining matters relating to dogma and morals.

That in addition to the authority inherent in the Episcopate, further temporal power is granted to it by the civil power either expressly or tacitly, but on that account also revocable by the civil power whenever it pleases.

That the ministers of the Church and the Roman pontiff ought to be absolutely excluded from all charge and dominion over temporal affairs.

That bishops have not the right of promulgating their Apostolical letters without the sanction of the Government.

That ecclesiastical jurisdiction for temporal lawsuits, whether civil or criminal, of the clergy should be abolished, even without the consent and against the desire of the Holy See.

Section VI. is headed, "Errors of Civil Society, as much in themselves as considered in their relations to the Church," one of which is—

That the most advantageous conditions of civil society require that popular schools open without distinction to all children of the people, and public establishments destined to teach young people letters and good discipline, and to impart to them education, should be freed from all ecclesiastical authority and interference, and should be fully subjected to the civil and political power for the teaching of matters and opinions common to the times.

Section VII. consists of "Errors in Natural and Christian Morals." Section VIII. enumerates the "Errors as to Christian Marriage," the first of which is not to believe that it is a sacrament. The ninth section of contains the following two "Errors of the Civil Power of the Sovereign

That the children of the Christian Church are not agreed upon the equality of the temporal with the spiritual power.

That the cessation of the temporal power which the Apostolic See is based, tends to the happiness and liberty of Lastly comes a tenth section, he referring to Modern Liberalism," as follows:—

That in the present day it is no longer that the Catholic religion shall be the only religion of the State, to the exclusion of other modes of worship.

That it has been wisely provided in some countries called Catholic, that they shall enjoy the free exercise of their religion.

That it is false that the civil liturgy is a mode of worship, and the full power of the State is not to be used to compel and their thoughts, conduce to corrupt the minds of the people and to the prevalence of the evil of indifference.

The last error of all, which is the most demned, is the idea—

That the Roman Pontiff can and should conciliate himself to and agree with modern liberalism, and modern civilisation.

GERMANY.

Frankfort, January 15, 1865.

NO LIGHT IN OUR POLITICS.

No light has yet come to dissipate the darkness of our German politics. Diplomatic transactions between Prussia and Austria, and between these two powers and the Germanic Confederation, on the subject of the Duchies, appear as far as ever from coming to any result. Nevertheless, one thing has come to light—namely, the annexation proclivities of Herr von Bismark. I referred you, in my last letter, to the idea circulated by some Prussian journals, of searching among the old dusty parchments of the sixteenth century for the titles of the House of Hohenzollern to the possession of Holstein. What at first seemed to be a joke of the Ministerial press, has assumed the proportions of a serious reality. The Crown lawyers are actually engaged in rummaging the archives of the kingdom, with a view to discover the titles in question. At any other time, this transaction would have been simply ridiculous; but at present it has made known serious designs, supported by the Prussian battalions which occupy the Duchies. Who does not perceive the dangerous complications which may spring out of this for the whole of Germany?

THE ENCYCLICAL FROM ROME.

But the politico-religious event of the month, in Germany, as in all Europe, is the new Encyclical of Pope Pius IX. In a country where almost all the States are of a mixed character in regard to religion, and have concordats with the Catholic Church, this manifesto of Pius IX., however it may be, has produced a real shock of surprise. Austria, which was still in the meshes of its Concordat, and whose most despotic clauses exceeded what was tolerated by the incredible pretensions of the Bishop of Rome. There also the Government will be forced to choose between the old Concordat and this charter of the Pope, which denies all its principles, and annuls all its liberties—political and religious. Hitherto, the Cabinet has maintained a prudent silence, and the press has not been so reserved, as to demand the annulling of the Concordat, as well as the maintenance and extension of the forms of liberty. People are all expecting to see the newly-assembled Reichstag demanding from the Ministry the annulment of its intentions, and energetical measures for the independence of the State, Pope's pretensions would reduce to servitude, neither more nor less than if we had been still in the age of an Innocent III. or a Hildebrand. As to other states, such as Bavaria and the Grand Duchy of Baden, which are already in conflict with the Roman Court, resistance will not tarry, and it will be energetic. What will Prussia do? Nobody knows yet, but in the meantime, observe one of the strangest phenomena which the Papal Encyclical has produced in any country: it is that a Protestant journal, one of the most valorous champions of the policy of Herr von Bismark, and which at the same time pretends to be the most zealous defender of Christianity in Germany—in one word, the Kreuzzeitung—shows itself in touching harmony of principle with the Roman Encyclical. This journal makes, it is true, some reserves in favour of the Protestant Church, but when the question is the condemnation, as anti-Christian, of progress, public liberties in Church and State, and all the great principles upon which modern society reposes, the Berlin journal chimes in with the anathemas of Rome. Catholic Ultramontaniam is to be understood, but Protestant Ultramontaniam is a monstrosity which inflicts more injury upon the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and upon the doctrines of the Reformation, than all the negations of Rationalism. And when we reflect that this paper is the organ of a numerous and powerful party among the nobility, in the army, and at Court, we imagine with horror what dangerous crises Prussia will have yet to pass through, that she may see harmony spring up again between the parties who destroy it. For, in fine, to make her retrograde towards the middle ages is a thing impossible to be hoped for, even by the most blind.

Only to consider the Encyclical from a religious and ecclesiastical point of view, it is indeed all that is most adapted to gladden the most zealous enemies of the Papacy, for no event can contribute more powerfully to hasten its ruin. Nothing supplies a better proof of this than the painful embarrassment into which this foolish manifesto has thrown sincere Catholics. And if it is so in all the mixed populations of Europe, where liberal ideas have made some progress, what will it be in Italy itself, to which there remains henceforth no other alternative than to renounce one's country or the Papacy?

A CATHOLIC EXCOMMUNICATION.

The antiquated ideas of a haughty theocracy, destitute of humanity, which have inspired the Encyclical, still dominate only too much in all those parts of the Church of Rome which show that they are submissive to this sombre Ultramontane power. The feelings of all the moderate Catholics of the south of Germany have recently been painfully shocked by a solemn excommunication which has taken place at Friburg, in the Grand Duchy of Baden. Without any regard to religious passions, already so excited in this country by the conflict between Government and the Roman Court, the Bishop of Friburg has publicly proclaimed the excommunication of a respected man of learning, the author of sundry much-esteemed school-books—Professor Beck. What was his crime? That of marrying. Although he had received priestly ordination in his youth, Professor Beck discharged no ecclesiastical function, but had withdrawn for long years in order to devote himself entirely to teaching in his professorship. But it was necessary, to give prominence to the Popish idea of the indelible character of the priesthood—it was necessary, above all, to show the incompatibility of that condition with the holy state of matrimony; and to effect this, the Ultramontane Bishop of Friburg has not shrunk from the scandal of a scene calculated to stigmatise the life of an honourable man, and to irritate against their Church multitudes of sincere Catholics who are not fanatics. Thus it is that, in every way, an institution which is destined to perish, itself labours with its own hands for its ruin.

SUPPRESSION OF CONVENTS IN POLAND.

If we thus deplore the vagaries of Catholicism, and if we repudiate them from conviction, in the name of the Word of God, this will nevertheless not prevent us from recognising what there is of true and good in this Church, nor from sympathising deeply with the sufferings of its members, when, in their turn, they become the victims of despotism. Such are the feelings which have been awakened in us by the secularisation in Poland of seventy-one convents of men, and four cloisters for women, containing altogether 318 persons; and, above all, by the suppression of thirty-nine other convents, containing altogether 674 persons, for the reason, true or false, that these establishments had taken part in the insurrection. That which provokes indignation, is the brutal manner in which this measure has been executed. Let any one judge by the following communication, dated November 28th, from Warsaw: "For some days past every thing had been prepared, and the military officers had received orders to hold themselves in readiness, when yesterday there came by telegraph a new order to proceed to execution on the night of the 27th to the 28th, at midnight, conformably to instructions received. This is how the affair was transacted: At the precise hour indicated, a colonel, accompanied by a detachment of troops, presented himself at each of the convents indicated, caused the monks to assemble, and communicated to them the order to stand in readiness to set out by the road at half-past four A.M., to go out of the country. About two o'clock the execution was accomplished in all the city, and probably at the same time in all the kingdom. The convents remained occupied by the troops, and at half-past four those who lived in them had to enter vehicles, which took them, under a strong escort, to the railway, where the Adjutant-General Korff attended to preside over their departure. Each of the exiles received 150 roubles (23*l.* 15*s.*) for his journey. Everything passed over in the greatest silence. No one knows yet where they have been taken to. It is supposed that they will disperse themselves over France and Italy." I suppress all the reflections which these Muscovite proceedings inevitably inspire.

A THANKSGIVING SERVICE IN PRUSSIA.

By a letter to his Minister for Worship, of the date of November 20th, the King of Prussia ordered in all the churches of the kingdom a service of thanksgiving for the victory of the allied armies in the Duchies, and for the ratification of the treaty of peace. "I will," says William I., "that there should be publicly rendered thanks to God Almighty for the gracious aid which He has vouchsafed to our arms, and that glory be given to the Lord, to whom alone it belongs. I determine, therefore, that on Sunday, December 18th, the day when my victorious troops shall return to their garrison, a solemn service of thanksgiving should be celebrated in all the churches of the country," &c. No one can but approve the sentiments of piety which prompted this measure and these words. But is there not a strange anomaly in the relations of the Church and State, in which the King says "I will," when the question is of an act of gratitude and admiration by a whole people towards God? One asks if these sentiments of the heart are commanded. I could understand an invitation or an exhortation, but not a command.

THE RELIGIOUS CONFLICT IN THE GRAND DUCHY OF BADEN.

The religious agitation provoked by the work of Dr. Schenkel, of Heidelberg, upon the life of Jesus, is not yet pacified; on the contrary, it extends far beyond the limits of the Grand Duchy of Baden, by means of divers protestations against the measures taken by the ecclesiastical authorities of that province, and addresses of sympathy with the pastors of the Evangelical party. In one of these addresses, signed by more than fifty pastors and professors of theology at Berlin, we read, among others, these words: "Since you have maintained the fight, which was imposed upon you by your holy office, against the spirit of error which denies Jesus Christ come in the flesh, we have been with you in spirit, in faith, and in prayer. We confess, with you, Him who, in virtue of His eternal Divinity, has given himself for us, has truly risen from the dead as Lord and Christ, has ascended unto heaven, and sits at the right hand of God the Father, from whence He shall come in His glory, to judge the living and the dead, and whose kingdom shall have no end. We reject, with you, the erroneous doctrines which Dr. Schenkel has not feared to publish in his book, in contradiction to the faith of all Christendom—a scandal to our Evangelical Church and your parishes. We deplore, with you, that a man who has rejected the divine authority of the Holy Scriptures should be maintained in the important post of principal of a seminary, and leader of your future ministers. Penetrated with inward and brotherly sympathy for you in your conflicts and trials, we cry out to you, 'Watch, stand fast in the faith, quit you like men, be strong.' (1 Cor. xvi. 13.) Our faith is the victory that overcometh the world; and He who is for you is stronger than the world." Among the subscribers to this document are several of the most justly celebrated names in theology and the Church in Prussia.

Even the Chief Ecclesiastical Council of the kingdom, to which divers addresses or protests of this kind had been communicated, has believed itself called upon thereby to say what it thinks about the conflict in the Baden Church. Without arrogating to itself the right to pronounce any judgment upon the measures officially taken hitherto by the ecclesiastical authorities of the Grand Duchy, the Council at Berlin allows to be clearly seen what is its conviction, expressed in a letter to the consistories of the kingdom. "The struggle which as originated in the Grand Duchy of Baden," says the Council, "concerns the most precious possessions of the Church Evangelical, and it may assume dimensions which will extend far beyond the limits of the National Church; it concerns the foundations of the Christian faith, the authority of the New Testament, and also the fundamental truths and constituent acts of salvation with which the Lutheran Church must stand or fall. It is therefore not without pain and fear that we have seen these troubles invade one of the churches of our communion, for which we offer our prayers to God. Yet we are not in doubt as to the issue of this conflict; we have the assurance of seeing peace renewed there by the renovation of faith in the only Son of God, in His miraculous birth, in His divinity, in His death for the redemption of the world, in His resurrection, and in His return to glory."

It appears from these different testimonies and many others which we could yet quote, that if the Rationalism of sundry schools makes great havoc in the Protestant Churches of Germany, faith in the Son of the living God, and in the Gospel of His grace, still remains as the corner stone of these Churches.

SWEDEN.

RELIGIOUS AND GENERAL PROGRESS.

Christianstadt and Vinslöf,
Nov. 13, 1864.

It has pained me to see that no one amongst your Swedish correspondents has, during this whole year, sent you any tidings from Sweden, although one fruit after another has, in my beloved fatherland, been plucked from the tree of life, which is Jesus Christ. The Word of God continues uninterruptedly to bear new blossoms and new fruits in our neighbourhood.

The Evangelical National Society in Stockholm stands undoubtedly first amongst the instrumentalities for diffusing the truth of God. At the head of that society we find such men as Elmblad and Rosenius, both of them highly distinguished as preachers and authors. This institution has formerly confined its labours to the Inner Mission, by the publication of good books and the employment of godly colporteurs. Now, however, it has established a large school, for training missionaries to the heathen, under the charge of the pious and gifted Rudin.

Amongst lesser associations, the Christianstadt Tract Society, in my neighbourhood, pursues its work in the south of Sweden with such blessing. The annual meetings are regularly held in the parish of Vinslöf, generally on a hill-side, where from two to three thousand assemble—a wonderful sight for the many travellers who pass along the road close by. We rejoiced to see at our meeting this year my dear friend, the Rev. Professor J. Lumsden, Principal of the Free Church College in Aberdeen.*

Similar societies are found in Helsingborg, Jönköping, Westerwik, Örebro, and other places, and the Bible, it may be said, is in every dwelling throughout our country. That the Word of God is not amongst us in vain is shown by daily evidences, in the many conversions which take place, and in other remarkable events. Never before have we heard of so many large legacies for religious purposes. A Mr. Carlson, a merchant, died recently, in Göteborg, leaving about 15,000*l.* for pious uses. Another evidence appears in the fact that new laws, more favourable to Christianity, are passed continually by the State. Recently the legal necessity for approaching the Lord's Table has been done away. Formerly every one holding office under Government was required to receive the sacrament at least once a-year, and no witness could have his testimony received unless he had been to the Lord's Table within the year. In these days Royal permission, desired by the Diet, has been granted to postpone baptism for six weeks after the birth of the child, and children may be baptized at home. Is there not in this an indication that the first gracious influences of the Holy Spirit are not necessarily connected as to time with water baptism? (Acts x. 47.) Improved laws for our schools are issued, the higher as well as the

* It was the privilege of the translator of Dr. Bergman's letter to be present at the meeting of this society in 1859, and the scene can never pass from his memory. A revision of the rules was under discussion, and a large gathering, in a most singular place of meeting, was presided over by the gifted and ever-honoured Pastor Hammar. The day being hot, and the place crowded, the greater number were discussing the rules in their shirt-sleeves. The information was obtained that the building had been a distillery, but when the Lord converted the distiller, he turned the place into a house of prayer. The crowd assembled at the church in the evening was such, that one-half could not get inside; one of the windows was removed, and standing on the sill, the visitor was enabled to address two congregations, one inside the church, and another equally large outside. A morning service, intended to be held in the distillery, had to be removed to the hill-side, and the hours spent there can never be forgotten.—GEORGE SCOTT.

common, and it will be hard to find a Swedish man or woman who cannot read, write, and cipher. The children of the peasantry are not only instructed in religion, history, and geography, but also in physical science. Our women are now employed as school-mistresses, organists, and at telegraph stations, &c. Much has of late years been done for the advancement of the female sex, and now their right of inheritance is equal with that of the other sex, and they attain their majority at the age of twenty-five. A new institution amongst us is the Landsting, or provincial representation, sending out school inspectors within the province. The Landsting for Christianstadt has shown great zeal in establishing industrial schools for the daughters of the peasants. Our new communal law operates most beneficially in training our people to self-government. The new project of law for our representation, prepared by the Government, by which our four Houses (Nobles, Clergy, Burgesses, and Yeomen) will be swept away, and a general election of members of the Legislature substituted, will be definitely settled at the Diet of 1865, and as it seems, adopted. The arming of the people, in defence of the nation, extends rapidly, and our Rifle Volunteers are very numerous, whilst the youth are put through military exercises at the schools. The union of Sweden and Norway receives increasing strength, from growing mutual confidence. A general jubilee was held in all our churches on the 4th November, in celebration of that union in 1814, and the fifty peaceful years which have followed. Many earnest words with reference to our brethren in Denmark and Finland were uttered on that day. Scandinavianism advances in the hearts of the people, and our Royal house is beloved beyond all description. The King surrounds himself with counsellors of distinguished character and ability.

Amongst new laws I ought to name the Criminal Code, perhaps one of the most humane and Christian in the whole world. Our banking laws are also greatly improved, and promote competition for the public good, and freehold right to a very small portion of land has greatly rejoiced and encouraged the poor. Our notice of progress must, of course, include our railways. We can now proceed by railway from Göteborg to Stockholm, and from Stockholm to Malmö. Steamboats in great numbers cover our waters, and steam-power is more and more used by our tourists. The extensive morasses in are being drained and cultivated. Agriculture and architecture are being developed. New metallic mines are discovered and All this comes at once on our land, springing from on high, for we have also had unusually good harvests. Is not the Lord, and must we not clearly see the Lord is with a people who seek Amongst evidences of newly-awakened here, we must not forget the many churches reared. Ten or more many dilapidated churches might be seen in Sweden, but a different state of things obtains. In Skåne, the southern part of Sweden, seven new churches were consecrated on one day, the 6th November. Our talented bishop, Dr. Thomsen, issued a pastoral to the seven churches in the diocese of Lund, and suggested texts from the Bible to the seven churches in the Apocalypse, duty devolved on me of consecrating these churches.

It must not, however, be concealed that much evil reveals itself by the side of good. Unbelief raises its foul and malignant form among us with greater effrontery. A professor in Upsala has recently issued a popular pamphlet, costing only a few shillings, in which he boldly denies the existence of a devil and a hell. This publication, widely circulated, awakens much attention. It has done much evil amongst the Murders and burglaries, which had been rare, appear again more frequently. The villain says, "Why should I be damned when there is no hell?" We need not be surprised that a host of inferior minds should put forth doctrines still more malignant, without referring to those who boldly defend infidelity, among whom we find some clergymen and schoolmasters whose errors the State Church fears to rebuke. As the law of a free press appears to be established in Sweden, they are all shielded by all political papers, the editors of which repeat what Grundtvig many years since in his pamphlet called clerical freedom, which he defines as that is to say, every clergyman shall be at liberty to interpret the Bible from his pulpit in accordance with his conscientious views, without being fettered by any received dogmatical or symbolical books. This is earnestly contended for in Germany, and I find in M'Cosh's paper, read at the Evangelical meeting at Edinburgh, that things are the same in England. Shall we, then, say with respect to all shall we despond? God forbid. We are afraid of free inquiry even in the field of religion; but, on the contrary, we fear good from it. Has not the Lord heaven and earth shall pass away, but shall not pass away? We are not, afraid either of Professor Boström's on Lilje's assaults, nor yet for the of a Strauss, a Renan, or a Schlegel, new discoveries of geologists. Their alarm us not; they rather stir up us a joyful anticipation. Some may used that we speak thus; but our will be explained by a simile taken a province of free inquiry in things

* It is an undeniable and a remarkable fact that, immediately following the great religious revivals in Sweden, the people seemed to wake up from the slumber of generations with reference to progress in other things. — G. S.

The more the positive pole in a pile becomes potentialised, precisely the amount of potentiality is commensurate to the negative pole. May there be something like this in the higher of religion? The more vehemently it is potentialised—that is to say, the more it courageously steps forward in its exertions for the spread of religion, identifying its positive character—the more decidedly and fearlessly must unbelief forward as negative Christianity. The sparks on the electrical machine; the positive spark is only a small reddish light, the negative radiation; the negative is still less—a white round spark. Each pole shines with a wonderful light, and operates with its full power, and we hear distinctly the great noise of each. But incomparably more are the phenomena if the two poles approach each other, however slowly, for ere they are prepared for the result we behold a powerful light burst forth, accompanied by an astounding sound—this is the great light and the thunder. May there not be something like this in the spiritual region? It may not be that when the positive and negative Bible and theology on the one side, cosmology, physical science, and history, on the other side—approach each other in a right way the truth itself shall break forth with a newness and power heretofore unknown? The voice of God in creation cannot be fundamentally at variance with the voice of God which speaks to us in the Bible, though for a time there may appear to be inconsistencies. In short, we believe that even negation is designed to lead to the truth; yea, that the evil one must be overcome by God and advance His purposes. Shall we therefore despond? God forbid.

We on the contrary look towards the future with a joyful hope, as long as God's Word is honoured. We are not afraid of clerical freedom, and cannot sympathise with the dejected. Dr. McCosh said in Edinburgh, "If things should come to such a pass as this, surely good men in every church would combine to sweep it off the face of the earth." With violence? Would this be right and good? If the clerical freedom spoken of by Grundtvig should hereafter triumph in England's, or any other land's, National Church, which is very improbable, shall we therefore conjure up the powers of darkness? Does not England at least possess religious liberty more largely than most other lands? May not men there have full liberty to confess any religious faith they please, and to unite with likeminded in religious communities? Cannot the spiritually-minded and the orthodox associate together? What is the State Church, carefully considered, but in great part a State institution, with officers and servants remunerated by the State? If the State should see it good and advisable to relax the confessional bond, and no longer require an oath in favour of symbolical books, which are, after all, only human productions, will no longer have handcuffed and hypocritical clergymen, but leave them at liberty, with the Bible as their foundation, to speak freely what they have to say, so long as they keep within the limits prescribed by common law, and pure Christianity may be proclaimed by its true witnesses—would not this be an approach to the primary all-conquering position in the world of the Christian Church? Is not this the most favourable condition for true and vital Christianity? Or can we regard the present state of things as better, when, at all events, strange doctrines are proclaimed from the pulpits of the National Church, by many in direct opposition to the confession they have sworn to uphold? Is not faith according to the Gospel a free act—yes, the most free on earth? And ought it not to remain so? Whilst, therefore, we thus in all humility protest against the utterance of the learned and gifted Professor from Belfast, if we have rightly understood it, we cannot deny ourselves the gratification of citing the great Luther's words addressed to the zealous Lutherans in Wittenburg, who desired with violence to assail the Popish customs and institutions: "With the weakness of the weak we must have patience. Because I cannot instil faith into the heart, I cannot and will not force any thereto, for it is God alone who can make faith live in the heart. The result of constraint by man can only be a mockery, mere externalism, aping and carnal ordinance, whereof come dissimulation and hypocrisy, for there is no heart there, no faith, no love. We must take captive the hearts of men, which takes place when we urge God's Word, preach the Gospel, making known to men their errors. He who will come may come, and he who will not, may let it alone. After this manner the Word will to-day fall into one heart, to-morrow into another, and they will go and themselves fall away from Popery. Thus has God wrought more by His Word than if you and I and the whole world upset all authority. For by the Word God takes possession of the heart, and thus the whole man is won, and soon must all else fall to pieces and vanish. We must have respect to this, and before everything preach, that faith will not be imprisoned and bound. Nothing will be effected by your storming and disturbance; this you shall see. And if you persevere in this course, and refuse to be guided, then know that I Luther will not go with you; this I say plainly. This is the sum of the whole: I will preach, I will speak, I will write; but coerce, force with violence, I will not, for faith is allured willingly without constraint. Take me for an example; I have set myself against indulgences and all Popery, but never with violence. I have urged God's Word alone. This has, whilst I have slept myself, accomplished so much, that Popery has become weakened so greatly, that no prince or emperor has done the system such damage. I have done nothing; the Word has done it all. If I had chosen to go forward with force, a fearful baptism of blood would have come over Germany; yea, even in Worms I could have brought about a scene in which the Emperor himself would not have been safe. But what would this have been! It would have been an exhibition of folly and madness. What do you suppose the devil thinks when we seek to advance our object with tumult! Ah, he sits there in hell and thinks: These fools, how shall they play their part in this movement? But he has great trouble if we urge the Word alone, allowing it to do its own work. This is omnipotent, this takes hearts captive, and when they are seized all old things must soon fall down of themselves."

We have recently read in the newspapers of the bloody riots in Belfast and Geneva, arising in the former place from the camp of old Romish orthodoxy, and in the latter from that of the new philosophy. We ask, is this—as also the incursion of Germany into Denmark—the fruit of the enlightenment of the nineteenth century? Has the negative as well as the positive theology no higher aim in the contest than broils and riots? Have they no foreboding as yet of the higher destiny which both have in relation to future questions! Ought not both—the positive and the negative theology—instead of sparkling and crackling each for itself, like the positive and negative pole in the galvanic pile, rather to begin at last to think of approaching each other in friendliness, and thus co-operate for the further and higher development in the world of the true light? For this we wait with expectation.—Yours in Christian love,

CARL BERGMAN.

TURKEY.

Constantinople, January 2, 1865.

THE WEEK OF UNITED PRAYER.

The appointed week of prayer is observed by Protestants all through Turkey. I have just come from a public meeting held in the Chapel of the Dutch Embassy in Pera, under the auspices of the Constantinople Branch of the Evangelical Alliance. All the native Protestant churches in this city, and so far as I know, throughout the empire, have public religious meetings during the week. The meeting this morning was fully attended, in spite of the mud and rain. Rev. Dr. Pfander, of the Church Missionary Society, presided; Dr. Koelle and Rev. Mr. Weakley, of the same society; Rev. Dr. Thomson, of the British and Foreign Bible Society; Rev. Dr.

Hamlin, President of Robert College; Rev. Mr. Christie, of the Church of Scotland; Rev. Mr. Long, of the American Methodist Church; Rev. Dr. Riggs, and Rev. Mr. Washburn, of the American Board—took part in the exercises, and the meeting was in every respect a most happy illustration of practical Christian unity and Christian sympathy among those of different nationalities and different branches of the one true Church.

Allusion was made at the meeting to the trying scenes through which we have passed during the year 1864, and the opinion was expressed that if the liberal instincts of England and Russell were properly supported by the Christian sentiment of England, these precautions might prove the means of establishing religious liberty in Turkey upon a firm basis than ever before. It is a most noticeable fact that now, in the absence of Sir Henry Bulwer, the whole influence of the British Embassy is thrown into the right scale. Mr. Stuart, the Chargé d'Affaires, has now the esteem and respect of all, and has manifested the same readiness to defend religious liberty which characterised the predecessors of Sir Henry. The friends of Turkey can ask nothing better than a continuance of the present state of things.

ATTACK UPON THE ARMENIAN PROTESTANTS OF MURAD TCHAI.

Murad Tchai, situated not far from the City of Billijuk, was the scene, last month, of some extraordinary proceedings on the part of the pasha of that province. For some eight years Protestant colporteurs have been in the habit of visiting this town and selling Protestant books. For five or six years there have been a few persons there who held Evangelical principles. About a year ago the eldest of these was beaten to death by a Turk in a neighbouring village, in whose employ he was, because he spent too much time in reading the Bible. The others have not been seriously molested, as Evangelical sentiments were gradually being adopted by many in the place, as they read the Scriptures. About a month ago a number of men in the village sent a petition to the Protestant pastor of the neighbouring city of Billijuk to come and instruct them. With the consent of his church, he went for a short time, and was then replaced by another Protestant preacher in the employ of the American Board. This man found about 200 persons ready to listen to his instructions, and they met for worship in a house which they had themselves hired for this purpose. The Armenian priest of the town is known through all that region as the "mad priest," and he seems to have found means to induce the Turkish pasha of the province to unite with him in crushing out this new movement in favour of Evangelical truth.

Two days after the arrival of the preacher at Murad Tchai the pasha made his appearance, and immediately summoned him to his presence. His first effort was to entrap him into some expression which he might use against him. So he received him most graciously, seated him by his side, and begged him to be at ease, as he was himself also a Protestant at heart. Soon he took out from his bag one of Dr. Pfander's books on Mohammedanism, and told the preacher that he presumed he was familiar with them, and admired them as he did. The preacher knew nothing of these books, and avoided any compromising remarks; but the pasha finally told him that although he was glad to find him preaching Protestantism in Murad Tchai, he was then in a somewhat irregular way. He would take him off to the capital of the province, eight days distant, and furnish him with regular papers. The preacher protested that it was impossible for him to go, and asserted, what was very true, that his papers were the same that all other preachers in Turkey had, and consequently needed no change. The next day he was called again, and after cursing him in private, the pasha drove him out of his room and sent the mudir out to explain the case to the people assembled outside. The mudir declared in his speech that "the Sultan had discountenanced and cursed this Protestant faith, which was no longer to be tolerated, but that, as they saw, the more you put these people down, the more troubles they made." Two days later the pasha left the town, taking with him the preacher, in charge of four police officers, although the poor man was sick and altogether unfit for the journey. He carried him to Boly, some eight days distant, and there he still remains. Information of this outrage was telegraphed to Rev. Mr. Greene, of Broosa, who immediately came on to Constantinople to state the case here.

Mr. Stuart, Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires, was appealed to, and without any delay, he brought the case before the Porte—so effectually, that Aali Pasha promised to order the man's release that day by telegraph. A letter received to-day informs us that eight days later this order either had not been received or had not been obeyed. At that date the poor man was still detained in Boly, suffering from cold, exposure, and ill health, without any friends, or any apparent prospect of release. This information has been communicated to Mr. Stuart, and I am most happy to be able to say that I have no doubt that immediate steps will be taken to secure the liberty of the preacher and the rights of the Protestants at Murad Tchai. The whole case, especially in the minutiae, which I have not time to report in full, is an admirable specimen of Turkish justice. If there had been no interference on the part of the English Embassy, the poor preacher might have died in prison, the pasha would have enjoyed his bribe in peace, and the "mad priest" would have succeeded in rooting out all Protestantism from his flock. A year ago, even worse cases excited no interest at the British Embassy. The Turkish Government in Constantinople is not always to be blamed for such things, because often it never hears of them, or hears only from natives, whose statements excite no interest.

RETURN OF THE EXILED CONVERT, AHMED.

Ahmed of Cæsarea, who was arrested here in July, imprisoned three months, then exiled to Rodosto, arrested there, released and sent to Adrianople, has now returned to Constantinople. His exile proved to be, like the exile of the early Christians, a means of spreading abroad more widely the knowledge of the truth. It was a missionary tour, in fact, under the direction of the Government, which the missionaries would have deemed too dangerous to be practicable. Since his return to Constantinople, he has visited the Minister of Police and his former companions in prison. He goes everywhere about the city as before, and has met with not the slightest insult or molestation from any one. His imprisonment and exile seem rather to have strengthened his faith, and increased his zeal. The Governor of Rodosto, who arrested him there, has been removed from office; but whether for this or some other reason, I cannot say. The Governor of Adrianople, who treated Ahmed so well, died the day after he left—and it is a little remarkable that this is the same man who, in Lord Stratford's day, caused the arrest and execution of the Greek who, after becoming a Moselm, again returned to Christianity. He seemed to have learned a lesson at that time which he never forgot.

COLPORTAGE NOT YET ALLOWED IN EUROPEAN TURKEY.

I regret to state that, in spite of the distinct and emphatic instructions of Earl Russell, the Turkish authorities still refuse to permit the sale of the Bible in large portions of European Turkey. They seem to be under the impression that these provinces are in a state bordering on insurrection, and a real reign of terror prevails in many places. In Bulgaria this results from the attempts which the Bulgarians have made to free themselves from the tyranny of the Greek Church. Turkish officials are either leagued with Greek ecclesiastics or imposed upon by their representations. If the Turks understood their own interests, they would encourage rather than crush out this popular movement among the Bulgarians, who are probably the most loyal of all the Christian subjects of Turkey. As things now go, they will soon come to associate the Turks and Greeks together, hate them equally, and seek to escape at once from the power. At present, however, there is no reason why the Turks should fear any outbreak. It is really only an invention of the Government to keep out the light as far as possible. The Turks should be made to feel that they are not to be shut out from this peculiar means. In Albania other intrigues, especially Catholic intrigue, are at work to prevent the sale of Scriptures, and in Constantinople, the agent of the London Foreign Bible Society found only failure where he was allowed to sell the Bible in the Greek language. Every effort is now being made by Rev. Dr. Thomson to remove these obstacles, and I think he will be successful in the end, in spite of the all powerful Catholic influence against him.

LATE ATTACKS UPON THE PROTESTANT MISSIONARIES IN TURKEY.

The Constantinople correspondent of the London Times, in a late letter, which is reprinted by the official organ of the Government in this city, says:—

It would appear, as the question arises, that the calm and self-denying attitude should rule the conduct of such a movement. It has made room for an eager and burning desire to obtain redress and satisfaction before and in a worldly sense, for injuries. If such a course is persevered in, it will be subject with such acrimony and animosity as eventually produce a political crisis in the country—the overthrow of the Ministry now in power, and place the reins of Government in the hands of that reactionary and fanatical party which is hostile to the Christian religion and its apostles. They will not receive the indulgence and liberty at present afforded to all creeds in this country. I have pointed out from the first the danger of such an emergency, and the dangers which reach me, and which are acquiesced in, prove that I was not mistaken in my estimate of the probable effects of such a movement. On the other hand, if the mission is any real and well-founded cause of grievance, ever considerations of prudence press upon the Government, it would have been the duty of Government and its representative in Constantinople to obtain redress for them; but not the loud complaints of the missionary which have been asserted that such a cause does not exist.

In the same spirit, the Lancet of last week contained a bitter attack upon Dr. Riggs and Rev. George W. Felt, of the American Mission, because they had written letters in reference to the mission which had been published in the Lancet, whereas it was none of their business. "Simply a quarrel between the missionaries and their Ambassador," would be a sufficient reply to these attacks. I say that the Times correspondent

Roman Catholic, and naturally cannot see what good is to come to Turkey from the efforts of Protestant missionaries; and as to the other article, to quote a remark made to me last week by an English banker here, "The Levant Herald, in pretending to represent English sentiment here, really represents the feeling of only a minority of two—the editor and Sir Henry Bulwer." I believe that personal feeling has had no influence upon the missionaries in their public statements. So far as I have observed, they have invariably passed over in silence every attack made upon them personally. If they have made public statements uncomplimentary to Sir Henry Bulwer personally, it was simply because it was impossible to speak of religious liberty and its violation in Turkey without alluding to the British Ambassador, who is supposed to be its authorised protector. It was because he had made official statements in reference to their work, and the events of last summer, which they knew to be untrue; it was because he had communicated to them and sanctioned a new definition of religious liberty and new rules of conduct which would have put an end at once to all missionary work in Turkey. Under these circumstances, they could not defend their own rights, their own work, the cause of religious liberty, or the rights of their native converts, without alluding to Sir Henry Bulwer. But they have confined their criticisms to this one point. They have made no reference to his private character nor to his other official acts. If they had not done all that they have, their work would have been at an end, and their converts would now be in prison or exile. The missionaries had no choice in the matter. They demand nothing but even-handed justice and an honest execution of the Hattihoumayoun. Could they demand anything less?

NEW LAW ON THE PRESS.

The public press in Turkey has hitherto been comparatively free, but a new law went into force on the 1st of this month, which is even more stringent and absurd than the law on the press now existing in France. Its provisions, if enforced, will reduce newspapers in Turkey to the necessity of confining themselves to official news and reports upon the state of weather. The penalties which it threatens are also very severe, consisting of heavy fines and imprisonments. This is certainly progress in the wrong direction. It touches the missionary work, in that it forbids all criticism upon any of the established religions in this country.

AUSTRALIA.

UNION OF PRESBYTERIANS IN NEW SOUTH WALES.

Sydney, New South Wales,
Nov. 18, 1864.

Having in May last written to correct the too sanguine impression that union was already accomplished between the divided sections of the Presbyterian Church in New South Wales, and to inform you that there was as yet only an agreement to unite, from which agreement no inconsiderable part of the Presbyterian community was excluded, I am bound to fulfil the cheerful duty of conveying the intelligence that a union has been consummated between two Synods, with some detached ministers, and that negotiations for the union of the other Synod, and all Presbyterians still unattached, with the Synod formed by the "Preliminary Union," are in a hopeful state of progress. To explain more particularly: The Synod of Australia, in connexion with the Established Church of Scotland; the Synod of Eastern Australia, holding the principles of the Free Church; and the Rev. A. Thomson, minister of the first, and then the only United Presbyterian congregation in this colony, agreed, in November, 1863, to unite upon a basis which had been under their consideration in conference for twelve months. That agreement remains in full force; but it will be necessary, before the union is consummated, to get a bill passed through the Legislature to protect the property now held by the Synod of Australia, which stands in a peculiar relation to the State here, as having been in receipt of State aid up to the time of the Act to prohibit grants of money for public worship. While discussing the terms of the proposed bill, the Synod of Eastern Australia and the Rev. A. Thomson repeatedly requested the Synod of Australia to consent to invite the third Synod—the Synod of New South Wales and some detached ministers—to the conference. This the Synod of Australia refused to do. Between them and the most distinguished member of the Synod of New South Wales, Rev. Dr. Lang, there had been years of litigation. The decisions of the Privy Council and of the Court of Sessions had resulted in Dr. Lang's retaining the use of the Scots' Church, Sydney, and in the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland directing the Presbytery of Irvine to rescind a sentence they had passed against Dr. Lang at the instigation of the Synod of Australia. The painful memories of these events, and of protests and public appeals on each side, appear to have made some members of the Synod of Australia unwilling to accede to the proposed invitation of the Synod of New South Wales to conference. Thus matters stood eight days ago. But it occurred to some members of the Synod of Eastern Australia, and those who rejoice in what has been accomplished are disposed to regard it as a gracious interposition of the great Head of the Church to guide His waiting servants out of perplexity, that it would be practicable for them, as a Synod, to confer at once with those who had hitherto been excluded from conference, and to unite with them without delay on the basis which had been pondered with the utmost care for two years by all who were interested in Presbyterian Union. Accordingly, on Thursday, the 10th of this month, the two Synods met in conference. At their second conference, on Friday, the 11th, they agreed to unite on the long-considered basis, and fixed Tuesday, the 15th, for the consummation of the union, commonly called among us "The Preliminary Union," inasmuch as all who have entered it hope and expect that it will hasten on the comprehensive union of all Presbyterians in the colony. And since the formation of the new body, called "The General Synod of the Presbyterian Church in New South Wales," the parties to the original conference—those who have been in negotiation ever since November, 1862—have unanimously agreed to treat with the new Synod on the same footing as the late Synod of Eastern Australia. At the beginning of last week there were three Presbyterian Synods, each professedly having charge of the whole colony, and to some extent wasting their energies in counteractive efforts; and one of these was excluded from the conference on union. Now there are but two Synods in the colony; and these two are parties to a conference in which mutual consideration and unanimity on all important points prevail. As soon as the new Parliament have met and passed the necessary bill, it is probable that the two Synods will be summoned to meet and consummate the comprehensive union.

The proceedings at the consummation of the Preliminary Union on Tuesday evening were deeply interesting. The members of the two Synods who were present in Sydney met in St. George's Church. Acts and declarations—the last acts of the Synods about to lose their distinctive character in one united body—were read by their respective clerks. The Moderators, the Rev. Dr. Lang and the Rev. J. Kinross, signed the basis, gave one another the right hand of fellowship, and sat down side by side, as joint presidents of the meeting. These two then proposed and seconded, as Moderator of the new Synod, "The General Synod of the Presbyterian Church in New South Wales," the Rev. A. C. Geikie, formerly of Canada, now of Bowenfels, in this colony, who was unanimously chosen. Appropriate addresses were given by the three ministers last named, and praise and prayer suited to the auspicious occasion were offered to the God of peace and love.

There is one drawback to the joy of this event. Five ministers of the Synod of Eastern Australia objected, not to the parties with whom the union was effected, but to one portion of the terms of union, which seemed to them to involve some "connivance with the Erastianism of the Established Church of Scotland." The Free Church of Scotland has approved the basis without perceiving this defect. And most of the Free Churchmen here are unable to discern the slightest taint of Erastianism in the basis, or in any of the conditions of union. There is, both in the new body and in the other parties to a general conference, a sincere and earnest desire to remove all obstacles from the way of these separated brethren. They departed by their own protest; nothing has been done to exclude them. Respect is entertained by those who most decidedly differ from them for their conscientiousness; and it is fully expected that their scruples may be obviated, when once the union of the two Synods is accomplished, by such modifications of the conditions of union as will meet all the requirements of their consciences.

Meanwhile, it is thankfully acknowledged that very much has been gained for the cause of Christ and the good of souls in this land, as far as they are affected by the vigor and prosperity of the Presbyterian denomination.

BRITISH COLUMBIA.

TRIUMPHS OF THE GOSPEL AMONG THE TSIMSHEAN INDIANS.

We have repeatedly given cursory notices of the work carried on in the Far West of the British Empire, with such manifest tokens of the Divine approval, by Mr. Duncan, one of the agents of the Church Missionary Society. The last number of the Church Missionary Intelligencer enables us to trace that work from its origin to the present time. It furnishes one of the most remarkable and gratifying instances with which we have ever met of the power of the Gospel, in the hands of a devoted Christian man, to raise a horde of quarrelsome savages from the utmost depths of heathen degradation to the dignity of civilised men and women, and the moral elevation of Christians.

Mr. William Duncan, the earliest missionary to the Indians of the British territories on the Pacific, first performed Divine service among them, at Fort Simpson, on October 11, 1857, and two days afterwards opened a school. His proceedings were carefully observed, his school being visited by chiefs and others, who, when he and his pupils knelt in prayer, regarded them with serious looks, and expressed their approval by the invariable "Ahm, Ahm." But still, however, without any diminution, the old heathen scenes of murder continued to be perpetrated. With the new year, he commenced his labours amongst the Indians without the Fort, and, in the hope of winning their confidence and esteem, decided on visiting them from house to house. "I confess," he says, "that cluster after cluster of these half-naked and painted savages was, to my unaccustomed eyes, very alarming; but the reception I met with was truly wonderful and encouraging. Some would not be content until I took the chief place at the fire. My inquiries after the sick were always followed by anxious glances and deep sighs; a kind of solemn awe would spread itself at once."

After two years his work began to tell. He was enabled to address them in their own tongue, and his school was filled with children and adults; and now opposition commenced. The medicine-men resolved that the school should be closed while their rites lasted. They tried to intimidate the missionary, but in vain. "The Lord," says Mr. Duncan, "enabled me to stand calm, and without the slightest fear to address them in their own tongue with far more fluency than I could have imagined possible." In vain the head chief, who was the leader of the medicine-men, raised his voice, stamped on the floor, and stormed furiously; he did not succeed. In these struggles the missionary's life was imperilled, a ferocious savage, called Legaie, attempting to kill him. The people around watched to see whether he would be intimidated, and shrink from the work. He became more bold.

I have been [he observes] for some time desiring to speak to the cannibal chief. To-day the opportunity was afforded me, and I had some talk with him. This man heads the most degrading superstition this people have got; but he is a young man, and has a noble look. It will be a hard struggle if he ever sets himself to escape from the meshes of that horrid custom which he has taken upon himself to perpetuate; but I hope and pray God may give him light and strength for the conflict, and bring him, clothed and in his right mind, to the feet of Jesus. He met my proposals very kindly, and promised to come under my instruction when he returned from a journey on which he is now going.

Mr. Duncan's first convert was a young man who died of consumption. He learned the leading truths of the Gospel, and during his long illness would not once permit the medicine-men to approach him with their rites. He died assuring the people of his safety.

The first baptisms took place on July 26, 1861, when fourteen men and five women openly professed Christ before their countrymen. This drew out more strongly the spirit of persecution, and the converts were severely tried and tempted. A Christian settlement was now formed at a place called Metlahkatlah, the old home of these Tsimshian Indians, which they had left to live near Fort Simpson, that they might have trading facilities. Here they were visited by the Bishop of Columbia, in April, 1863. The little band of fifty who had first moved to Metlahkatlah had increased to 600 from different tribes, and a village had been formed, consisting of well-built cottages, in which, under the influence of Christianity, men dwelt side by side as neighbours who had been in mortal feud all their lives. The bishop, in the fifth report of missionary proceedings within his diocese, thus describes the work which was prepared for him at the Church Missionary station:—

It was my office to examine a number of these Indians for baptism. I was several days engaged in the work. One day I was engaged from eight in the morning till one o'clock the next morning. It was the last day I had, and they pressed on continually to be examined. Night and darkness came. The Indians usually go to bed with the sun, but now they turned night into day, in order that they might be "fixed in God's ways," they said. "Any more Indians?" I kept saying, as eight o'clock, nine o'clock, ten o'clock, twelve o'clock, and one o'clock came; and there were always more Indians wishing to be "fixed" on God's side. I shall never forget the scene. The little oil lamp was not enough to dispel the gloom or darkness of the room, but its light was sufficient to cast a reflection on the countenance of each Indian as he or she sat before me. The Indian countenance is usually inexpressive of emotion; but now, when they spoke of prayer and trust in God, there was the uplifted eye and evident fervour; and when they spoke of their sins, there was a downcast look, the flush came and went on their cheeks, and the big tear frequently coursed from their manly eyes. Their whole hearts seemed to speak out in their countenances.

The bishop introduces the answers made by the candidates on examination, and some notices of the most remarkable amongst them. In the group we find the name Legaie, the chief who had attempted Mr. Duncan's life, notorious as having been a most savage and desperate man, stained with every crime. In his answers he thus expressed himself: "I want to take hold on God. I believe in God the Father, who made all things, and in Jesus Christ. I constantly cry for my sins when I remember them. I pray to God to wipe out my sins. I am anxious to walk in God's ways all my life. If I turn back it will be more bitter than before." This man, the principal chief, has made greater sacrifices than any other. He has left his tribe and all his greatness. Although largely bribed to return, he has stood fast. Once ferocious in his temper, he now bears patiently the ridicule of his friends, and returns kindness.

In November, 1863, Metlahkatlah was visited by the Rev. R. J. Dundas, and some brief extracts from his journals will bring the good missionary and his work very vividly before our readers.

Oct. 25: Lord's-day.—It was a pretty sight to see the whole population, old and young, at the sound of the bell thronging to worship God. No need to lock doors, for there is no one to enter the empty houses. Every soul is assembled in the one place, and for one purpose. As they entered, the men took the right and the women the left hand of the great circular hall. I was surprised to learn from Mr. Duncan afterwards that he had never bidden them to do this: they seemed to have adopted the arrangement instinctively. Service began with a hymn in Tsimshian. He led with his concertina. The air was very plaintive and beautiful—sung by some 200 voices, men, women, and children: it thrilled through me. Then followed prayers in Tsimshian, at the close of which all joined in the Lord's Prayer in English. Then followed a chant—one of the psalms he had translated and taught them—to a fine old Gregorian. His address, or sermon, of nearly an hour, was upon the story of Martha and Mary. His manner and gestulation were animated and striking, very much after their own style. The attention never seemed to flag throughout. I asked me to address them, which I did, shortly upon their present light as compared with the past darkness, and the difficulties they meet expect in their new course of Christian discipleship. Mr. Duncan interpreted for me. Before separating they sang again in Tsimshian a sort of sacred air which seemed familiar to me, and was exquisitely beautiful. I found afterwards it was the anthem "I will arise and go to my Father," somewhat altered, and made more Indian in its character. It suited their voices admirably. I closed with short prayer in English, and pronounced the benediction. The service was most striking. It was hard to realise that three years ago these had been sunk in the deepest heathenism, with its horrible practices.

On the Tuesday the examination of the candidates for baptism took place:—

Mr. Duncan, in his address to them, was very pointed and stringent—fencing in, as he afterwards told me, the door of admission—so anxious was he that only the really converted should of themselves. He told them the strict non-compromising requirements in those who thus sought to join themselves to Christ and His service. Better that they should postpone so solemn and awful a step than come to it unprepared. At the hour appointed the candidates were assembled. Fifty-five gave in their names. Several were those who would have come forward had they been there; but, as my coming was never anticipated at least 150 to 200 were away for their last hunting and fishing excursion before the winter, as would not be back for some weeks. Out of fifty-five who offered I accepted thirty-eight—twenty-one males and seventeen females. I was strongly impressed with the real earnestness and devotedness of those who came forward, and with their acquaintance with the simple saving truths of the Gospel message. Some cases were indeed most touching.

One said, "Mr. Duncan came and told us of our evil ways. I was deep in the green then; but when he told us how God loved us, I wanted to be free and love God: that was the first time I thought of Him."

On the next Sunday, November 1, the fifty-two candidates were baptized.

Mr. Duncan lately visited the heathen Indians who remain at Fort Simpson. He writes:—

I laid the Gospel again distinctly before them and they seemed much affected. The most pleasing circumstance of all, and which I was not prepared to expect, was that Paul Legaie and G (the one in times past a formidable enemy's opposer, and the other one among the first to be and greet the Gospel) sat by me, one on each side. After I had finished my address on the occasion, they got up and spoke, and spoke well. Legaie completely shamed and confounded the old man, who, in replying to my address, had said that I had come too late to do him and other people good; that had I come when the first traders came, the Tsimshians had long since been good. But they had been allowed to grow in sin; they had seen nothing among the first who came amongst them to unsettle them in it.

ld habits, but these had rather added to them real sins; and now their sins were deep laid, they he and the other old people) could not change.

Legsie interrupted him, and said, "I am a chief, a Tsimshian chief. You know I have been bad, very bad, as bad as any one here. I have grown up and grown old in sin, but God has changed my heart, and He can change yours. Think not to excuse yourselves in your sins by saying you are too old and too bad to mend. Nothing is impossible with God. Come to God: try His way: He can save you." He then exhorted all to leave God's way, to give their hearts to Him, to leave all their sins; and then endeavored to show them what they had to expect if they did so—not temporal good, not health, long life, or ease, or wealth, but God's favour here, and happiness with God after death.

Clat also spoke at great length. He said, from his youth he hated heathenism, and could never be prevailed upon, not even by threats, to join them in their follies. But he did not know of any better way; but by the time he became a man God sent His Word to the Tsimshians. He soon saw that he and his people were in the dark, and that God's Word was a light, a great light shining in the darkness. He kept his eye fixed upon it, and started off towards it; he persevered till he grasped it; and now he found it to be good and sweet, a great light to his heart.

What a glorious change was this since my first going round the camp to preach the Gospel in fear and trembling. Now I had two important men gathered out and on my side, speaking more distinctly than I could these glorious and saving truths, and trying to enforce them.

After they had finished, I got up and pointed to those two as witnesses of the truth I had declared the years I had been here. The Indian audience seemed much affected.

The baptism of upwards of forty Indians was likely to take place in a few weeks, when Mr. Duncan last wrote. Of the general conduct of the people under his charge he thus speaks:—

I am thankful to be able to tell you that thus far I have been able to restrain all here from visiting Victoria, excepting, of course, those who go in the mission schooner. It has been a very great struggle and test for some, but they have submitted rather than go against my will in the matter. I must here acknowledge, as very encouraging, the implicit obedience the Indians render; some instances I might record would, I am sure, greatly interest you. I am also happy to be able to report that the constables, as a body, are very true and faithful. [Evan. Chris., 1864, p. 414.]

Last winter they were severely tested. One of his own body, and a very influential one too, being gone wrong, was brought before us, and set by his very bosom friend; and we had to sit over his case till after midnight to reclaim him. I rebuked him by fixing him five blankets, and could have kept him in custody unless he had confessed his error and begged pardon. If you have heard the kind and powerfully-melting language which, one after another, his brother constables poured upon him to convince and subdue him, you would have rejoiced, I am sure. It was really wonderful. They triumphed, and with tears the prodigal returned. But part of the sentence was, that he was to leave the settlement for a short time, as I could not allow him to be seen in our midst. The day after, a deputation of constables waited upon me to beg for this part of the sentence to be cancelled. They came direct from a meeting to which he had been called, and after hearing his sorrowful words and good resolutions, they promised to use their influence to obtain permission to remain at the settlement, but not to go from his own house for some time, or until I gave him leave. Having pleaded so well and so earnestly for him, I consented to their proposal.

Three weeks afterwards the wanderer was restored, upon a full confession of his sin before his assembled fellow-Christians, and with every indication of his sincere repentance.

Mr. Duncan describes the secular affairs of the settlement as prospering:—

Ten of our young men are now away trading with the surrounding tribes, and others are going. I have also five employed in the schooner, and I am about putting the vessel entirely into the hands of the Indians. I have ordered the agents at Victoria to have Samuel Pelham registered as master, and I have made John Tait supercargo. I know it is a great risk, and I may be blamed; but I take the step in God's name, and do so without fear or misgiving. All our gardens, about 140 in number, are looking well. Our village work and building are progressing steadily, and I trust I shall soon have the mission buildings complete, and without having to put down any of the cost to your account.

The Romish priests having been among the Indians of the Naas River, trying to prejudice their minds against Mr. Duncan, that gentleman went thither. He says:—

I met crowds of Indians, all glad to see me. I spent two nights and a whole day with them, busy all the time conversing, visiting their sick, and preaching, and the response I met with was truly encouraging. The universal cry was, "Come, come and help us." All the evil the priests had done did not amount to much. I quickly put to shame their malicious statements, and had some happy opportunities of contrasting the truth as it is in Jesus, and the effect the truth had produced at Metlahkatlah, with the priests' mummeries, and the effect they had produced upon the Indians south, who had tried them for fifteen years. The difference is no less than the difference between life and death, and this even these poor heathens could discern.

After conferring with Mr. Duncan, two clergymen, who were sent to his assistance by the Church Missionary Society, have commenced a new and interesting mission among the Indians on the Naas River.

AMERICA.

NATIONAL PROSPECTS: THE SOUTH AND SLAVERY.

New York, January 10, 1865.

The multitude of Christian hearts among us that have been longing and looking for the signs of wholesome and stable peace begin to feel as Columbus and his sailors must have felt when they caught the first "delicate, dubious" odour of the land breeze. We dare not say that the end is yet. But the decisive portent of the end has at length shown itself. The proud, self-confident, unholy purpose in which the war began is giving way. No one could doubt the candour or the truth of the statement made by Vice-President Stevens, that slavery was to be the "corner-stone" of the new Republic. And now the leading topic in Southern discussions is the necessity of surrendering slavery. In one form or another, it comes into their President's Message, into Congressional debates, into the public correspondence of their leading men, both military and civil; and it goes far toward absorbing the editorial columns of their most zealous journals. The recent utterances of the Richmond press upon this subject are so remarkable, that they cannot fail to be copied in your own newspapers. Your readers will see in those articles the acknowledged fear that the popular spirit is on the verge of discouragement; the confession that while their relation to slavery precludes their recognition by Great Britain and France, they have no hope of saving the institution by which they suffer themselves to be stigmatised; and the consequent most grave and earnest advocacy of the policy of formally surrendering slavery for the sake of European recognition and protection. This, surely, is not the end which the Confederacy set out to reach. Such a watchword would have rallied no party even among the bitterest denouncers of Northern aggression. Now, indeed, since the lines have been drawn, and the strife has lasted so long, no doubt there has grown up in many bosoms a deadly animosity, which would welcome any other sacrifice of pride or interest sooner than submission to the Federal Government. But mere passion burns out. We have been fighting passion with a principle in it. Now the principle gives way. The fuel of the great conflagration fails. The flaming outline of the burning building may stand for a little while. But the glowing posts and rafters must soon fall together; and then they become ashes.

One branch of this discussion of slavery is especially interesting and significant. It is that which concerns the arming of the and the promise of their freedom war shall be ended. It is even ludicrous to observe how men who have always that their slaves do not wish for freedom would not accept it, need to chop at their phrases as they labour to make an absurd theory consistent with this attitude. They bribe their slaves to courage and bid the promise of liberty. But it is too absurd to ask of human language. No Colossus can bestride such a gulf. The most of their writers, accordingly, argue war liberating the enlisted slaves, as a reward for their military service. Others strenuously oppose the whole scheme of making slaves soldiers. They hint, and not obscurely, of the risk of such a measure; they ask of the authority a general Government, based upon the fundamental principle of sovereignty, shall assume to overrule the rights and the laws of the states; that in so many words that the war was for the interest of slavery, and that it was the height of folly and unfaithfulness on the part of the Government to sacrifice the war. How can we witness a decision of this without perceiving that the enterprise of our enemies has reached a crisis?

But some other facts add interest to the debate. Mr. Davis is slow to take a decision and no wonder. To commit himself to one party, is to disgust and to offend the other. But General Lee is not bound by those political considerations which the President, and he urgently demands that his wasted army be reinforced out of the multitudes of slaves. Just at this time it happens that the serious disaster which the Confederate cause has suffered at Fort Fisher and at Nashville deepen materially the dissatisfaction which has long been existing toward the military policy of Mr. Davis. Another Commander-in-Chief of the Confederate forces is loudly called for. General Lee is named for the important post. While this tide of popular confidence flows strongly toward that most able and brave general, it is plain that his declaration cannot fail to grow in popular favour. It becomes more and more difficult to maintain a national schism upon that exciting fundamental question can be avoided. While I am writing these sentences, upon what seems to be adequate a that the Government of Mr. Davis has at length yielded to the pressure, and that 200,000 slaves are to be enlisted in the army, and that in consideration of their military service, these, with their wives and children, are to be made free. The statement may be premature; but to this it must come if the war goes on. Are we too sanguine, when we think that such a step will start the question, "What have we gained, and what are we fighting for?"

But we find another and special element of hope in the relations which have suddenly sprung up between the suffering people of Savannah and the benevolent citizens of the North. So soon as the Confederate defenders of that city abandoned it to General Sherman, the municipal officers and the citizens gracefully yielded to the authority of the Federal Government. The military control under which they thus fell was from the first marked with so much wisdom and kindness, as to command their grateful and formal recognition. And since many of the commonest comforts of life were almost unknown in the captured city, a plan was at once set on foot to procure the needed supplies from the North. A messenger has come to New York upon this benevolent errand. The endorsement of General Sherman and the prompt sympathy of our citizens with sufferings which it becomes possible for them to relieve, will ensure such a manifestation of the temper of the North as will effectually silence all the industrious clamour about "Northern barbarians," and a "war of extermination." There are arguments as persuasive as they are becoming. "If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink." The piety and benevolence of the North are eager to obey the merciful injunction wherever they can do it without furnishing their enemy for further warfare. The South, accordingly, is rapidly learning two great lessons, which, in spite of the pride and passion of the leaders, must strongly incline the people to peace. They are learning that they have gained nothing by attempting to go out from us; and that they will lose nothing by a hearty return.

One striking indication that these lessons are not without their effect will appear in the following sentence taken from the majority report of a joint committee of the two Houses of the North Carolina Legislature, to whom there were recently referred certain "resolutions to initiate negotiations for an honourable peace":—

The majority of the committee believe that while every effort is being made to increase and strengthen the army by the most severe drain upon the people, of men and means, these extreme requirements should be accompanied by some manifestation of an effort and desire to secure an honourable peace by all other legitimate measures.

Nor have the Federal authorities discouraged such advances to the South as some of our enthusiastic citizens are still disposed to make. It is stated to-day that Mr. Francis P. Blair, who is known to sustain intimate and confidential relations with Mr. Lincoln, has passed through the lines of the two armies on a self-appointed errand to Richmond. He is no commissioner of our Government; and yet he is competent to carry and bring back an intelligible account of the dispositions of the contending parties. It is hard to discover how any mischief can result from his errand, so long as the war is still prosecuted with vigour. Let us hope that the double arguments of might and kindness may speedily convince our mistaken countrymen. Considerate men among us are looking for this result as they never looked for it before.

In the religious world there is but little to attract attention. The Congregational Churches, which hitherto have never held a national convention, have appointed such a meeting within the year now begun. One chief end which they propose to gain by this denominational conference is the maturing of methods of occupying the great region of the South which it is confidently expected will soon be thrown open to the religious efforts of the North.

The Unitarian churches, which are also Congregational in their government, are moving for a similar convention, although the motive in their case seems to be not so much the expectation of extending their limits as the need they feel to do something to resist their manifest tendency to disintegration and decay.

The week of prayer was very generally observed among us. But I am not acquainted with any features of the observance which it would be interesting to describe.

Home Intelligence.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER.

In accordance with previous announcements in Christendom, and as arranged by the Evangelical Alliance, meetings for prayer were held daily during the first week in last month, in Freemasons' Hall. They were attended, as in previous years, by a large number of persons. We subjoin an abstract of the proceedings of each day :—

MONDAY, January 2.—In the absence of the chairman, Lord Calthorpe, the Hon. W. Ashley presided. He read Romans xii., adding some excellent practical remarks. Prayer was offered by Revs. Dr. Steane and Samuel Minton. The subject for the day was "Thanksgiving for Blessings upon Individuals, Nations, and Churches, together with Confession of Sins." The Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel delivered the address. In the course of his remarks he said : "I thank God for this meeting. It has been said that our meetings here have been cold ; if so, still I will bless God for a beginning. I will tell you why I think they have been cold. It is not in the nature of man to be warm about a thousand things at the same time. Jacob became Israel when he wrestled with God for himself and his family ; he was not praying for Esau and all his four hundred men. The Syrophenician woman did not come to Jesus pleading for all the people in Tyre and Sidon ; her heart agonised for her suffering child ; nothing could divert her mind from that one prayer, and she got the blessing she sought. See Elijah on Carmel ; he is not praying for the thousand things about which a good man may pray. No ; the people are starving, and his cry is, 'O God, send rain, rain !' and it came. And if we are to have good prayer-meetings here, we must pray after this fashion. To be attempting to remember every good thing does but fritter away all earnestness, and we get cold as ice."

TUESDAY, January 3.—The subject for prayer was "Pastors and Teachers, Evangelists and Missionaries, especially those to the Jews and Heathen." Joseph Tritton, Esq., presided. After a hymn and a few minutes' silent prayer, Romans x. 1—15, and Ephes. iv. 1—16, were read by the chairman, who made a few introductory remarks, and called on the Rev. Daniel Wilson, of Islington, to lead the meeting in prayer. Rev. Capel Molyneux then gave the address. He observed that the Lord Jesus had said, "'The harvest truly is plenteous, but the labourers are few ; pray ye, therefore, the Lord of the harvest that he would send forth labourers into his harvest.' What is the talent given in order to meet the need? Prayer. That talent is in every believer's hands. The harvest is to be gathered through the instrumentality of labourers, and the labourers must be sent of God. Therefore, pray. The exercise of prayer is that for which we are gathered here. Are we cut off from missionary exercise because we cannot go to distant places? No. Pray. The weakest, the sickest believer can pray the Lord of the harvest to send forth more labourers into His harvest. May I suggest that missionary work possibly, and probably, will be our work in the world to come. energy goes on (as who can do what so probable as that the storing His beloved Son to die for : the means of preserving other intelligences created, as it is the means of reason have been deceived and have fallen into temptation was elaborated by the speaker. Prayer was then offered by Rev. and Captain Trotter, after which were read for silent prayer. Capel spoke of the imprisonment and Stern and other missionary brethren for whom, as well as for missions general, prayer was offered by Rev. the meeting was concluded with On Tuesday evening, in the absence of Wm. Ashley, the chair was taken by Spence, Esq. The hymn, "All in the name of Jesus!" was sung, and the benediction sought in silent prayer. Then read Isaiah lxiii., and deacon Elmhurst and Mr. Robert prayer. Rev. Owen Thomas then interesting details of the Revival of 1860. The meeting was concluded by Mr. Henry Edwards and Dr. doxology.

WEDNESDAY, January 4.—Capel presided at the morning meeting. The subject was "The Children of Christian Nations, and Schools." The chairman read the first four chapters of the First and made some remarks on the training with wisdom, and religious out wisdom, as illustrated in the lives of the sons of Eli, the secret of which, as he believed, the absence of habit with God. Prayer was then offered by Huron and the Rev. W. Brock L. Thornton, President of the Wesleyan, delivered the address. "We are the salvation of our children," he said, "let us remember that we do in this pledge ourselves to use all the means towards this great end. From this we learn what lessons to convey to the children of our children. How delightful the sublimest truths of the Gospel to the susceptibilities of children. There is about the story of the cross which goes to the heart of a child. Cease to think of them ; we have the amplest reason that our prayers shall be answered. When you have gone to the God of Moses and Elijah live! was suggested that special prayers be offered for the children of Christian parents. Thanksgiving and praise to parents for answers to prayer given year past in the conversion of children. special requests for others were received. The meeting was closed with prayer by Lord. On Wednesday evening, Thomas Capel presided. The proceedings were prayer and praise ; a portion of Scripture was read, and after a pause for silent prayer, the meeting in prayer.

inverness, then addressed the meeting
mes of Refreshing in Scotland."

Y, January 5.—John Corderoy, Esq.,
The meeting was commenced with a nt prayer, and the 145th Psalm read irmen. Prayer was then offered by
tev. Baptist Noel and Rev. C. Skrine, other hymn, Mr. Watson (Secretary ay School Union) led the assembly in
v. Dr. Hamilton then spoke on the the day—"Sunday-schools and all gaged in Christian Work." [This ad-be found in the earlier pages of our nber.] The Rev. John Harvard and ock offered prayer, and the meeting with the doxology and benediction.
evening was devoted to the reception ion on "The Fruits of the Revival in which the Rev. Dr. Knox, of Belfast, in excellent address. Lord Railstock ad among those who took part in the were Mr. Baxter and Captain Lowe. nding the unfavourable weather, the was large.

January 6.—Sir S. Morton Peto in the ject—"Spiritual and Temporal Bless-ur Nations; for Kings and all in the Sanctification of the Sabbath; the f War; the Abolition of Slavery;
d of all Oppression." After the opening ilent prayer, the chairman read Isaiah Tim. ii. 1-8. The Rev. Dr. Fry and engaged in prayer. Rev. Archibald gave the address. In the course of his e observed: "What more beautiful there of the Reformation in England f the aged Latimer, who would remain his knees in earnest prayer for the rally, and especially for the Princess that he needed to be lifted to his feet?
can tell how much of the blessing our yed was attributable to such prayers!
o-day of the most recent chapter in the nations, a chapter not yet completed, it is the saddest. I would call upon upon parents, upon all who are in the training of the young, to tear false halo of glory with which the ar has been decked, and to let the young it really is. Yet, blessed be God, rowing vision of its complete cessation.
oming, I grant, but we read of the age word shall be beaten into the plough-the spear into the pruning-hook, and shall learn war no more. We put our ith on this promise this morning, and p to God and cry, 'Hasten the time shalt break the bow and cut the under, and burn the chariot in the when the Prince of peace shall be as King of kings and Lord of lords.'"

J. Howard Hinton and Dr. Davis yer, and the meeting closed with the
-In the evening, a large audience to receive information on "Syria and The chair was filled by Col. Walker, d the proceedings in the usual manner,
T. R. Birks and Dr. Waddington lead-
yer. The Rev. Dr. Bliss, American
, of Beyrout, gave the address. This ad by prayer by the Rev. Mr. Nevins, from China, and Pastor Petavel (in Several requests for special remembrance were then read, and silent prayer made.

The proceedings closed with the doxology and benediction.

SATURDAY, January 7.—Robert Baxter, Esq., in the chair. After silent prayer, Isa. lii. and Acts iv. 13 to end were read. Three brethren followed in prayer from the body of the meeting, the chairman having left it open. The address was by the Rev. Mr. Pennefather. The subject for the day, "The Christian Church—for Increased Holiness, Activity, and Harmony among its Several Sections." Mr. Pennefather remarked on the solemnity of the occasion as the last day of this week in which the world has been girt around with prayer. After some introductory remarks, he proceeded to say: "The devil is endeavouring with tenfold energy to break up the unity of the Church. He cannot sever us from Christ, but he may sever us from one another. He is striving now to get us looking at mere outside things. If I take up a dusty pebble from the roadside and place it so close to my eye that I can see nothing besides, the sun itself is hid from me. In the sixth chapter of Proverbs we read of six things which the Lord hates. There is the lying tongue, hands that shed innocent blood, feet that be swift in running to mischief; but what forms the climax of this list of abominations? Mark it—he that soweth discord among brethren. There cannot be a greater sin in the sight of God than this.
Whilst we celebrate to-day the Church's oneness in her living Head, ought we not in our closets with shame and sorrow to confess how Christian men have sown discord amongst brethren? I have spoken of the Lord's coming; if a tear could fall on that day, it would be at the remembrance of our having stood aloof from any of our brethren.
'The Lord make you to increase in love one towards another; to the end He may establish your hearts unblameable in holiness before God, even our Father, at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all His saints.' Mark the connexion between love and holiness in this passage, also between present fruit and future glory. Oh let us grasp all the family of God in our hearts. We are possessors of one life, soon we are to take our royal position on the very throne of God." Another hymn was sung, and the meeting again thrown open to prayer. The Bishop of Huron concluded with the benediction.

The Week of Prayer was observed in different parts of the suburbs. In the North of London meetings were held at Islington, Stoke Newington, and Mildmay-park. In the South of London at Surrey Chapel; Borough-road; Walworth-road; Stockwell;
Studley-road, Clapham-road; China-terrace, Lambeth; York-street, Walworth-road; Denmark-place, Camberwell; New Park-road, Clapham-park; Brixton; Upper Tulse-hill; and at Blackheath. Meetings were also held daily at Sloane-street, Chelsea, in which ministers of all denominations took part.

From the provinces we hear of meetings having been held in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Dublin, and Liverpool; at Aylesbury, Birkenhead, Reading, Nottingham, Birmingham, Keswick, Jersey, Tutbury, Lancaster, Newcastle (Staffordshire), and Bradford; at Langholme, Canonbie, Westerkirk, and Eckdalemuir ; and at Strabane, Tramore, Coleraine, Cork, and Tralee.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON ON THE COURT OF FINAL APPEAL.

The recent agitation for an alteration in the Court that finally determines Ecclesiastical Causes, arising out of the decision of the Judicial Committee, in the case of the "Essays and Reviews," has induced the Bishop of London to come forward in defence, substantially, of the present constitution of that Court. This is done in a rather remarkable manner. A collection of all the judgments pronounced in spiritual matters, since the institution of the present Court, has been made by some studious lawyers, and prepared, with legal annotations, for the public. To this the Bishop has written a preface, in which he discusses in a calm and moderate tone, but with unmistakeable clearness as to his own opinions, the present constitution of the Court, and its superiority to any other form of tribunal that has yet been suggested. He lays down the propositions—first, that the Royal Supremacy was the rallying point by which at the Reformation the internal unity of the National Church was secured : second, that the Reformers were careful to avoid the rock on which, as he holds, the Scottish Reformers ran, of uniting in one body the legislative and the judicial functions of the Church. The Presbyterian Synods both make their laws and administer them ; but he holds it to be a far wiser thing that the judicial tribunal in the English Church has only to administer the law which is put into its hands : third, that in deciding ecclesiastical causes, care was taken, as early as the reign of Henry VIII., that trained lawyers might be employed to sit in judgment, and ever since the practice has been that even when the Archbishop hears a cause in person, he takes care to have the benefit of the assistance of a lay assessor : fourth, that in theological questions the presence of ecclesiastics is as necessary for the discussion of the incidental points that may arise as is the presence of lawyers to apply the principles of law : and last of all, he insists that these clergymen and lawyers should act together, and form one tribunal. If they are to sit apart, he says, they will form a perpetual court of legislation, to make new laws according to the Church's exigencies. His opinion of such a court he thus sums up :—

The most sanguine believer in synods may well feel alarm at the thought of their functions being delegated to a small body of bishops to give their verdict on the vague issues such and such subjects, are the genera the Church. Who shall predict how dogmas might not in ten years be prop such a body, under the notion of th been always believed as unexpressed into of the explicit statements of the Church laries ? What has forced the idolatrot of the Immaculate Conception on Rom lies but this very power, conceded to a Ultramontane section, of declaring that has always held implicitly what it had fore distinctly promulgated ? Much as differ in this matter from authorities f feel the deepest respect, I confess that, present advised, of all proposed modes our existing ecclesiastical courts of ju seems to me to involve the gravest conse

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK ON C EXTENSION.

His Grace the Archbishop of York addressed a meeting at Sheffield, in ance of a local scheme for the ad seven churches to that populous and town. There was nothing remarkal project itself. It is to the activit often and much-abused body, the Ecc Commission, in endowing churches, desire to direct attention. The A said :—

The commission was instituted to tak of the Church that appear to be superfl this place, and carry it to that where the need. The year before last they anno they would raise the endowment of ev with 10,000 population, in public pat 300*l.* a-year ; and the next year they w announce that every benefice in public with 8,000 population would be similarly to 300*l.* a-year. (Hear.) The 10,000 done ; the 8,000 is in course of doing ; may come lower down next year ; but t referred, of course, to old districts. Th profess to deal with new districts in the a. with the old ; but they said, "In the new districts may not be left aside we will do this—we will set aside every tain sum (say 6,000*l.* a-year), and out of as far as it goes, we will endow new d the same population as we are dealing the old districts, say 8,000 and 6,000, We will to give those new districts pro and for a time, 200*l.* in each year ; but, if there are more new districts than haust the sum that we shall be able to some will have to stand over." You w therefore, that there is no promise or endow these new and populous district believe, that every one of these new dis this society is about to form will, in the a few years, be endowed with 300*l.* a. the Ecclesiastical Commissioners' funds.

On the question of pew-rents h was especially emphatic. He gave l "for having all the people who come ship God put on an equal footing."

ON CLERICAL MEETING.

Clergymen, mostly, but not expected with the metropolis, either in the course of last year or Wilson's Memorial Hall, the assembly is an annual one, of the meeting is to discuss of vital interest to the spiritual church, and the welfare of the special topic this year was the the Church of England duly office as a missionary Church? It was considered in its home, colonial aspects, and special delivered on each head. The Wilson, Vicar of Islington, pre-ferred himself, in a few intro-uctions, to the finances of mis-ere contended the Church was s duty. The amount of wealth y was enormous, so that the he Exchequer calculated there al revenue to the Exchequer every year from the natural nce alone. Yet the aggregate r great Church societies—the he Church Missionary, the Colonial—only amounted to £., or about the yearly profits houses in London or in Liver- v. C. D. Marston spoke of the the vast metropolitan popula-ile he admitted all that was various societies, and by indi- e stated that in the diocese of more than a million of people due religious provision of any t it was calculated, by a careful t more people now in England ented themselves from divine existed in the country at the Reformation. The reverend orted the meeting not to put in societies or organizations—

Church consisted only in the ous members of the Church. dward Hoare spoke of the case pulation, and drew the follow- graphic picture of one class of ath of England :—

sent nearly all the boys were leav- e they were ten years of age, and or nine. Take the history of one removed from school at eight or age, and sent out to spend the day, Sunday included, an invol- l, feeding swine, and living in That poor lad asked you at one or he afternoon what o'clock it was, at the time was coming when he come, perhaps hungry, cold, and weary. There he was, week after week, perhaps, with no one to speak to him all the week, and there was no Sunday-school for him, because he was still with his pigs on Sunday. Their poor Kentish boys occupying that position had certain hieroglyphics on their pig-whips, which they used as a sort of charm. It was called in Kent the "hog's prayer." He could never make out the meaning of it, but the boys who tended swine in Kent all knew it by heart, and it was almost their only form of devotion, whether on the week-day or on Sunday. Follow that poor boy a step further, and you saw him, perhaps, the mate of a waggoner, being raised in life by living with horses instead of pigs; and he was again employed every week-day and Sunday. When at last he married he presented a spectacle of stolid indifference; and when he came to die, the clergy- man who was sent for found before him a poor, dark, ignorant creature, with no thought that he could work upon—a man who had a sort of dim, misty idea about God and about Jesus Christ, but nothing beyond.

The Rev. Mr. Venn then spoke of the missions to the heathen, and in a speech full of facts, such as defy summary, he glanced over the wide mission field. He rebutted the popular argument that we failed in our duty because we did not supply the heathen with as many missionaries as we had clergymen at home. That was neither possible nor desir- able. What was wanted was to raise up native agency, and to establish in each country a self-supporting, self-governing, self-extending native church. Still they had not come up to their duty. In 1845 he took a survey of the mission work for the previous ten years, and found there had been in that time a sevenfold increase of communicants and catechumens. But for the last nineteen years the increase had not been seven, but threefold, and he was constrained to add, that had God given a sevenfold increase, they would not have had missionaries on the field to house the increase. At the same time, there were many encouraging circumstances, of which he selected four—the extension of the area of missions, the introduction of the principle of self-support into missions, the native ministry, and the movement in the public mind of heathendom towards Chris- tianity. On each of these points he dilated at length, adducing many gratifying facts and circumstances in support of his views.

The Bishop of Huron said a few words on the colonial enterprise, and on his diocese.

The Rev. R. Burgess spoke of the duty of England towards the Continent. He assured his audience that they must not expect any political effort in Italy to throw off the Papacy. His hopes lay in a free press, in the distribu- tion of Bibles and tracts, and in the indirect efforts of education—

Let us not [said he, in conclusion] retire from this day's deliberation with the brow of discontent, as if we had no cause for thanksgiving and praise. Our Church, in her missionary character, both at home and abroad, is fulfilling her office to an extent which our fathers knew not; and the founders of our great societies, if they could rise from their graves, would break forth into anthems of praise for the prosperity of their handiwork in a short half century.

RAGGED CHURCHES.

The philanthropic movement described in the following letter has attracted less attention than the kindred one of Ragged Schools. Properly developed, however, it may be attended with the most important results:—

It is painfully obvious to all frequenters of our churches and chapels that the artisan class is estranged from the public ordinances of religion. It is not because there is not ample provision made for their accommodation; for it is saddening to know that one-third of the space of our various places of worship is vacant every Lord's-day. It is the well-to-do-classes who throng our sanctuaries; whilst the fustian coat is only seen here and there, and that at rare intervals. Infidelity cannot be assigned as the cause of this religious apathy among manual labourers. Too few, alas! of this class feel sufficient interest in religion to argue against it. Indifference, rather than Colensoism, prevails amongst our manual workers, and this is the chief reason why the house of prayer is deserted.

But there is a class still lower in the social scale. Compared with thousands of our poorer brethren, the artisans of our great cities may be regarded as an aristocracy. They are rarely seen in the daytime, save when they meet at the foot of the gallows, to discuss his crime, and to toss up—as in the recent case of Muller—whether the culprit will die “game.” Thousands of these sleep in the low “lodging houses for travellers” in the Mint or the Minories; and hundreds, who are too poor to pay the threepence per night demanded for that accommodation, sleep, curled up like a bundle of rags, on door-steps, or seek for shelter beneath the dark arches of the Adelphi, or in the public parks. They are usually weak in body, low in temperament, and semi-idiot in mind; and the outward filth too aptly symbolises the moral filth within. Sometimes, however, hunger or disease has not subdued their physical strength, and then they form the staple of our “dangerous classes.” Now were persons of a social and moral type like this to enter our ordinary places of worship, their outer appearance would excite a panic such as no average preacher could control. Yet, having immortal destinies, they must live for ever in heaven or hell; but happily, they can be meteeden for the city of God by that one blood which alone can cleanse either prince or beggar.

It is for this class that “Ragged Churches” have been founded. They are mostly conducted in buildings of the Ragged School Union, the bulk of the preachers being laymen; many of whom, from the power which attends their preaching, evidence that they have received a direct charism from the Holy Ghost for this specific work. So successful has been this movement recently, that in 81 ragged schools no less than 5,463 outcasts or destitute persons—pariahs by birth and pariahs through sin—are attracted to hear the preaching of the Gospel every Lord's-day. In “Acre” of Westminster, the too “Little Hell” of Lisson Grove, and of wretchedness and crime of the F experiment to tell the sin-sick and weary that there is Divine love for through the blessing of the Spirit, be cessful.

One Ragged Church may be special as it is not only a type of the bulk oldest and largest in London. It is Lord's-day morning, in Field-lane Ra It was commenced in June, 1852. T day only thirty persons attended, but the congregation, the disorder was m witness. But by the close of that y rage attendance had reached 167, and reverence might have been beneficially many more regular congregations. 2 different persons attend the services of the year. The usual attendance is 400. Thus, on the first Sunday of 1 persons were present, of whom no h were male adults. The congregation as it does of the seething dregs o would require the pencil of a Rembr tray it. On the first form sat an ex grammar school, a surgeon, and a l the army, all of whom had lost their through vice. Nigger melodists were termongers, out of work, and out of h of-leave men, who are seeking for a h their bread honestly; penitent Magda men whose cropped heads told that t left gaol; mechanics reduced by dru disease; and women so unsexed by v face scarcely seemed human—formed this strangest of strange flocks. Nor gregation confined to natives of Engla and Hindoo, and Chinese, and Negr as well as the scum of great Contin Yea, “every one that is in distress, as that is in debt, and every one tha tented,” flock to this modern Cave and listen reverentially to that precio no one is too vile for Christ to receive: Nor has the work among our fallen b unblest. Many a backslider has bee and many an adult, steeped to the l and misery, has been led to the Cro these have gone home to their Father there received a hearty welcome; w full of faith and joy, are as God's l dreary byeways of London.

This brief sketch of the London Rag proves that those who are lowest in t moral scale will readily listen to th men will speak in simple Saxon langu not too stiff to sympathise with their guilty brethren. Why, then, are Churches organised in every part of E this wretched class exists? Nay, why similar services—called by what fittin will—in the “slums” of the Cont viler the locality, surely the greater the message of redeeming love; and the or depraved the congregation, the mo the proof we furnish that we at least h our faith in the grand old story of the do I doubt, after thirteen years' experi field of labour, that our social pariahs drink in the great truth that God, b pector of persons, is as willing to sav unpityed Magdalen as the rich Nicodemus. Happily, the grace felt by the dying robber reaches the same class now; and it is a fact, which all aged-church preachers can attest from blessed experience, that in this field of Gospel husbandry at least, the sower and the reaper are one.

Yours, &c., E. J. HYCHER.

12, Brunswick-terrace, N.

Monthly Survey of Missions.

INDIA.

At Calcutta, a young Brahmin, named Nirunjun Chatterjee, has been baptized by the missionaries of the London Society. Reading the Bible and the evidences of Christianity while at a school in connexion with the mission, were the means of his enlightenment. It was not his first application to receive the sacred rite; and he encountered, as is usual in all such cases, considerable opposition from his friends.

A follower and lineal descendant of Mohammed, who was also a Moonshee, or teacher of the faith of Islam, has been baptized at Nussurabad (Rajpootana) by the Rev. Wm. Martin, of the United Presbyterian Mission. Naturally proud and overbearing, as might be expected from his profession and ancestry, the character of Hussain Alli, as he is called, is now so changed, that "to me," says the missionary, "it is the greatest encouragement in reaching the Gospel I have met since coming to India, to trace in his walk and conversation the progress he is making in imitating the humility and gentleness of Christ." A burdened conscience led him, in the first instance, to seek in the Christian religion that consolation which he was unable to find in his traditional faith, and by the perusal of the Scriptures and works in defence of them, without the aid of any human teacher, he was led to embrace Him of whom they testify as his Saviour. At Hussain Alli's baptism, the missionaryrites—

Intense curiosity was depicted in every countenance, and many who were afraid to listen were silently not less afraid of losing anything that was said. This was specially manifest during the reading of the Moonshee's paper, as he showed how one by one the false hopes upon which he, in common with all Mohammedans, had been accustomed to rest, failed him in the day of his need. And again, during the delivery of my address of congratulation and Christian encouragement after baptism, I observed several Mohammedans who appeared to be quite lost in amazement. This baptism has created quite a commotion among the Mohammedan population.

At Nagpore, six more adults (four men and two women) have been baptized by the Free Church missionaries. Native labourers were, for the most part, the instruments employed in their conversion.

Female education makes slow but steady progress in the chief cities of the empire. Of Calcutta we are told: "Where three years ago two or three ladies were engaged in zenana work, there are now at least twelve; the lady who began with two houses now visits eight or ten; and on all sides are found willing scholars as well as careful workers. Truth, too, being felt as taught." Another writer remarks:—

Until the last year or two we were compelled, in Madras, to bribe the attendance of a few girls to our schools, low both in social position and in caste. Matters were until lately very little better in Bombay. And now what do we see in all these places, as the result of patience and perseverance, if a desire for female education awakened, which is gaining strength every day. Instead of bribes ven, fees are received, and the paucity of qualified teachers alone limits the number of our schools.

The liberality of the native converts of James Town, Travancore, excites the warm imitation of the missionary in temporary charge of that station. In two-and-a-half years, they have raised, by monthly and weekly subscriptions, varying in amount from one-eighth of a penny to threepence or fourpence, no less than 210*l.* for the erection of a new church. For other purposes, during the same period, they have contributed 280*l.* This is more than has been done in any other part of the Indian mission-field, we are told—a fact the more remarkable, as the people are all very poor.

The ravages of the cyclone, in Masulipatam, though causing the death of thousands of lives, did not prove fatal to one European. All the girls (thirty-three in number) in one of the Church Missionary Society's schools perished. Many converts also have lost their lives. The destruction of mission property has been very great.

CHINA.

Three years only have elapsed since missionary operations were commenced in Peking, and the Rev. Joseph Edkins, of the London Society, is able to report the conversion of twenty Chinese and Manchus to the faith of Christ. Some of the converts afford indication that they are likely to become earnest promoters of the truth among their fellow-countrymen. One of these, in an important part of the city, imparts daily instruction to all comers, in the afternoons, and holds meetings for prayer every evening. High officers of Government find their way to the missionary hospital, and Christian books find their way into the palace.

Two very interesting young Chinamen have been baptized by the Church missionaries at Fuh-Chan. They had been under instruction some time. "My good and faithful catechist," writes one of the missionaries, "Kin Taik (Seeker of Souls), was the means of their conversion. This good man is worth gold." The heathen present appeared to view baptism with much interest. Among them was one of the bitterest opponents of the mission, a Confucianist.

The English Presbyterian missionaries at Amoy have been thrown in a state of great alarm by the entrance of a body of Tai-ping rebels into Chang-chew from the North-West. Amoy was seized with panic; refugees flocked in with their tale of woe; and what added to the distress of the little Christian community was the utter uncertainty as to the fate of the native converts at Chang-chew and Chish-bey. After three days' suspense, the brethren learned that the mission chapels had been spared, that the Christians were safe, and that altogether there had been little slaughter. All the temples and idols are said to have been destroyed.

It is with deep regret that we record the decease of one of our correspondents—Rev. F. Genaehr. He laboured for seventeen years in China as an agent of the Rhein Missionary Society, without once visiting Europe. A missionary who was to have relieve him of the charge of his station at Ho-an, died on his way out, but he resolved to continue at his post, though the necessity of a change was too obvious. Cholera broke out at Ho-an, and, as Mr. Genaehr practised medicine, he expressed his desire to be called in for advice.

It seemed at first that the heathen had not sufficient confidence in the foreigner, as no one came to solicit his help. Presently, a Christian woman, the wife of an assistant, fell sick, and Mr. Genaehr treated her successfully, so that she entirely recovered. Upon this, a man, who had got an attack, came for Mr. Genaehr, and this man recovered too. Another woman was attacked, also a Christian, and as she lived in a heathen family, they would not keep her, and brought the patient straightway to the Mission-house. Mr. Genaehr felt bound to take her in, and watched her, with the amah, a whole night; this woman also got better; but Mr. Genaehr remarked to his wife in the morning, that that night had cost him dear, and he did not feel well.

Mr. Genaehr and three of his children were seized with the malady. The eldest died five hours before his father, and they were both interred in one grave. The fourth also succumbed beneath the virulence of the disease; the third recovered. The deceased missionary wrote several books and tracts in Chinese, some of which became popular, and obtained a wide circulation. His chief and favourite occupation, however, was teaching young men, with the view of raising up a native agency. Six young men are now employed on the mission as assistants, whose tears over the death of their master gave touching testimony to his worth.

WEST AFRICA.

One of the native ministers of the Church Missionary Society, after having instructed and received into the church at the Gambia five liberated Congos and two Joliffes, has been placed at Waterloo (Sierra Leone) to superintend the Quiah mission in one of the outlying districts of the colony. Here he has baptized, on one occasion, seventeen adults.

Six persons are reported as having renounced heathenism and embraced Christianity at Bando, near Abuadzi, on the Gold Coast. At Kwaman, on the same coast, eight converts have been baptized. On both occasions the officiating minister was a native Wesleyan.

SOUTH AFRICA.

Some encouraging instances of conversion in connexion with the United Presbyterian missions in Kaffraria are narrated by the Rev. Peter Davidson, who traces them to the teaching of another missionary of the same body, several years before, who now hears the first time of the good which he has been instrumental in effecting. Speaking of the adult members of the native church at Adelaide (British Kaffraria) who have been received by baptism, Mr. Davidson says:—

It was very moving to hear how some of these were brought into deep concern about the salvation of their souls, and to see how earnest they were in pressing into the kingdom of God. One Hottentot, said that for many weeks he could scarcely think of anything but his sins, and how they were to be forgiven. Many a night he could find but little or no sleep. He was pursued by dreams of a very alarming nature. He could do nothing, by night or by day, but cry to God for forgiveness.

He could read a little in God's Word, and there he found the way of forgiveness, through the blood of Christ. Now he wished to be baptized, and be counted among the people of Jesus Christ. About the same time, a Fingoe appeared occasionally in the congregation, and manifested the very deepest interest in the services. At length he called on me, and requested baptism. I found him very well acquainted with his Bible, and that during a period of several years he had been much concerned about salvation. He had heard of the native congregation which had been formed here, and resolved, though living, I understand, at a distance of about thirty miles, to come and hear the Gospel. His interest was much deepened, and every second Sabbath, he travelled thirty miles on Saturday, turning on Sabbath night when there was moonlight, or if there was no moon, on Monday, to hear the preaching of the Word. He was baptized; and two weeks after, on a Saturday mornoon, he called on me with his widowed mother—a noble-looking Fingoe woman—very much concerned to think that her son, whom she had been trying to teach the way of salvation, should be got before her, having been baptized and received into the bosom of the Church while she was still a stranger far away. She, too, was received into the fellowship of the Church by public baptism. It was truly a solemn service. The whole congregation was moved to tears, and many of the Kaffirs, so easily moved as the Hottentots are, cried out in anguish of spirit. Several have applied for membership since, and are now on trial.

All the Moravian missions in South Africa have been lately visited by Mr. Bechler, one of the Brethren. He states that many natives on the settlements are still but very partially civilised, and many more are far from being true Christians; adding—

From the resident missionaries I heard many complaints of indifference, gross sins, false professions, inconsistency, on the part of those natives who are continually within the sound of the Gospel, and the influence of Christian teaching and example; even among the communicant members of the flocks, the exercise of Church discipline in its severest form of exclusion from Church privileges, was so frequently a matter of painful necessity, as not a little to discourage the labourers. But when I look back at what I have witnessed of heathenism—Kaffir men riding with scarcely a rag to cover their nakedness, and apparently thinking of and caring for nothing in the world beyond their outward wants, quite contented if their begging procures for them a little tobacco; the Kaffir women staring into one's face with an expression of the most intense stupidity, as though utterly incapable of thinking at all; others lying on the ground, indolently smoking and sleeping, only rousing themselves to look after their cattle—when I see these original features of the people, and remember something of the dreadful sins which are quite commonly practised by them, then certainly I must come away with thanks to the Lord, that, in spite of many weaknesses and shortcomings on our part, the Lord has been pleased to do a great work in the midst of this people. I may instance as proofs of the progress in civilization the facts, that the old bee-hive shaped huts without any chimney, and consequently very dirty, and all but unbearable to an European, have in very many cases given place to tolerably commodious brick-houses, that trees are planted and carefully reared, that many refuse to have any connexion with sorcery, learn trades, and turn them to good account. The so-called Hottentots, a class of coloured people very different from the original people of the same name, of which only a few representatives are now to be found, are in advance both of negroes and Kaffirs with respect to the last-mentioned particular.

The Training Institution at Genadendal has just completed the first quarter of a century of its existence. The total number of pupils has been sixty-nine, of whom thirty have been qualified for and appointed teachers in Moravian congregations or in the service of other churches. The first pupils from the Namaqua tribe entered the institution during the year. Within the same year a young Fingoe left the Brethren to enter on his duties; and is an interesting character:—

Born at Clarkson, he distinguished himself by his general good conduct, and when about nineteen years old, was employed as teacher by a Wesleyan missionary. Finding his store of knowledge very limited, he applied for permission to enter the training school on condition of paying 20*l.* annum from his own purse. While here, he was very diligent and persevering, and his progress was very gratifying, particularly in music, of which he knew nothing on entering. He is now occupying the position of assistant-missionary in connexion with the Scottish mission in Caffraria.

A Wesleyan missionary in Cape Colony writes to us as follows:—

Our mission at Swellendam has been founded for upwards of two years, and without any such signs of success as could be dignified with the title of a revival. We have been cheered with frequent proofs of the Divine smile. It fell to my lot yesterday to baptize four adults, in addition to more during the last year. Two of these appear to have been rescued from slavery by British re-of-war. Our day and infant schools are steadily advancing, both in numbers and efficiency, there being about 120 on the rolls. But there is much need of patience in dealing with a people into whose souls of many of whom the iron of slavery has entered. It is but very gradually, and with many discouraging interruptions, that we can hope to witness that personal and social elevation which we desire.

MADAGASCAR.

The Rev. Mr. Ellis continues to write of the progressive triumphs of the Gospel in the island of Madagascar, though "amidst some discouragements." On one Sunday in last month he administered baptism to eighteen persons. There is no extensive awakening; he remarks, there has "long been a steady, quiet, and slightly fluctuating increase of converts to my own church and congregation, as well as to others with which I am best acquainted. Besides this there has been peculiarly encouraging intelligence of the Divine Spirit at Fianarantsoa, in the South, and the extreme limits of Inerina, West, as well as evidence of patience and cheerful confidence among the believers at himanga, in the North."

The Rev. Robert Toy says that his chapel, which holds from 1,000 to 1,200, is crowded when he preaches; that he preaches as rapidly and as fluently now in the language as he could in English; that he has nine small country churches under him and that he believes God is greatly blessing his labours. He thus writes one evening:—

To-day I have been to a place five miles away, and preached once; returned to my own station in the afternoon, and preached again to, I should say, at least 1,000 or 1,200; and not just baptized privately a man who, if he were taken, would be killed before many hours. One of those condemned at the revolution, and has been in concealment ever since. Poor fellow, I sincerely pity him, but can do no more. I heartily pray he may run no risk to-night. He is one to arrange the matter with me, so that after it was well dark I started off to find the house. I soon reached, and presently he came in, laid hold of me by each foot and hand in succession, and kissed them. It was about as much as I could stand.

"Since the violent death of Radama II. a change for the worse has taken place in many respects," writes another missionary. "There is a strong desire, by a considerable reactionary party, to return to the old customs; but I believe that the precarious relations with France, and, I hope, the friendly relation with England, will prevent the Government and people from breaking the promise which the Queen made on her accession to the throne."

The same gentleman describes the entrance of the ambassadors into the capital on their way to Court, after their return from England and France. It was on the Lord's Day.

Since the revolution in May, 1863, the Sunday seems to have been fixed upon for Court and other grand occasions; for not only did the coronation take place on a Sunday, but the victorious army returning from the west made their entry on a Sunday. The bullocks for the feast "fandroana" were ordered to be killed on a Sunday; and now the ambassadors, having been waiting outside the town for a week, are received on that day. But this is not all. The Queen a little time ago has taken a fancy to dancing, and has had some officers and civilians not only present during the week, but sent for some on a Sunday; and one of my native pastors, whom I expected to preach last Sunday, was sent for from the palace, and had to dance instead.

WEST INDIES.

From various sources we have most painful details of the extreme distress arising from the severe drought in the West Indies. The following melancholy picture is drawn by a Wesleyan minister at Providence, Barbadoes:—

Many of our members, and even some leaders, are kept away from the means of grace for long together because they are destitute of decent apparel. Some local preachers cannot attend appointments because they have not a coat fit to wear in a pulpit. Parents who have a strong desire to educate their children cannot send them to school for want of clothes, and there are many children literally naked. A teacher who has a wife and ten children to support a few days ago died of me in great distress; his house was levied upon, and was to be sold on Monday for ground. I advanced him nearly all the money I had in the house. Another teacher, whose school was in a similar position, is in no better circumstances, and would be glad to sell his books, furniture, and things he possesses, to get food; and to-day his wife sent to beg that I would help them. I do not have the few shillings I had left and sent part, hoping to be replenished this evening at the meeting, but only received one shilling and sevenpence towards it. I know that many of our members are very willing to contribute to God's cause, and their distress because they cannot is greatly written out of a full heart under the circumstances related, when a flood of tears would be shed, but the fountain seems dried up. I often shut myself up and refuse to hear the sorrowful applications when I know I cannot help them as I would.

In Jamaica the destitution is so great, and its results, both spiritually and temporally, are so deplorable, that the committee of the Baptist Missionary Society have issued an appeal for assistance to the ministers and congregations of their denomination in the island. One of these ministers writes from Brown's-town:—

Our congregations, which for nearly thirty years have been crowded frequently to overflowing, are diminished one-half. Contributions are so reduced, that we cannot pay our way; excommunications are so numerous as to cause the deepest anxiety; conversions, I fear, there are none. In consequence of the excessive droughts and prevailing epidemic, spiritual distress and depression are aggravated by poverty and affliction.

From Hayti we hear of a somewhat novel proceeding. At the first of a series of Wesleyan missionary meetings, held in the city of Cayes (160 miles from Port-au-Prince), the chairman, a native of Hayti, was a Roman Catholic. Cayes is inhabited by an entire Roman Catholic community, and Hayti is bound by a Concordat to Rome, yet the Wesleyan schools are full of Roman Catholic hearers. There is a widely-extended leaven of Protestantism throughout the length and breadth of the Haytian republic.

LABRADOR.

The Moravian mission-ship Harmony has, on several of her more recent annual voyages to the Arctic regions, encountered vast fields of ice. To avoid these, she last year sailed at a later date than usual. Her outward voyage occupied six weeks; no drift-ice was encountered, but the vessel passed between two streams of ice. The homeward voyage was accomplished in thirty days, amid very stormy weather, but all her passengers were in health on her arrival in the Downs. The intelligence brought by the Harmony is, on the whole, less encouraging than that of the previous twelve months. One of the missionary band, however—Mr. Kruth—had been suddenly removed by death, and others had suffered more or less severely in health. Among the Esquimaux there has again been much sickness:—

An epidemic, similar to that of the previous year, proved fatal to many whose constitutions were already enfeebled by sickness. Upwards of ninety deaths are reported in these four small congregations. Such a mortality is calculated to give rise to solemn thought as to what may be the purpose of the Lord in regard to this race. Yet there is a mournful satisfaction in the fact, that at all the stations the majority of those who were summoned into eternity fell asleep in Jesus. On the whole, the spiritual course of the congregations appear to have been satisfactory. The chastening of the Lord was attended with blessing.

At Hopedale, the discontented spirit which so much disquieted the missionaries the previous year is stated to have subsided. Several individuals who had withdrawn from them in a spirit of opposition and discontent, had expressed their sorrow and regret for their conduct, and asked permission to return.

The Nain missionaries report that so great was the mortality at that station, that fifteen corpses were buried at the same time. They remark upon the pleasure with which they observe that the Esquimaux are showing gratitude for their attentions; hitherto they have been sadly deficient in that quality.

At Okak the sickness and mortality were blessed to many, and a feeling of deeper seriousness was perceptible.

From Hebron the missionaries report six baptisms; but, as at other stations, there has been occasion for the exercise of church-discipline. Another source of discouragement is thus referred to:—

Visits from heathen Esquimaux have, as usual, occurred at intervals throughout the year, but they were not of a character to give us pleasure, as their aim was merely to trade or beg from us. Our visitors had been here before, and heard the Gospel proclaimed to them, but it had made no impression. Our repeated invitation to renounce their heathenish customs, and come and live within the sound of the Gospel, fell on deaf ears, and we saw them leave us again with hearts to all human appearance totally indifferent to the things that tend for their peace.

MORAVIAN MISSIONS.

The following statistics of the Missions of the Moravians, or United Brethren, for last year, have been lately issued:—

	MISSIONS.	Stations.	Missionary Agents.	Communicants.	Non-Communicants.	Candidates for Baptism, New People, Children.	Total.
1	Greenland	5	21	858	306	748	1,912
2	Labrador	4	35	370	273	513	1,156
3	North America.....	4	9	139	10	256	405
4	St. Thomas and St. Jan.....	5	10	1,342	163	1,828	3,333
5	St. Croix	3	8	1,706	137	2,021	3,864
6	Jamaica	13	31	4,327	1,171	8,220	13,718
7	Antigua.....	8	21	3,362	536	3,212	7,110
8	St. Kitts	4	10	1,274	280	1,501	3,055
9	Barbadoes.....	4	10	1,104	162	1,627	2,893
10	Tobago	2	6	846	141	1,137	2,124
11	Mosquito Coast	5	13	125	85	390	600
12	Surinam	13	70	3,598	7,374	16,575	27,547
13	South Africa.....	11	61	2,147	1,604	4,901	8,652
14	Australia	2	10	1	3	—	4
15	Thibet (Mongolia)	1	8	—	—	—	—
		84	323	21,199	12,245	42,929	76,373

Literature.

Life and Letters of Elizabeth, Last Duchess of Gordon. By Rev. A. MOODY STUART. Nisbet and Co.

APART from her elevated rank, the Duchess of Gordon was a rare example of conscientiousness and spiritual sincerity; and it was well that there should be placed on record the sacrifices which she made for Christ's sake and the Gospel. But in her walk through the world she saw so many things, and came in contact with so many of the excellent of the earth, and so many of the illustrious, that her life is more than usually interesting. It is here perpetuated by one qualified beyond all others, and who has brought to his labour of love not only the information derived from intimate acquaintance and the hearty appreciation of a warm yet discriminating sympathy, but a remarkable talent for picturesque and vivid narration. The volume will undoubtedly take a high and permanent place in our Christian literature.

Money: A Popular Exposition in Rough Notes. With Remarks on Stewardship and Systematic Beneficence. By T. BINNEY. Jackson, Walford, and Hodder.

THERE is a special appropriateness in the delivery of a popular exposition on the use and abuse of money in immediate proximity, on the one side, to the richest money-market in the world, and on the other, to that noble river whose mercantile marine is ever augmenting the national wealth, and doubtless largely increasing individual responsibility. The pastor of the Weigh-house was invited to bring before his congregation the claims of the "Systematic Beneficence" Society. This he intended to do in two discourses; but they grew into the fourteen which compose this volume. Of these, six are designed to show that "money may be a bad thing," and other six to proving that "money may be put to a very good use"—that use being purposes of religion and philanthropy; while the concluding two are respectively on "stewardship" and "systematic beneficence." Such subjects as these could not have fallen into better hands than Mr. Binney's; and his ability is shown not in weaving any ingenious theories or elaborating any of the superficial graces of style, but in just bringing the powers of a singularly vigorous and sanctified intellect to the task of honestly ascertaining and presenting the true import of the Divine utterances upon the theme on which he speaks. A very difficult book indeed it would be to refute; and if incapable of refutation, it is most admonitory in the contrast it suggests between the duty and the practice of professing Christians. Yet Mr. Binney takes no extreme views of the proper standard of Christian beneficence, and he admits that his treatment of the proof text of the best known promoter of that cause and of the "weekly offering" will hardly meet that gentleman's approval. With some persons the book will have all the greater weight. We most cordially commend it, as its intrinsic merits warrant, to the perusal of our readers.

Elijah and the Monarchy of Israel; or, National Idolatry. A Poem. By A. LAYMAN. Longman, Roberts, and Green. 1864.

THE preface to this volume contains some remarks on the fitness of the inspired records for poetical illustration, and references to a number of modern poets in proof of what is advanced. The poem is in a series of cantos, which are not all in the same measure, some being in blank verse and some in rhyme, and those in rhyme not all alike. From a literary point of view we have no complaint to make; the composition involves a few poetic licences, but no slovenliness, and the current of thought is clear and transparent; the Scriptures supply most of the matter, and hence a great part of the volume is a paraphrase of Biblical texts. From a doctrinal point of view, also, we have not observed anything savouring of unsound faith. We think, then, that the work may not only be safely read, but be read with pleasure, as a striking exhibition of things recorded in Holy Writ.

The Haunted Heart: A Parable for the Times. Elliot Stock.

THE parable of the "haunted heart" is suggested by a haunted house, which, as in all such cases, is the talk of gossips and the object of superstitious dread. It would seem to owe its appearance in print to its appropriateness to these days of "ghostly exhibitions and of ghost clubs, of séances in the dark and of mediums and manifestations." Following our Lord's comparison in Matt. xii. 43—45, of the heart of the unregenerate to a human habitation, this parable, in its main features, has the highest authority, it is fraught with the most practical lessons, and is calculated to be productive of the best results. It can be read in less than half-an-hour, and may be usefully circulated among such as seek to know all spiritual phenomena except those which concern them most.

Home in Humble Life. Religious Tract Society. As the title indicates, this is a domestic tale of humble life. It is written by one who has become acquainted with the subject, and who is anxious to instruct and profit others. The incidents are simply and naturally related.

Monthly Retrospect.

FOREIGN.

ANCE has been violently agitated from end to end during the past month. Protestants and Romanists alike, though from different causes, have been stirred to their depths, and the agitation has brought up whatever of good or evil there is in either. We must, in the first place, congratulate our readers on the victory which the Orthodox Protestants have gained the success of their candidates for the Presbyterial Council of Paris, by a narrow but decided majority over their Rationalistic opponents. They have carried their whole list with the exception of M. Guizot. We believe that political as well as religious prejudices were ought to bear against him, and that this accounts for his position on the poll. But, with this exception, the friends of revealed truth have succeeded in carrying all their candidates. The importance of this success is hardly to be exaggerated. Both sides were aware that it was a life and death struggle, and put in requisition every resource they could muster to secure the returns of their respective nominees. The Rationalists put great stress on arguments with which we, on this side the Channel, are familiar from the lips of their English representatives—on the duties of charity, tolerance, forbearance. This charity and tolerance of theirs, however, does not prevent them from airing the views, depreciating the attainments, and maligning the motives of all who are from them. Even we ourselves, in our humble sphere, do not escape the sweep of their wide-spread and bitter censures. The organ of the party, the Lien, describes Evangelical Christendom as having represented Professor Jean Monod as a heterodox person, and informs the French Protestants that we have, on this ground, been engaged in "openly attacking" M. Monod. We need not remind our readers that this is a complete misrepresentation.* We only allude to this personal matter as illustrative of the unscrupulous and unceasing efforts of the heterodox party to malign and to misrepresent all who dare oppose their views. We heartily rejoice in their defeat; and though we would not be understood to attach too much importance to the Orthodox success, as if the life and spirit of the Christian Church were to depend upon outward organizations, we cannot but hope that the noble stand for truth and godliness which the Church of Paris have now displayed, will be herald of a brighter day for the Reformed Churches of France.

The Encyclical Letter of the Pope is addressed to all archbishops and bishops of the Catholic Church throughout the world. It is a gage of defiance thrown down to the principle of liberty of opinion, both in politics and religion, in every constitutional State. It is, then, that the agitation which it has caused is almost wholly confined to France? It is true that even in such intensely Roman Catholic countries as Spain and Portugal the publication of the Encyclical has been opposed; but it is felt instinctively that France, and France alone, must bear the brunt of the conflict of ideas it has excited. And the instinct is right. There can be no doubt that the Encyclical is the Pope's answer—really, though formally, intended as such—to the recent Franco-Italian Convention. The two secular States have agreed together that the Pope shall not be allowed to reclaim those provinces which, only a few years ago, were under his undisturbed sway, and that he shall be left without protection for those that still remain to him. The Pope replies by fulfilling a decree which naturally strikes at the foundation on which both those secular Governments are founded. The sovereigns appeal to material power—the Pope wields that spiritual force which has come down to him through the hereditary superstition of centuries. Which of these will prove the strongest? Our esteemed correspondent, "X. X. X.," reasons in his letter the opinion of all enlightened Protestants, when he treats the predictions of the aged man on the banks of the Tiber as fit subject only for ridicule; but we are not sure that they will be so regarded in those quarters to which it is more immediately addressed. We must not forget that in vast districts of Europe the name of the Pope is still a powerful spell to conjure with. Already we observe the missive has raised up conflict between the Church and the State in France—a large majority of the bishops having remonstrated against the decree of the Minister, forbidding them to promulgate the Encyclical, while two, at least, have openly disobeyed the order, and defied the Government to do its worst. Never before was France so stirred with a religious question. We can only hope and pray that God has some grand end to accomplish in these unwonted agitations.

* We have made no attack whatever upon M. Jean Monod, but we have felt it a pleasure to set our esteemed correspondent's encomium of the son of a departed friend. (Evangelical Christ., 1864, 2d.) Our own words, referring to the new professor, were (p. 540): "In his theological views, he is what might be called a Liberal Orthodox." We then gave the principal part of his confession of faith, accompanying it with the remark that, if it were not "in certain details so explicit as might be desired, it is very widely removed from such a profession of faith as could be made by the Rationalistic party." This the Lien calls "openly attacking" M. Jean Monod as heterodox!

In Italy the Encyclical is taken more quietly. We do not hear that the King's Government have forbidden its promulgation, and the missive thus left unheeded has been deprived of much of its point. A good deal of stir has been made about the adherence of Cardinal d'Andrea to the Italian Government, and his refusal to leave Naples at the bidding of the Pope. But it now appears that when, in 1848, the Pope fled to Gaeta, d'Andrea, then simple priest, stayed behind, became a violent Liberal, wormed himself into all the secrets of the Triumvirate which then governed Rome, and regularly transmitted them to the master. For this service he was afterwards advanced to the cardinal dignity. It is, at least, curious to find him professing Liberalism a second time, and there is no security that the second conversion is more sincere than the first.

We refer with pleasure to the communications of our correspondents from Germany and Sweden, as containing some interesting details of the state of religion in both these countries. We class them together, for in truth they possess much in common, and also some things of absolute contrast. Our Swedish correspondent would hardly agree with our German brother in the justice of the German war on Denmark; but in the higher and more vital matters of spiritual life, in the necessity for defending the faith once committed to the saints, they are of one heart and one mind. The love of Christ overpasses the love of country, and the bond of the one Spirit there is neither Swede, nor Dane, nor German, nor Englishman—all are one in Christ Jesus. With respect to the Danish question, it will be seen that one knows what the fate of the Duchies is finally to be.

From the letter of our Constantinople correspondent, it will be seen that all questions affecting liberty of conscience are treated to the full satisfaction of the missionaries, in the absence of Sir Henry Bulwer. Mr. Stuart, the Chargé d'Affaires, understands his duties to the English missionaries and the native converts in the same sense that Lord Stratford de Redcliffe understood them, and all others connected with the Embassy, except Sir Henry Bulwer. Nor does it appear that Mr. Stuart's remonstrances against those outbreaks of Mussulman persecution which from time to time occur in the provinces are ever followed by those dreadful consequences of the downfall of the Ministry and the loss of English influence which haunted the dreams of Sir Henry Bulwer. Our correspondent mentions one or two of such cases where the complaints were received most courteously at head-quarters, and were met at least the promise of redress. We can only hope that Earl Russell will not allow the professions and the acts of a long life to be falsified at the last by the obstinacy of a diplomatic subordinate.

It gives us much pleasure to call attention to accounts from our colonies in New South Wales and British Columbia. The first gives an account of a union between the Presbyterian Churches in that colony, of which the only matter to be regretted is that it does not seem to have been as complete as it might have been. The article referring to British Columbia details a remarkable work of God which has taken place among the natives there, through the instrumentality of a devoted missionary, Mr. Duncan. We shall attempt to abridge the narrative, lest we spoil the pleasure we are sure our readers will derive from perusing it at length.

The news that has reached us from America in the course of the month is singular interest, and very disastrous for the cause of the South. General Sherman successfully accomplished his daring march through the heart of Georgia, seizing Savannah the chief town on the coast, and intending to make it the base of his future operations. The Confederate General Hood endeavoured to do as much in the State of Tennessee; there he was encountered, defeated, and driven back, with immense loss, rendering him unable to undertake any serious operation for a long time to come. The only reverse sustained by the Federals was an inglorious repulse from Wilmington, where a great combined land and sea force, got together at great expense, returned without effecting anything. In the South the question of arming the negroes has been revived and discussed with increased vigour, and it is said that the Confederate Government have at last made their minds to arm and organise 200,000 negroes, promising them freedom, of course, a reward of their services. There are even some among them who advocate a general emancipation of the slaves, believing that this is the only obstacle that stands in the way of the recognition of the Confederacy by England and France. Of course, we at home know better; but we may congratulate ourselves that through however confused and bloody a war—a war in the making of which we have had no part—the emancipation of the negro is at last about to be accomplished.

HOME.

In accordance with a custom now we rejoice to think of some years' standing, the first week of the new year was devoted to prayer. We need not explain to our readers that it has become an established institution that in the first week of January Christians of every denomination, and in all countries—all who call on the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, both their Lord and ours—should unite in invoking His mercy, and in the prayer that God would bless His Church and make her a blessing. Our returns from the places in which the week was thus devotionally observed are necessarily imperfect; but enough has already been ascertained to make it plain that the appeal this year has been answered as widely, as readily, and as earnestly as it has ever been before. And there are good reasons why this should be the case. For there has been no period since the Reformation—perhaps we might say there has been no period since the beginning of Christianity—when the Church was passing through a more anxious and interesting crisis than at the present moment. On the one hand, there is a manifest, and, we fear, a growing tendency to return to the more subtle corruptions of Romanism. On the other, the most daring speculations on the very foundations of revealed truth are openly indulged in, and the very idea of supernaturalism is attempted to be eliminated from a religion which, if not supernatural, is something. The two sources of error naturally act and react upon each other; the follies of superstition provoking the rash to infidelity, while the evils of infidelity drive the timid to superstition; and the Church of Christ is called upon to fight the battle of the Reformation over again at the precise time that she has to defend from subtle assaults the very foundations of all revealed truth. Who is sufficient for these things? Not, certainly, the existing generation of Christians, in their own strength. We rejoice, indeed, to think that while the enemies of the truth are overflowing with zeal and activity, the advocates of Evangelical religion are not standing still. In numbers, in activity, in earnestness, and in intelligence, we believe they will bear comparison with their foes either on the one side of the arena or the other. The point on which they do not enter into competition with them is in the supercilious and self-asserting tone of superior intelligence which both parties of our opponents are so apt to assume. But to our minds the most hopeful sign of the times, the best evidence of our having champions richly endowed and equipped with all that is needful for the pending conflict, is to be found in the earnest spirit of prayer that year after year is proved to pervade with an ever-increasing vitality all Evangelical denominations in all parts of the world. In this most blessed fact we recognise the presence of our Lord himself moving through His hosts and marshalling them for the battle. So it has ever been. "When the enemy cometh in like a flood, the Spirit of the Lord will lift up a standard against him." And in such an attitude of the Church her final victory is assured.

It is not in prayer alone that the New Year opens auspiciously. The Church is rich not in supplications only, but also in good works. We have alluded in our Home Intelligence to the efforts making by the Archbishop of York to provide for the spiritual wants of the large towns in the West Riding; and we may state here that the Bishop of Durham has commenced, in his diocese, a fund for Church objects akin to that commenced by the Bishop of London, which is making satisfactory progress. The Bishop of London held a meeting of his board only a few days ago, at which he stated that his scheme for raising 100,000*l.* a-year, for ten years, had so far been realised, that 100,000*l.* had been raised for the first year, and 70,000*l.* had been promised for the year following. It was hardly to be expected, he said, that some of the splendid donations he had already received would be annually repeated; but on the other hand, he had great expectations of the liberality of the Church extending over a more extended area in future years, and being drawn from still wider sources.

A curious case of the abduction of a girl by the Roman Catholic inmates of the Compton Oratory has created some excitement in London during the past month. A mother came to a police magistrate to complain that her daughter, who had just attained the age when the law allowed her to act for herself, had been enticed from her home by one of the Fathers of the Oratory. The magistrate had the Romish priest before him, and afterwards saw the girl herself; and his impression was that the girl had gone astray, and that the object of the priest had been directed to obtain her a refuge in one of the Roman Catholic asylums for penitent women. Even if so, the stealthy manner in which this was done, and the refusal to take the mother into their confidence, or even to allow her access to her own child, was highly censurable; but to excuse this, or perhaps some more ulterior object, the priests of the Oratory commenced a series of attempts to blacken the character of the mother. What is still more extraordinary, it appears she has been the victim of the persecution for years; and the only reason that can be discovered is, that having once been a Roman Catholic, she has since left their communion. Of course, we cannot vouch for her character, though no tangible fact has been yet alleged against her that has not been satisfactorily explained. There is evidently more in the case than would at first sight appear, and we are glad, therefore, that a number of Protestant gentlemen have taken up the matter and are determined to probe it to the utmost.

Popery has been rather unfortunate in the law courts of this country during the past month. In the Rolls Court the friends of a deceased Roman Catholic gentleman who had married a Protestant wife proposed to take the daughter, the only issue of the marriage, from the care of the mother, on the plea that the child ought to be brought up in the religion of her father. Sir John Romilly very properly held that no relation could make up to a child for the loss of a mother's care, and refused the application. It is to be regretted that the learned judge, in deciding the case, did not confine himself to the statement that he did not sit there to decide theological disputes, but volunteered his opinion that one religion was just as good as the other. In the Dublin Courts the judge decided that a will which a Roman Catholic gentleman had made for the support of two priests of the order of St Dominic was void, on the ground that it was contrary to the policy of the Emancipation Act of 1829, which prohibited orders of monks from residing in this country.

The attempts of some of the railway companies in Scotland to run, not passenger trains only, but goods trains as well, on the Sabbath, has produced great excitement through the country. The friends of the Sabbath, it should be understood, have always protested their opposition to the running of passenger trains on the Lord's-day; and several railways, in deference to the national feeling, have forborne to run any such trains. The greatest offender against the rule, we believe, is the North British, which, not contented with running passenger trains, has lately begun to run Sabbath goods trains as well. This has called forth a spirit of opposition in quarters which had before been quiescent, and remonstrances, memorials, petitions, and deputations have all been resorted to, in order to stop this innovation; and all, we regret to say, have been used in vain. The chairman of the company defends the practice, and his fellow directors have adopted, and persists in outraging the feelings of the great portion of the community. For this wanton act the flimsiest excuses are given, but the real reason, of course, is the lust of gain.

THE ECCLESIASTICAL ELECTIONS IN PARIS.

Since the pages containing our Paris Letter were at press we have received from our correspondent the following

POSTSCRIPT.

Paris, January 25, Evening.

The result of the elections has just been declared. The Orthodox have the majority. Five of the six candidates on their list have been brought in, but not M. Guizot. The voting was as follows:—

Laffon de Ladébat (on both lists)...	2,438	† Gros	1,281
* Mallet	1,796	* Guizot	1,279
* Vernes	1,840	† Duméril	1,263
* Chabaud Latour	1,339	† Fabre	1,260
* André	1,337	† Clamageran	1,247
† Barbezat	1,306

The telegrams in the daily journals announce that a fresh vote will have to be taken to decide whether M. Guizot or a candidate of the opposite party is elected; but this, it will be seen, is not confirmed by our own information.

* Orthodox.

† Soi-disant Liberal.

Evangelical Christendom.

LIGHT FROM THE BATTLE-FIELD.

EVERY effect is heightened by contrast. The bright summer day, breaking the death-like uniformity of the wintry year, has a beauty and a radiance for the native of Nova Zembla which the Italian, as he languishes in the rich sunshine, softened by clustering vine leaves, never knew. The delicate tracery that takes the light on some massive front of architecture shows to greater advantage from the breadths of shade against which it is relieved. The floweret that has struggled with Alpine snows has a fairer and sweeter smile than that which has been nursed in the brooding warmth of the plains, and the solitary palm-tree gains new verdure from the waste of encircling sand. In the same way, and for the same reason, the tender and kindly emotions of our nature are most thrillingly displayed on a theatre on which terror, hatred, and revenge play their parts. War is a thing of horror at the best, but it is generally felt that the conflict now raging in America presents war in an aspect more than usually ghastly and appalling. The magnitude of the armies engaged; the fearful totals of slaughter; the anger and detestation which have divided States so long associated in a common heritage of glory, and inhabited by a people one in blood; the sad spectacle of a commerce prostrated, the hands of industry hanging down, or uplifted only to shape the sword on the anvil or wield it on the battle-field, the merchant ship rotting in harbour, the armed squadrons sealing up all ports, wide territories laid in desolation—these things, and many more like these, have impressed the imagination of Europe, and led men to believe that never until this nineteenth century did war appear so horrible and so heart-rending. The more affecting, then, is the contrast when we perceive, amid the gloom of these American battle-fields, the sacred illumination of Christian tenderness, and find that it has softened and triumphed over the passions which tumultuate in this awful war. Should it turn out that the might of Christian love has received in this conflict an illustration more striking than that it has obtained in the wars of Europe, we may see grounds to qualify the severity of that judgment which most British observers are inclined to pronounce upon the combatants on both sides.

In the very agony of these American battles, while the roar of artillery is shaking the earth, and bursting shells spread destruction around them, and charge after charge passes over the disputed ground, the eye may fall upon certain ubiquitous persons, who concern themselves with the wounded and dying. They wear coarse clothes, they carry a bucket of water or coffee, a blanket, a towel and soap, various stores, such as dried beef, biscuits, beef-tea in cakes, a lantern and matches, and a Bible. On their coarse clothes is a badge, bearing the words "United States Christian Commission." One is tenderly assaying to prop the head of a dying soldier, so as to give him more ease in his last moments, and whispering to him of salvation freely offered in Christ Jesus. Another is removing the clotted garments from a wounded limb and "bathing it with almost a mother's care." A third closes the eyes of one who has departed, not forgetting to take from his forehead a lock of hair to be sent as a memorial to his friends. "Yonder"—the words are those of one who wears the badge and does the work of the Commission, "passes a delegate with a pail of ice-cold lemonade, or milk-punch, and here comes one with some canteens full of water for parched lips and aching wounds." Or it is night, and silence has sunk over injunction between friend and foe. Whether on the field or in the hospital, instructed to attend to the wants of Confederates as well as of Federal soldiers, the testimonial signed by sixty Confederate officers, who, as prisoners of war, express the kindness of the delegates, bears witness that this injunction is complied with and that the delegates "make no difference or discrimination between the two parties, relieving alike the sufferings and wants of the Confederate and Federal soldiers and officers." They add that they "sincerely trust that the authorities of England and elsewhere will treat any of the said delegates that may fall into their hands with the kindness justly due to them, and grant them a speedy return to their work."

Let the Americans, upon whose ferocity we are so ready to cry out, credit of this notable fact. The ladies of Great Britain, headed by Miss Nightingale, won immortal honour by their ministry of kindness to the sick and wounded in the Crimean campaign; but their services, if not actually restricted to their own men, were in the first instance exclusively intended for the British soldiers. It is commonly believed that the hatred with which the contending powers of America are animated far transcends that with which the Russians were animated by the Allies in the late war; but, if so, there is at least a power in the moral influence of the United States to control or overrule the feeling.

But this indiscriminate dealing out of the benefits of the United States Christian Commission to friend and foe throws us back upon the origin of the institution. Its source is marked by the word "Christian" in its title. The Government failed to set on foot an agency for attending to the wants of sick and wounded soldiers, and the agency in question—the United States Sanitary Commission—was unknown to those who have watched the progress of the war. But the United States Christian Commission was the spontaneous product of Christian philanthropy in the States. The organization was commenced by a convention of delegates of Young Men's Christian Associations, held in New York in the month of November, 1861. The Young Men's Christian Associations throughout the United States carried out the project. In principle and in detail the institution was planned from the first. It bestowed no pecuniary reward upon its delegates on account of their labour of love. It brought aid to suffering bodies and perishing souls.

, or the war-ship. The Young Men's Christian Associations throughout the United States undertook the task of providing funds ; and in the single year of 1863 raised the sum of 358,239 dollars. In the form of stores, and of railway accommodation gratuitously offered, they received nearly double this amount again. An estimate of the extent of their operations may be formed from the fact that in 1863 they distributed nearly half-a-million Bibles, upwards of 370,000 books of psalms and hymns, about twelve million pages of tracts, and an enormous number of religious books, magazines, and newspapers.

It is not the least gratifying or instructive circumstance connected with this movement that it originated and has been carried on by Young Men's Christian Associations. It is often alleged in this country that societies of the kind have no practical object or mission, but begin and end in amiable talk. The public hardly recognise those associations as a power in the land. The United States Christian Commission is a demonstration of what they may become if they act in unison and animated by a noble purpose. We are not prepared to say, however, that Young Men's Christian Associations have ramified so widely in England, or are so well organised, as in the United States. The circumstances we have mentioned put it beyond doubt that the young men of America, who have bound themselves together as the servants of Christ, are numerous enough and influential enough to lay hold of the entire framework of society. The fact speaks volumes for the reality and power of Christian religion in America, and there are not a few in England on whom this conclusion requires to be impressed. Their faith in Christianity is strong, but, half unconsciously, they link that faith with the coexistence of the institutions of Great Britain. Our excellent friend Mr. Newdegate, for example, gave public expression to his conviction that the war in America came about from lack of an Establishment religion similar to that presented by the Church of England. All honour to that arch ; readers are aware that it is not in these pages that ought will be said against her. But the Almighty can keep afloat the ark of Divine truth in the midst of the tossing of the waves of democracy, and to speak as if it could be safe only when in the harbour of British State protection is not to honour the British Constitution, but to dishonour the truth and to impugn the word of its Divine Protector. Christian religion in America has been assailed by every wind of doctrine—has been shaken by controversies, encompassed by foes, allowed a fair field but no favour against who chose to gainsay it. The result at this moment is that those young men who are bold enough for the Lord of Hosts, to go apart and declare openly that Him they serve, are numerous enough to constitute what is obviously and undeniably a national organization throughout the United States. We confess that, at a time when it has made so large inroads upon the faith of young men in Great Britain, when many are ready to tell us that Christianity is a thing for the old and for the conventionally respectable, we derive infinite consolation from the fact that, in a land where opinion is as free as the wind, and where infidelity has used all its enchantments, the rising generation, the bone and sinew of young America, waxing in manhood and strength, are avowedly and zealously Christian. In the history of the United States Christian Commission, originated, organised, to a great extent constituted, by Christian young men, we seem to hear the voice of the Lord once more saying, "Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith?"

Like the Young Men's Christian Associations with which it originated, the United States Christian Commission does not recognise in its organization the denominational peculiarities of Protestants. Agreeing in devotion to one Lord, and inspired by a common purpose, its delegates act not as Episcopalians, Congregationalists, Presbyterians, but as Christians. They are selected from all branches of note of the preparation being made for the coming of the Lord, ought to be the result of this universal disposition of Bible-believers to sink denominational differences and combine in acts of faith and labours of love.

It is an obvious suggestion from what we have seen that the Young Men's Christian Associations of Great Britain might do well to follow the example of their brethren in America. True, there is no war raging in England to put the necessity of their philanthropy to the test, no battle-fields on which they are to be wounded, or bring the smile of Christian hope over the face of dying anguish. The delegates of the Christian Commission are to be found not only on the battlefield but in the hospital; and we see no reason why the Christian young men of Great Britain should not organise in all our cities a system of visitation to hospitals and asylums. It would no doubt be necessary to observe the rules of prudence and caution in carrying out the scheme. Neither the authorities nor the public would tolerate an invasion of infirmaries and hospitals by prying and forward lads in offering advice, and, it might be, aggravating disease by intemperate zeal. judicious as well as earnestly pious young men were selected for the work, they were directed in all instances to act in co-operation with the medical officers and chaplains of the establishments visited, no evil, but much good, might, with Divine blessing, attend their labours. Their presence would exert an influence in favour of attention, punctuality, cleanliness, and general efficiency on the medical officials. They would exercise a real though informal surveillance in the institutions, to the benefit of the public, and the effect would undoubtedly be great. To the sick and dying, the benefit would be incalculable. It is the bitterest portion in the cup of suffering whose ailments are treated in public institutions that at the time when they most eminently require the ministry of kindness, they are left to the mechanical attentions of officialism. It is of unbought and unpurchasable charity that they stand in need, and no task could be worthier of Christian young men, no work more congenial with the spirit of the Christian religion, and the teaching of Christ and His apostles than to afford it them. Meanwhile, let us be thankful that, as there are moments of calm in the wildest tempests, and starry gleams in the darkest nights, a light of Christian tenderness and love has reached us from the terrible battle-lone, the manner, the accompaniments of our services, are as offensive to the Deity as they were of old.

That much of our public worship is of an acceptable character, we may humbly venture to trust. Very many are they whose resort to the altar of God on the day of rest "with exceeding joy" is the expression of the spirit in which the other six days are habitually passed. They look forward to an eternity of worship, and therefore lift a willing and a kindling eye towards the heavenly Jerusalem, as they traverse the stages of their earthly pilgrimage.

This, however, is far from being a true description of many among us, who, in a church-going age, frequent the temple-courts, and bear the name of "worshippers." The late arrival, the indevout posture in prayer, the languid and mechanical manner, the aspect of intellectual indifference depicted on the countenance—all these things demonstrate that, at least in many cases, the "heart is far" from the God who is professedly adored. It may assist us to avoid such errors if we consider the Scripture doctrine on preparation for drawing near to God.

The public worship of the Most High is the highest exercise of the human faculties. It is the act in which we are most closely assimilated to the inhabitants of heaven. But it must be added that, in the present condition of our nature, in which the senses exert more than a due influence upon us, it is the most difficult act to which we can be summoned, and therefore one which requires the largest amount of disciplinary preparation. It requires careful preparation of thought on the mercies and glories of God to sing His praise "in the spirit and with the understanding also." It requires preparation of thought on the presence, the power, and the majesty of God, to enable us to offer a sacrifice of intelligent adoration. It requires preparatory thought on our own sins and necessities, before we can rightly humble ourselves before the Holy One, or rightly ask for grace to help in time of need. And it requires preparation of heart before we can reverently either speak or hear that Word, which must be engrafted upon our minds ere we can bring forth the fruit of holy living, or "flourish in the courts of our God." It is easy, and it is too common, to speak almost with pity of the "ascetic and contemplative piety" of our forefathers; but to rush out of the whirlwind of earthly pursuits into the sanctuary of God, and after a few minutes spent in listening dreamily, rather than in thinking, to rush back again, is not conduct which the Lord will reward with the revelation of His glory. Here, as elsewhere, it is true, "With what measure we mete it shall be measured to us again."

In looking into the records of ancient religion, we find that the weakness of human nature and the excellent brightness of the Divine Majesty were alike recognised by holy men of old, in their days of preparation for special meetings with God. When Jacob was about to revisit Bethel to worship God, he "said unto his household, and to all that were with him, Put away the strange gods that are among you, and be clean, and change your garments." When the Israelites were about to receive the law, Moses sanctified the people, and commanded them to be ready against the third day. The Lord said, "Go unto the people, sanctify them to-day and to-morrow, and let them wash their clothes, for the third day the Lord will come down upon Mount Sinai in the sight of all the people." When Aaron and his sons were consecrated to the priests' office, a prolonged and elaborate ceremonial of livers washings and carnal ordinances set forth to the eye the sacredness of the unction to which they were appointed as the servants of the King Invisible. When David, and Solomon, and Hezekiah, and Ezra, and Nehemiah celebrated their great anniversaries, the people "sanctified themselves beforehand according to the sanctification of the sanctuary," because "the Lord their God was holy." When the Messiah

Episcopal communities, and in the days of fasting and prayer among the before covenants, ordinations, and solemn acts of state. It is only in modern times that it has been discovered that a religious man can pass six days of the week immersed in the deepest mire of earthly business, yet rise late on Sunday, with a clean heart into the sanctuary, footsore and weary, to present an acceptable sacrifice before the King of kings.

PREPARE, then, yet not in gloom or sorrow, "to meet thy God!" I understand in what this preparation consists. It is true that, even in a spiritual dispensation, it is necessary that some time of consideration should be given to public worship, but the one essential preparation for Christian worship is the Christian life. He who devotes six days and nights to the flesh and senses, and devotes the remaining seventh day to the worship of God in spirit and truth, his Sabbatic spirit must be diffused throughout the whole of human existence, and he can truly enter into Christ's rest on the Lord's-day. He whose life, outward and inward, during the week is passed at the rate of movement with which he rusheth into the battle, is not the man who will suddenly make a halt, and stand before God on the Sunday, What have I done? Is there not a lie in my mouth? The seventh day will be passed in the spirit of the other six. His work will partake of the quality of work. No man's songs will be nobler than his. No man's prayers will much excel his practice. No man's attention to God will surpass the measures of his obedience in daily life. If a man spends the week in unwholesome scheming, he will not pass the Sunday in communion with the God of truth. If men earn their living after the manner of foxes during the week, they will not once in seven days become as "harmless as doves." If a man is in disorder through "making haste to be rich," he cannot avoid confusion during the prayers and sermons of the sacred recess, how he shall meet his engagements on the morrow. He who, through imprudence or over-trust, is always on the verge of bankruptcy, will bring a bankrupt soul as his offering "to God." He will "vow and offer a corrupt thing." We see, then, the importance of habitual inward religion. An empty, or a trifling, or a covetous, or a selfish spirit, cannot be miraculously transformed as it crosses the threshold of the sanctuary. Character is formed during the week, and that character we bring to our

Above all, there must prevail in the mind an exalted conception of the glorious object of worship—of that God the thought of whom should burn like the flaming sun in the firmament of our intellectual being. We must think far more than is customary with us upon that which we know of the KING ETERNAL, IMMORTAL, INVISIBLE, before whom we are invited “to stand.” The revelation of the Gospel is founded upon the previous revelation of God in Judaism, and Judaism in turn is founded on the previous revelation of God in nature. As Christians, we are expected to remember the former revelations, and neither to forget nor despise them. Deity became incarnate not in order that men might lose the grand, and ancient, and ennobling thoughts of God’s Almightyness; but that we might unite those lofty conceptions of the Eternal Being with a faith in His gracious conversableness with sinful men. Yet it is to be feared that all that some persons have learned from the incarnation of the Son is to forget and condemn the infinite majesty of the FATHER. They “know Christ after the flesh,” and have never penetrated through the thin veil of His human countenance to the Divinity within. Else, whence this absence of the sublime element in their religion—this petty formalism of sectarian phrase—this too familiar address to the Invisible Frequenter of their devotional assemblies—this indevout leanness in holy song, in prayer, and in the hearing of the Word. A little mind can believe only in little gods, like the Lares and Penates of Paganism. But the true God is the Great Spirit and the everlasting King; and those who do not approach Him with “godly fear” know Him not.

For is it not true that we design in worship an approach to the God revealed in nature—the unseen spiritual Cause of all the material phenomena cognisable by the senses? If we do not, then is our worship wasted breath. If we do, then let us reflect as well as we are able, whensoever we ascend the temple stairs, upon the power of that awful and mysterious Being to whom—children of the dust—we presume to bring an offering. Think of Him habitually in the works of His hands! Think of the earth on which we stand—on whose thin crust we assemble for this worship! Is not this globe, that flies with seventy times the speed of a cannon-shot round the sun, itself a sphere of FIRE, of “elements that melt with fervent heat,” from whose incandescent blaze we are protected only by a shell of rocks and waters? Is it not fearful to consider the “consuming fire,” whose presence beneath our feet three hundred active volcanoes indicate to us? Is not the very thought of a Being powerful enough to uplift mountains and continents with a word, and to pour out oceans “from the hollow of His hand,” sufficient to strike awe into our souls? Fear ye not me, who have set the sand as a bound for the sea by a perpetual decree? Shall we not bend in deepest veneration before that Everlasting Mind which of old laid the foundations of the earth—which set in operation the system of world-reducing causes and effects—which created and maintains the wonder-working chemistry of suns and planets—which decreed in number and proportion the laws of combination and the relations of the elements—whose wise Will alone, operating among the fiery, and electric, and gaseous forces, prevents the conflagration of nature and the explosion of the universe? Shall we not “put off our shoes from off our feet” on that “holy ground” where the Eternal Beauty reveals itself in the loveliness of changing skies and seasons, in all the marvellous bloom and foliage of flowers and fruits, and still more in the occasional angelic sweetness of the “human face divine”? The voice of the Lord shaketh the wilderness—yet breathes in fragrant zephyrs in the evening wind. When we sit at our tent-door in the twilight of time, and this Eternal Splendour visits us in His grace, shall we not bow down like Abraham, with our “faces to the ground,” and confess that we are but “dust and ashes”? And when the ceaseless reproduction of life around the earth, in the air, in the waters, on the dry land, assures us of the unremitting action of the Power which at first called all things out of nothing; and the daily supply of food to living creature (whose numbers defy either arithmetic to describe or imagination to conceive demonstrates the perpetual operation of a Goodness before which "not one of them is forgotten,"—shall we not present ourselves before Him with thoughts that at least lose themselves in His "excellent glory," and with humility that at least offers the sacrifice of a conscious and confessed insignificance? "All nations before Him as as nothing, yea, less than nothing, and vanity."

Here, however, we see but a "part of His ways." The Almighty has written His glory upon the skies. He has flung open the vast scroll of the heaven heavens, and bidden us read there anew in lines of light somewhat of His unsearchable glory. Lift up your eyes on high. Who hath created all these? Ah, who? Is it not "our God" who, amidst this wilderness of worlds, whose interwoven circuit scorn the computations of man, and whose incalculable numbers are lost to our thought in faint luminous clouds on the surrounding darkness, reveals some shadow gleams of a nature whose living forces transcend the utmost endeavours of created mind even to imagine? "This God is our God." And is this the Being whom some mortals think it safe to trifle with in a late, a languid, and a perfunctory devotion? Well do we affirm that the worship of this "great and mighty and terrible God" is an impossibility except to the man who "walks with Him," and daily remembers His omnipotence. Better by far an external ceremonial, whose outward magnificence and solemnity ensures an external reverence, than a pretended spiritual worship which is neither beautiful outwardly, nor reverential within. An unadorned religion presents a fearful trial, and ensures a terrible exposure of character to ungodly men for he who, under such circumstances, does not possess the spirit of adoration, soon comes to dispense even with the form.

Of the things which we have spoken this is the sum. In order to the acceptable worship of the LIVING GOD, there must be a large measure of personal and domestic preparation; a reflection which at once condemns many prevailing customs of the age. In the higher circles of society Saturday night is generally chosen for the time of the most select assemblies. In the middle and lower ranks it is, with some noble exceptions, the chief time of hard trading and hard work. Vast are the numbers of persons who on that night go jaded and late to rest, and who find themselves accordingly half asleep with weariness during the whole of Sunday. So complicated are the relations of English business, that it is difficult to lay down any absolute rule of action; so that we must content ourselves with uttering formative ideas nobler than the prevailing usages, and with expressing the hope that some day the "necessities of trade" will not forbid the observation of Saturday evening in the Church as the "preparation of the Sabbath." The worship of God is a spiritual act, very difficult to those whose whole attention is absorbed in material things. It requires knowledge, reflection, private prayer. And when once churches have learned thus to prepare themselves for God's service, they learn something more; they will learn that God will reveal himself in the public assemblies as He seldom does now. The Father will "reward openly" those who have thus "prayed to Him in secret."

Let not sloth, then, be our Sunday morning offering to the God with whom we hope to "live for ever." Let us rise early enough to offer a private prayer, an earnest prayer to heaven for the Spirit of aid, and to institute a searching self-examination. Let the house-mother so order her household, that Sunday morning shall not be inaugurated by lateness and disorder. A good woman is to "guide the house," and let her guide it so that all the family shall feel the blessings of prevailing system and energy. In vain are holy sermons and devout church influences, if the same influences are irritating, depressing, and ignoble. Our nature is one. Body and mind must work together towards every end that is wise and good. A family must make a business of it if they intend to worship God; and if they do not intend to make it the chief business of the week, they had better not insult the Divine Majesty with a slothful imitation of the "worship in spirit and in truth." "Be not deceived; God is not mocked; whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap."

E. W.

THE SYRIAN PROTESTANT COLLEGE.*

In our January number we mentioned that the Rev. Daniel Bliss, D.D., for many years one of the Syrian Missionaries of the American Board, was in London, on his way from America, to take charge of the Syrian Protestant College about to be established at Beyrout, and of which he has been appointed President. We are glad to say that Dr. Bliss is still in this country, and by his clear and simple statements of what the American Missions have done, and are doing, in Syria, he has deeply interested all who have heard his public and private addresses. Their work is indeed a noble one, and has been crowned with marked success. In every part of Syria in which their Missions have been established, the invariable testimony of our countrymen who have had the opportunity of judging of it on the spot, is that their work is real, and their statements true.

In regard to the effect of their labours in Northern Syria, we would call attention to the testimony of Mr. Skene, Her Majesty's Consul at Aleppo, in a letter written in 1858, from Aintab—a town of Forty-five Thousand inhabitants, One Thousand Four Hundred of whom had become Protestants, through the instrumentality of the American Missionaries—"those most able and worthy servants of Christ," as Mr. Skene calls them. "This" [Aintab, the Consul writes] "is the metropolis of Oriental Protestantism—here the reformation worked out by the American Missionaries has its head-quarters, and is represented by no less than Fourteen Hundred persons. The Presbyterian Church of Killis numbers One Hundred members; that of Birjek Fifty, Marash One Thousand, Diarbekir Four Hundred, Urfa Forty, Aleppo Thirty, Beitias One Hundred, Kissab Five Hundred, and Yekolook One Hundred; in all, THREE THOUSAND SEVEN HUNDRED AND TWENTY in Northern Syria alone. Education as well as preaching the Gospel has been spread to a great extent, schools having been established by the American Missionaries in every considerable place in the province. Besides those which are merely elementary, there are theological classes for the preparation of natives for the ministry, upper schools affording classical and scientific tuition, and a girls' boarding-school, under the enlightened charge of American ladies. Independently of its all-important effect in purifying the religion of the country, these missionary labours are of obvious advantage to a population which has been plunged into a state of lamentable ignorance by centuries of servitude, and they have raised the standard of morality, which had sunk to so low a degree. The Protestants as a community are very poor, and yet those illicit gains, eagerly sought by all classes in Turkey, are conscientiously avoided by them. Thus in trade, to defraud the public revenue by smuggling, is regarded generally as a legitimate profit; but the Protestants, having learnt the meaning of truth, rise above such practices. This movement, the exclusive merit of which belongs to the United States, commenced in Syria under circumstances equally remarkable with any that occurred in the early Christian Church."

* See the Official Statement of the Syrian Protestant College at the end of this Number.

In Central Syria, not to speak of the joint Missions of the American and Irish Presbyterians in the Damascus district, there are four Stations—at Beyrout, Abeih, Sidon, and Tripoli, and eighteen out-stations in the districts attached to them, in which there are eleven ordained American Missionaries, two of whom are physicians; also one American Printer, twelve American ladies that are assistant Missionaries, one native ordained minister, seven licensed preachers, twenty-three teachers, and six assistants.

At Beyrout they have an Arabic printing press on a large scale, from which have issued all the best Arabic educational books which are now used in that country, from the alphabet upwards, including works on grammar, arithmetic, algebra, mathematics, geometry, geography, history, &c., as well as a large number of religious books, tracts, and copies of the Scriptures. From the first establishment of this press they have printed 253,640 copies of Arabic books, and upwards of fifty millions of pages; and the year before last they distributed from it 6,142 copies of the Scriptures, and of other books and tracts 8,272. At Beyrout, too, Mr. Butrus Bistany, one of their native converts, has opened a higher class Boarding-school, which has 150 Greek, Maronite, Greek Catholic, Druse, Moslem, and Protestant pupils, and is wholly self-supporting, the charge for tuition and board being sufficient to pay the expenses and remunerate the master.—A female Boarding-school, under native instruction and government, in the same city, is also well managed, and so successful as to promise that it too will soon be self-supporting.

At Abeih they have an important seminary for the theological training of native Missionaries and teachers, in which they have now from thirty to forty pupils; and in their other schools throughout the country they have between five and six hundred children.

That these labours in Central Syria have been followed by no less satisfactory results, is the testimony of all who are best qualified to form an opinion on the subject. The Rev. D. Macleod, fresh from what he had seen of their Missions, thus wrote from Damascus in 1857: "I have been more than delighted—most thankful at all I have seen and heard of the work of the American Mission;" and after expressing the high opinion he had formed of the qualifications and attainments of the American Missionaries established in Syria, he says: "There is an air of health about themselves and their work that was truly refreshing. . . ." We have many letters before us, from which we would gladly give extracts, did our space permit, but we must limit ourselves to a few which have special reference to this new College at Beyrout.

Our esteemed brother, the Rev. Dr. Robert Walter Stewart, of Leghorn, writes as follows: "It is now more than twenty-two years since I satisfied myself by personal examination of the very admirable manner in which the American Missionaries in Constantinople conducted their seminary or College at Bebek for the education of Armenian youths. In 1854, while travelling in Syria, it was my good fortune to become acquainted with some native pastors trained by the lamented Dr. Eli Smith and his colleagues at Beyrout and on the Lebanon; and from the amount of their acquirements, I can conceive of no greater boon to the cause of the Gospel in Syria than the establishment of a College at Beyrout, under the direction of the American Missionaries, for training a native ministry."

Similar testimony is borne by the Rev. Charles E. Oakley, Rector of St. Paul's, Covent Garden, who writes, in a letter to Dr. Bliss, in December last: "No one who has, like myself, recently returned from Syria, and seen there the zeal and success of the American missionaries at Beyrout and elsewhere, can fail to be interested in your projected institution." And Lord Dufferin, Her Majesty's Commissioner in Syria, who, during his prolonged residence among them, had such ample opportunity of seeing the earnestness of these men, and their influence for good, writes in November last to the Rev. Dr. Calhoun, one of the American Missionaries, who is on the Local Board of Managers of the Syrian Protestant College: "It is with great pleasure I learn that a Syrian College, for the education of the natives in Science, Medicine, Mathematics, &c., is about to be established at Beyrout, and I shall be too happy to become associated with you and my other Syrian friends in so laudable an undertaking."

It is indeed difficult to over-estimate the importance of the proposed College; for great as have been the effects produced by the American Missionaries—their preaching and teaching—their Bibles and books—their high character and disinterested conduct—their medical treatment and practical kindness—nevertheless, their work has been vastly hindered by there being no Protestant College in the country for the higher education of the natives. This want has been greatly felt by every Missionary, and is patent to every educated Englishman at all acquainted with the state of Syria. The French and the Jesuits have for many years been working as if the influence of France and the cause of Rome in the East depended upon their getting hold of the Syrians in their youth and bringing them up imbued with French feelings and Jesuit principles. So long ago as 1854, in the town of Zahlé, not far from Baalbek, they had already established six schools, attended by 750 children, most ably taught by native teachers, under the charge of three Jesuit priests, the whole expenses being defrayed by the Propaganda of Lyons. In other parts of the Lebanon their labours are no less persevering, and thus we find that they have not merely Jesuit colleges for the preparation of teachers and preachers, but that not long ago the French Lazarists had in their College at Antoura, a little way to the north of Beyrout, as many as 280 young men of various religious denominations, some coming great distances, and all paying so much for their board and education, that the institution had become self-supporting. The anxiety of even the Mussulman natives for such an education as will enable their children to make their way in the world is so great, that in 1857 two of the youths in the French Lazarist College were Mohammedans—sons of one of the largest landowners in the country, residing at least six days' journey from the College; and so great is the objection of even Protestant parents to send their children to Europe for their education in early life, that even Dr. Mashaka, of Damascus—perhaps the most earnest and distinguished convert of the American Mission—well known for his treatise on the obstacles which the Gospel has to encounter in Syria, and other Arabic works admirably suited to the wants of his country—even he has felt it to be his duty, Protestant as he is, to send his son for education in science to one of the French Jesuit Colleges, rather than have him, as he said, grow up in ignorance, or send him for his education to other lands, where he might acquire tastes and habits that would unfit him for living in his own.

In our remarks we have spoken only of the religious aspect of this, the present state of education in Syria. In a political aspect it is no less opposed to the internal tranquillity and progressive development of the land; for, with the sagacity for which their order has ever been so notorious, these French Jesuits not only poison the minds of their pupils by the false principles of morality which they instil, and by the French colouring which they give to all their instructions in geography, history, &c., but so soon as they have got a thorough hold upon the affections of any of the sons of the native Princes and Chiefs, so as to be able to rely upon his future subserviency, he is at once transferred to France, there to be prepared for any Foreign Intelligence.

FRANCE.

—, France, February, 1865.

THE CONFLICT BETWEEN THE GOVERNMENT AND THE BISHOPS.

to you in my last letter of the which has broken out between the t of Napoleon III. and the mem- Romish episcopate, on the subject yclical of Pius IX. This affair, grown more and more serious, pre- n curious features.

re Minister of Worship forbade to communicate the Papal docu- ally to their dioceses, there was at perplexity on the part of these personages. What course ought flow—a course of submission, or sistance? And there was great sentiment among them.

curred next? The most fiery and uch as those of Nîmes, Poitiers, , Cambray, Rheims, &c., gave the of opposition. They showed the f Worship their dissatisfaction, d that it was an act of tyranny the reading of the Encyclical of rom their pulpits. This was all

But the contest having been by the prelates who implicitly word of command given by the was difficult for the moderate remain silent; for they were ex- eing accused by bigots of failing luty towards the See of Rome. ased, therefore, in their turn, their and opposition.

not all. The Liberal or sincerely ishops (of whom there are several) nselves in a painful and embar- ition. Could they separate them- pletely from the majority of their ! If they said nothing, would incur the censure of the other pre- distrust of the devotees, the dis- the Pope, and the resentment of ? After long hesitation, some of al prelates joined their voices to re episcopal body, and fresh letters ared from day to day against the at prohibition.

me few of the bishops—about elve—have persisted in remain- in this controversy. They have assure you, not a little firmness and courage to maintain this neutral position; for the clerical discipline is very rigid, the Ultramontanes are very full of passion and prejudice, and the Court of Rome is very imperious.

In view of these episcopal protests, what has the civil power said or done? Nothing at all. It has not deemed it necessary to reply to the arguments of the prelates or to offer a defence of its own resolutions. It has left to the journals the care of maintaining its cause against the declamatory and abusive recriminations of the Romish priesthood, and the daily press has not failed in that mission. The poor bishops! In what a manner, with what logic and vehemence, they have been refuted and overthrown by the Siccle, the Opinion Nationale, the Journal des Débats, the Revue des Deux-Mondes, in short, by the principal organs of public opinion! These prelates, who in general have had but little education, are poor reasoners, and write in a heavy and prolix style, have had an unpleasant time of it. They should have measured their strength better, before engaging in such a controversy, and they might have known that they ran the risk of becoming heavy losers by it. But, indeed, the members of the clerical body, educated within the walls of clerical seminaries, know nothing of the ideas of the age, of the superiority of their opponents, or of their own insufficiency.

INTERFERENCE OF THE COUNCIL OF STATE AND JUDGMENT UPON TWO PRELATES.

Two high functionaries of the Romish Church, however—Cardinal Matthieu, Arch- bishop of Besançon, and M. de Dreux-Brézé, Bishop of Moulins, have been cited before the Council of State by the Government. These ecclesiastical dignitaries took no notice of the circular of the Minister of Worship, and, thinking apparently that they were omnipotent, gave to the Papal Encyclical official publicity by reading it, arrayed in their episcopal robes, in their churches. It was an overt and insolent act of insubordi- nation. Napoleon III. could not tolerate it without humiliation.

The Council of State had laid before it a long report, which clearly explained the mutual position of the Romish Church and the State in this country. It called attention to the fact that, for more than six hundred years, our kings and their counsellors have constantly claimed the right to examine Papal bulls before authorising their publication, and that they have faithfully maintained the independence of the civil power against the encroachments of the See of Rome. The report also demonstrated, by irrefragable arguments, that the bishops ought to be subject to the laws like other citizens, and that the Organic Articles, which the prelates have sworn to obey, cannot be trampled under foot by the clergy. After they had considered this report, the Council of State decided unanimously, without the exception of a single member, that MM. Matthieu and Dreux-Brézé had committed an abuse of authority. The punishment is certainly very light. The condemned bishops will suffer no damage, either in person or purse. In the eyes of the Jesuitical faction it will even give them a claim to be considered persons of the most distinguished merit. But these judicial proceedings are approved by public opinion, because the priests will thus be taught that the laws must be observed and obeyed by every class of citizens.

COMPLAINTS OF THE CONDUCT OF THE PAPAL NUNCIO.

Another somewhat curious incident has excited general attention. Pius IX. is represented at the Court of Paris by a nuncio, or ecclesiastical ambassador, named Chigi. He is a man without much intellect, somewhat indiscreet, having more zeal than prudence, and imagining that the Sovereign Pontiff is the master of princes and nations.

Monsignor Chigi addressed letters of congratulation to two bishops, one being to M. Pie, Bishop of Poitiers, he who was censured two or three years ago by the Council of State, because he had outrageously compared Napoleon III. to Pontius Pilate. These complimentary epistles of the Papal Nuncio were published by his express command. The Emperor saw in this act an illegal interference on the part of a foreign ambassador in the internal affairs of the State; and M. de Sartiges, the representative of the French Government at Rome, received orders to complain of so improper a proceeding. At the same time, the Moniteur Officiel inserted a note in which Monsignor Chigi was severely condemned for having exceeded the rights and duties of an ambassador.

You see the relations between Paris and Rome assume a character of growing bitterness and hostility. Pius IX. and his cardinals are dissatisfied; they blame the Emperor for being too favourable to the claims of Italy, and for making the claims of the Pontifical See subordinate to them. Napoleon III., on his side, is at length tired of employing the money and troops of France in the service of the Papacy, which only replies to the benefits he confers by ingratitude and insult. As the time for the withdrawal of the French troops draws nearer, this mutual hatred becomes more intense and violent, and thus an open rupture is inevitable.

A PAMPHLET BY BISHOP DUPANLOUP.

In the midst of these collisions, there has appeared a little composition by an episcopal hand, which has produced a great sensation. It is the work of M. Dupanloup, Bishop of Orleans. I have often had occasion to mention this name in the course of my correspondence. M. Dupanloup is undoubtedly the most able and eminent member of the French episcopate. He belongs to the most distinguished of our learned bodies, and has acquired a great reputation for his sagacity, his character, and his talents. I willingly add, that his tendencies are Gallican rather than Ultramontane, and that he has often excited the animosity of the Jesuits.

M. Dupanloup has not written to the Minister of Worship against the prohibitory circular. He thought the press would afford a better medium for expressing his opinions. He has therefore published a pamphlet, in which he endeavours to explain and justify the last Encyclical. It was a very delicate task, and in spite of the superiority of his mental powers, the Bishop of Orleans has not succeeded in it.

His principal aim is to discover whatever may alleviate the import of the Pontifical document, and to modify the meaning of the text by a series of subtle comments. M. Dupanloup was placed in a most difficult position. On the one hand, he wished to be agreeable to the Pope, and to maintain the principles of his ecclesiastical chief against the attacks of the French press. But, on the other hand, he could not, without dishonour, belie the Gallican opinions and liberal ideas which he has professed throughout his life. What, then, was to be done? M. Dupanloup has endeavoured to pursue a middle path; but in this difficult attempt he has not satisfied anybody. Politicians reproach him with having made too many concessions to the Roman See, and the Ultramontanes accuse him of treating with culpable indulgence the errors of the age. Unfortunate Dupenloup! He must bitterly feel that the Papacy is in a desperate state.

THE FRENCH PROTESTANT ELECTIONS.

I shall be very brief, on this occasion, upon the discussions within the pale of French Protestantism, inasmuch as I purpose examining these questions in sufficient detail when the ecclesiastical elections shall have terminated.

You are aware that all our churches of the Reformed communion have been invited, according to the express provisions of our law, to proceed to a fresh election and to replace one-half the members of our consistories and presbyterial councils. The result of this trial has been very different according to circumstances and localities.

At Nismes, for example, the majority was obtained by the Liberals, or rather the Radicals, who turned to the profit of their candidates not only religious antipathies, but even political passions. They inflamed the democratic and republican prejudices of a portion of the population, and thus obtained votes from persons who were quite devoid of religious habits. This is a very dangerous proceeding, which might well excite the solicitude of the civil power.

In other churches, on the contrary, the majority have declared in favour of the Orthodox candidates, because these children of the old Huguenots have been dismayed by the negations of the new school.

M. GUIZOT AGAIN A CANDIDATE.

The event by which public opinion has been most moved is the rejection of M. Guizot, the most illustrious of our co-religionists. Your readers are already aware that, there being about 2,600 voters, he failed but by a small number of suffrages to be elected.* This defeat has produced great sorrow in the minds of some, and profound surprise on the part of others. The Roman Catholics themselves have been astonished, and the more moderate have expressed aloud their feeling of being scandalised by this act of exclusion.

On the 5th of March next, a new electoral contest will take place between M. Guizot and the candidate of the Radical party. It is to be hoped that M. Guizot will triumph. French Protestantism would have nothing to gain by excluding such a man from its ecclesiastical councils, and it would, by doing so, lower itself before the equitable tribunal of the civilised world. X. X. X.

Paris, February, 1865.

THE ROMAN INQUISITION AND THE TRACTARIAN UNION SCHEME.

The conclusion came to by the Observateur Catholique on the last paragraph of the Encyclical, declaring that the Roman Pontiff cannot and ought not be reconciled to modern progress, liberalism, and civilization, is rather startling: "It is his own affair. To say the truth, we are not sorry to hear, in the mouth of Pius IX., this declaration of war; for as a Christian, as well as an intelligent man, we aspire after the moment when Popery shall disappear. For many years, this edifice of scandals and errors threatens ruin. Pius IX. has given it a terrible shake! In a short time, the great Babylon will be but a laughing-stock for all nations; the Roman Church will have disappeared; there will be nothing left but a company of Jesuits!" The writer of this is the Abbé Guettée, now officiating in the Russian Church, and the promoter of the union between the Greek, Anglican, and Roman Churches. This union has had its centre in London since 1857, and your Tractarians have joined it heart and hand, in the vain dream that if they took nine steps towards Rome, Rome would spare them the tenth, and come so far towards them. This "monstrous amalgamation"—such is it termed by Rome—has been condemned by the Holy Roman Inquisition, in a letter to all the Romish bishops of England; for oh! monstrous to say, some Roman Catholics had begun to be ensnared! "No faithful men," it is declared, "may place themselves under the direction of heretics to form a society with these same heretics and with schismatics, and—what is still more horrible—according to an intention defiled and infected with heresy; this is what may be in no wise tolerated. . . . The faithful must shun with horror this London society, because those who belong to it favour indifferentism and cause scandal. . . . Catholics who adhere to it become an occasion of spiritual ruin for Catholics as well as non-Catholics, and the more so as, in creating the vain hope that the three communions form but one, while they persist wholly in their respective opinions, this society prevents non-Catholics from being converted to the faith, and attempts, by its journals, to hinder them from it." Will this, together with the Encyclical, open these men's eyes? Will it induce some to join Rome, and some to break with it?

* [To secure the return of any candidate, it was requisite that he should obtain the suffrages of more than one-half the electors who actually voted, or an "absolute majority." The precise number of such electors at Paris was 2,630 (the entire registry did not contain more than about 3,000 names, so that only 260 qualified persons who had claimed the right, abstained from voting). The lowest number, therefore, constituting an absolute majority was 1,316. A reference to our last issue (p. 104) will show that the first five only of the candidates obtained that number of votes. Hence the necessity for another election for the sixth member of the council.]

ROMISH PROPAGANDISM AND PROTESTANT EFFORT—WORK IN THE PROVINCES.

It is curious to see that the Society of St. Francis de Sales has found it necessary to distribute 215*l.* worth of good books in Rome! a trifle less than it has expended during the year in Bologna, Florence, and Naples. Strange, that Paris should have to counteract "heresy" and infidelity in Rome! In casting one's eye over the report, one may have an idea of the increase of Protestantism—thus: Diocese of Tarbes: to aid a library destined for a population exposed to Protestant propagandism, 50*l.* Diocese of Poitiers: to help seven schools in parishes where Protestantism is active, 1,455*l.* Diocese of Cambrai: to the Catholic work of a parish threatened with heretical propagandism, 300*l.* These and other items run up to 137,763*l.* The receipts have been 140,694*l.*, somewhat less than the preceding year, during which a gift of 25,000*l.* had unexpectedly increased the amount.

Yes, Protestantism, or rather the children of God among the Protestants, are showing life both in the capital and in the departments. The reports brought lately from the Free Churches of the South and South-west, by pastors who have been on a missionary tour among them, are most cheering; there is life and brightness among them, and steady increase of members; while the eagerness with which the Paris brethren were received not only by the Free Church congregations, but by brethren of the National, the Wesleyan, and other churches, in some places vying with each other who should show the greatest hospitality, was an abundant proof of blessing. The standing aloof and opposition of Rationalist pastors and their church agents also manifested the spirit they are of. In one case the whole presbyterial council went to the pastor to request the use of the church for the Paris brother. The Rationalist pastor refused and sent for a talented stranger to preach at the hour appointed. The whole population flocked to hear the Christian discourse, and left the church empty. The elections at these places, having returned 1 Rationalists, but ultra Radicals, great stirrings of heart; and what men to do when they see appointed?

The Baptist churches in the prospering as to spiritual progress are not only walking in the holding forth that light around like revival blessings have been and the young men, after their spend their Sabbath in going to adjacent villages to spread the known Gospel. These churches are very almost all their members, above come out of Romanism. A revival evangelist itinerates through twenty and a pastor from Paris goes down to time to administer the Lord's take the oversight of the flocks.

of Chauny, closed in 1852, closed, and the flock meet, to the 150, in a small room adjacent, not them. But notwithstanding the surance given by the Emperor the pastor, some years ago, the opened, although the taxes are demanded upon it and necessarily were used! There is a stoppage not in the Emperor's intention, good will of local authorities, favourable—but in some inter hitherto undiscovered, though gue underhand working of the spir Your readers know how narrow escaped a second edition of the in the South Seas, lately, by the letter, censuring all who took part the Protestant missions in the lands.* The Jesuits' hands are all these things; and history cri who allow themselves to be their

CENTRAL PROTESTANT SOCIETY
MEN'S CHRISTIAN UNION

The Central Protestant Society lization is progressing, opening churches, furnishing pastors from logical Seminary, and grouping dispersed Protestants together; eleven of its posts accepted by ment as official parishes. During it has founded five new stations. it has fifty stations; worship has up in 120 places, and twenty-th have been wholly or partially su efforts. It has employed thirty-six pastors, four itinerants; four schoolmaster-evangelists, four Scripture-readers, fourteen school-teachers, and seven schoolmistresses. Seven talents left the Batignolles Preparatory Ministry during the past year for Theological studies.

* [This letter will be found in a subsequent page of our present number.]

The annual meeting of the Young Men's Christian Union was well attended, and participated in the almost general seeking after new life. Founded in 1852 by twelve young men, the Paris association now numbers sixty members; since its commencement it has had 261 admissions. In France there are now eleven groups, whose numerous members count from 1,200 to 1,500 members. New unions have been admitted during the year. Three provincial unions, Bordeaux, Lyons, and Nismes, as well as Paris, give public lectures for men, and see blessed results. The Eastern group edits a German paper, appearing twice a-month, and the Union, published in Paris, has now adopted a form and contains communications which render it attractive beyond its original circle of readers. Tuesday evening and Friday afternoon Bible-classes, pleasant social evenings, a reading-room supplied with religious journals, a library of 600 volumes, and a small boarding-house, are the advantages of the Central Paris Union. The members are doing what they can to spread the Gospel in Sunday-schools, in work among the poor, in evening classes for adults, &c.

SPIRITUAL PROGRESS.

An increase of zeal is found also among the Jewish residents in Paris, not confined to their own countrymen. These are more than ever heretofore cared for. The various synagogues show life; each has its sphere of activity, its labourers, its Sunday-school, diaconate, visitors, Scripture-reader, or Bible-man; meetings are held in neglected localities; on Monday evenings there is a social meeting for stable-men in rooms hired for the purpose, and at which various persons assemble and pray. Rev. H. G. Guinness, Mrs. Elizabeth, and other Christian strangers, have taken part in these interesting gatherings; real fruit is seen. The visits of English evangelists leave deep and enduring traces both in the ministry of the clergymen who give them a cordial reception, and in many who hear them. Mr. Radcliffe in 1861 and 1862, Mr. Weaver in 1863, Rev. J. Denham in 1864, and Rev. H. G. Guinness in 1865—all have had their message powerfully received by the Spirit of God to souls in Paris, not only to the English, but to the French. There seems a peculiar blessing for all who receive them. Some of the most prosperous private efforts in individual evangelization about Paris take their rise from words that have dropped from their lips into hearts made ready by the Spirit of God.

Evidently, while the turmoil of the wildest doctrines and the desperate electoral struggle is going on, the silent work of God is quietly progressing; and though many are obliged to take up the terrible weapons of controversy, and many others are tempted out of their sphere, and get damage to their souls, there are still more who are satisfied that the proclamation of the truth in all its simplicity, but all its fulness, is the true means of resisting the foe. Those are still the most successful in all classes who can say, "I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ: for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth."

THE EMPEROR AND THE ROMISH CHURCH.

More than one passage in the speech of the Emperor of the French, delivered on the opening of the Chambers, on the 15th ult., will be found to confirm the remarks, previously written, of our respected correspondent, "X. X. X.," in an earlier page, on the increasing hostility of the French and Papal Courts. The Convention of the 15th September is referred to in a tone which indicates that its Imperial author intends it to become a reality, and that the "provisional and precarious state of affairs" which now exists will soon terminate. "It is no longer," we are told, "the scattered members of the Italian nation seeking to connect themselves by feeble links to a small State situated at the foot of the Alps; it is a great country which rises above local prejudices, despising the ebullitions of unreflecting agitations—which boldly transfers its capital to the centre of the Peninsula, and places it in the midst of the Apennines, as in an impregnable citadel."

Still more significant is a passage in the Imperial speech which refers to home affairs. The Emperor says that religion and public instruction are the constant objects of his thoughts. He then observes: "All confessions enjoy the same liberty. The Catholic clergy exercises, even beyond its ministry, a legitimate influence. By the laws on instruction it assists in the education of youth; by the electoral law it may take part in the public councils; by the Constitution it sits in the Senate. But the more we surround it with respect and deference, the more do we reckon that it will respect the fundamental laws of the State. It is my duty to maintain intact the rights of the civil power, which, since the days of St. Louis, no sovereign in France has ever abandoned." Finally, in the last paragraph of his speech, the Emperor expresses intention to "protect religious ideas without ceding aught of the civil power."

ITALY.

Florence, February 16, 1865.

GROWTH OF ITALIAN NATIONALITY—VARIED PUBLIC MOVEMENTS.

It is too late in the day to doubt the resolution of the Italian people to form themselves into a nation of freemen. The many sacrifices which they have cheerfully made of late, the self-command they have shown amid recent changes within and without the kingdom, and the prudence and good sense which have marked their onward progress, both in Parliament and among the people, in civil and religious matters, must have banished the last speck of incredulity from the mind of every honourable onlooker. Without a single exception, the ten thousand communities of Italy entered into a noble rivalry of generosity, and anticipated the payment of the land-tax of 1865, in order to rescue the finances from partial bankruptcy at the end of December last. To reduce the deficit in the Exchequer, the leading servants of the Crown, in the army, navy, and other state offices, followed the laudable example of the King, and voluntarily renounced their large incomes from the civil list. An immense sum of money which was to have been spent in illuminations and banquets on the opening of the Florence and Bologna Railway, was handed over to the townships along the line, for distribution among the poor. The Minister of Public Works, instead of using all the money voted by Parliament for the accommodation of the Government in Florence, has effected a great economy, by avoiding the purchase of palatial residences and pouncing on some of the seventy-six convents, conservatories, retreats, and seminaries, which unhappily stud this beautiful city.

The public funds are spared, and private generosity is amply developed for the reimbursement of the sufferers from the late inundation here, and for the worthy celebration of the King's birthday in Naples. The advisers of Victor Emmanuel, with a savoir faire worthy of all praise, restrain the advanced party of action from embroiling the country in difficulties with France, on the one hand, and embarking in an aimless war with Austria on the other, although the speech of Cialdini in the Senate, which found a response in every heart, showed how alive the Government is to the dangers incidental to the French alliance, and the liberal maintenance of Venetian and Roman exiles proves the strength of the universal feeling of Italian nationality. Not less gratifying to the love of liberty and constitutional government has been the wise avoidance of strife in the councils of the nation, on the unseemly riots in Turin, last September, by the adoption of a patriotic resolution of Ricasoli, and the strong and disinterested protests from every quarter of Italy against the selfish and narrow-minded municipalism of Turin, which led to the recent hasty withdrawal of the King to his quarters in the Pitti Palace here. The Government finds itself strong enough to check many of the episcopal and priestly seminar and schools, and quietly to eject four professors from the University of Bologna, who have long refused to take the oath of allegiance to the present régime, while in one place a synod goes, and with a firm hand puts down a lucrative exhibition of a breathing Madonna, and in another (Termini) an army captain breaks up the procession of a miraculous working image, to which gifts are presented in its onward progress, haranguing ignorant country folk on the gross impost palmed upon them by their spiritual guides. Nor are the middle classes lagging behind their representatives in Parliament. This is the age for rebuilding the tombs of prophets, and they are busy doing honour to the martyrs of all past times, from Dante to Ugo Bassi, with monuments and centenary celebrations. But the stirring questions of the living present also engage their sympathies. Mutual Help Societies are springing up in connexion with every trade. Meetings of working men are held in Naples, Florence, Bologna, Milan, and elsewhere, in which admirable order is maintained, the debating of all sorts of questions, political, religious, and social. The subjects which at present interest most the masses of the people are the abolition of capital punishments, the establishment of civil marriage, the suppression of convents, and the maintenance of all Church property by laymen.

defraying the fair expenses of religious services, and also educating the people and feeding the necessitous poor. Monster petitions are being got up, and sent to both Houses of Parliament, which are now occupied with the passing of bills in reference to all these subjects. The change of capital to Florence has rendered immediately necessary the unification of the Tuscan code with those of other parts of Italy, from which it differed materially, especially in regard to religious toleration, while the urgent want of money to carry on public affairs has forced on the discussion as to the alienation of all ecclesiastical property, which is at present either neglected or abused in its application. The remonstrances of the bishops, and the efforts of the priests to stir up opposition in the country districts and within the halls of legislation, are not likely to arrest the progress of these beneficial measures, which have long been in contemplation, but now are shaping themselves into laws, through the impulse imparted by the Convention of September last.

EFFECTS OF THE ENCYCLICAL.

The famous Papal Encyclical of 8th December has caused less excitement in Italy than in France. In fact, it is well known that though long in preparation, it might never have seen the light but for the Convention between France and Italy, and that it is aimed more at the Tuileries than at the Turin monarch. Equal surprise and indignation, of course, were felt here that a Pope to whom so much kindness had been shown, and so many offers made, should brand in his syllabus as one of the eighty deadly heresies the notion that the Papacy should reconcile itself with modern progress. Instead of restoring the Papacy to the glories of the age of Gregory VII., it has lowered it to be the jest of the people and the butt of the comic journals. Our Tuscan Punch has a scathing engraving on the point. The Pope is raised aloft, upon a splendid monument, at the two corners of which a despairing brigand and a forlorn priest are chained. His Holiness has a jaunty air, as he poises a dagger in his right hand, and grasps firmly the Encyclical standard and flag in his left. His foot is on the triple crown to crush it. The heading of the picture is, "The Last of the Pope Kings!" While the inscription on the pedestal runs as follows:—

To Pius the Ninth,
The Destroyer of the Papacy,
The grateful Italians
Have raised this monument.

On the 8th January the Italian Government issued a circular to all the bishops, informing them that the Royal arequatur was required before they could publish the Encyclical. Thereupon the Tuscan, Lombard, and Emilian bishops poured in their separate protests to the Minister of Grace and Worship, distinctly announcing that they owed fealty only to the Pope. One bishop proceeded to promulgate the document from Rome throughout his diocese, and the tribunal of Mondovi sentenced him to three months' imprisonment. But this week the King has done very much what Prince Napoleon urged the Emperor to do in France. He has given his permission to its wide circulation, only requesting the ecclesiastical authorities not to excite the people in regard to those portions of it which are hostile to the institutions of the country. This, I fear, will not form practically a saving clause. Everything that the pulpit and clerical press can do will be done to play off the spiritual against the civil authority. But there is no danger of disturbances in consequence. There is an utter indifference prevalent as to what Rome may inculcate. This last publication only forms another instance of stubbornness and stupidity on the part of the Papal power in the eyes of the people of Italy. The real danger is that the Pope's action should be too lightly thought of. Dr. de Sanctis has sounded the alarm here and besought his fellow-countrymen to estimate the document at its true value, to have a salutary dread of the spiritual weapons of Rome, and to reply to it in the only way that will be understood in the Eternal City, and in the only way that will render the Encyclical harmless; and that is, by removing from the statute-book the first article of the Constitution, which declares the Church of Rome to be the Church of the State.

ANTI-PAPAL INDICATIONS—CARDINAL ANDREA, PASSAGLIA, AND THE FRENCH EMPEROR.

There are indications, too, in the tone of the Italian press, that the Pope has now reached the climax of his folly, and put the cap on his obstinate and fatal resistance to all measures of conciliation. There are startling articles in the Perserveranza, which speaks for Lombardy, and in the Nazione, which is the tongue of Tuscany, insisting on the entire separation of Church and State; and I have no doubt that the Neapolitan press is not less forward to indicate the only possible solution of this quarrel between the despotism of the Papacy and the freedom of civil government. Another leading Lombard journal admits into and that is, that Italy should be made by the Roman Court entering into a union with that of King Victor Emmanuel." Remember that I am not quoting to you scraps from outré journals, but emphasized parts of leading articles from the accredited organs of public opinion. In fact, our most fervent Catholics have been nonplussed. The journals which were most opposed to the radicalism of the Evangelical faith, and bent all their energies to a conservation of the Church, slightly reformed, purified, and popularized, have lost their ground of argument altogether, and are out in no measured terms on the blindness of the Pope and his advisers, and the ruinous course on which he is speeding along. Very little hope is entertained in connexion with the rumour that the Papal conclave is not harmonious in its Encyclical action, and that not a few heads of the Church are inclined to revolt. I place no reliance in this story myself, nor in the bearing of Cardinal Andrea at Naples. He has visited the King's son, and is said to have given much annoyance to the Pope by parleying with Liberals in the southern provinces. But this same wearer of the purple years ago betrayed the interests of Liberalism after he had wormed himself into its secrets. Passaglia, too, is regarded with less and less liking. We seem to have no guide in scanning the future in the many flying rumours. The only certain thing seems to be that a transaction between the Pope and King is now placed beyond the limits of possibility. They are at daggers drawn, and will remain. Each will marshal his forces under his own banner. The war between making the circuit of the world.

SALES OF BIBLES, &c

The sales effected during 1861 by colporteurs in the service of National Bible Society were 1,730,000 and 73,000 religious books. I informed of the sales of the Foreign Bible Society for last year show the rate of progress of the work. I may mention that during 1861 was spent at the Claudian Era about 2,500*l.* sterling in the sale of Italian Bibles and religious tracts, while in the same period 300*l.* was drawn from sales over and above the Book Dépôt in town.

DON AMBROGIO AND HIS AD

The talented and eccentric Don Ambrogio, still holds on preaching imprisoned by turns in Piedmont. I called your attention to this singular agent in the work of the Society, because of the real spiritism in several instances had followed his harangues. His habit is to move out any fixed plan, and to address people, who are charmed with his ringing and eloquent speech, in the streets and from the steps of cathedrals. He got into trouble in Milan by indulging in political allusions—He had already addressed the people in the door of the cathedral boldly and sively, and meant to leave the rumours got afloat, however, that it occasion. Indeed, the people inatated, that they took possession of houlder high, bore him in triumph ish church, where he yielded to ations and preached. The priests 500 francs of damages and a long risonment, but the court only 0 francs of fine and three days of The priests were dissatisfied, and Don Ambrogio, too, appealed to be The case lately came before the ie Senate, which corresponds to our ords. The exciting political affairs er last led to a frequent postpone- finally the case was decided against , for their appeal was rejected, and l the costs to pay. The lawyer of ogio had neglected to lodge his eal in time, so that the light the inferior court against him ected I think it very important an influential tribunal in Italy e brought in such a liberal verdict.

that the priests everywhere hold ogio in great dread. On St. w's-day, in Varese, he entered church and planted himself oppo- acher, who, in consequence, was proceed, through fear, with his n of Protestantism. Thereupon ogio invited the people to the ere he addressed them from the the church, and no harm came of , this singular man seems to be own the priestly power in a very t of Italy. The colporteurs and of the North complain that there cannot be induced to reason on l points, but that he immediately n thus: "Now, I will go to the syndic, and inform against you ;"

for one or two to act as witnesses, off to raise a prosecution. This ition Don Ambrogio is braving ng at the hands of these men, h a little brief authority, either allowed to go on with his work, law be fairly applied, and not uld be merely extruded from the ut up for a day in the gaol.

orteurs who follow in his wake sales, as he is constantly urging of the Bible upon every one. The efore, ask the colporteur not for at for Don Ambrogio's book. The well dread him, for he is constantly "Don't give your money to the to the poor; the death of Christ us the pardon of our sins, and not the absolution of the priests." Recently the Bishop of Mondovi sent Don Ambrogio's aged father to reason with him, and bring him back to the Church, promising him high promotion. I am happy to say that he stood this severe test, and continues to address very pointedly the several classes of his countrymen—men, women, and even children—on the errors of Romanism; but he acknowledges that this was the most bitter discipline he ever underwent—far harder than suffering contempt and durance vile.

COLPORTAGE IN THE ARMY.

Miss Burton, the Italian soldiers' friend, who is now printing a short money statement to send to her contributors, has asked me to send you the following statement relative to her own work and that of her two colporteurs, Barone and Castione, since October, 1864:—

At Milan, where we remained a fortnight, Barone distributed tracts, 100 Testaments, and a few Bibles among the soldiers of the 3rd and 4th Grenadiers, also 5th, 6th, and 30th Regiments of the Line, Bersaglieri, Artillery, and Lancers. At Perugia, Castione has given away 110 Testaments and a large number of tracts to the soldiers of the 25th Regiment of the Line, many of whom go to him every day to read the Scriptures. In Florence, Barone has distributed Gospels and tracts among the Bersaglieri, Artillery, Lancers, 1st and 2nd Grenadiers, Corpo d'Amministrazione, and Engineers. Up to the present time, more than 300 men have received Testaments from me, and some come daily to read the Scriptures from four o'clock in the afternoon till six. Barone has also visited Pistoia and Leghorn, and distributed tracts and Gospels and a few Testaments to the soldiers of the 37th Regiment of the Line. I may add that he was most kindly received, some of the officers purchasing copies of the Bible. I continue to receive good accounts from the soldiers of the 5th Grenadiers, my old friends of last winter, and I hope to be at Ancona in May next, to renew my acquaintance with them, and with those of the 6th Grenadiers.

I regret to say that within the last few days several officers in Florence have seized all the Testaments given by Miss Burton to the men of their regiments, and had the men themselves put under arrest, and one man placed in irons. Dr. Revel has kindly taken the matter in hand, and there is every hope that prejudice will be allayed, and the good work allowed to proceed.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER.

The Week of Prayer at the beginning of January was generally observed throughout Italy. Detailed reports lie before me with regard to Naples, Milan, Parma, and the Waldensian Valleys, from which it seems to have been a period of great spiritual refreshment and enjoyment. In Florence the meetings were more successful and delightful than on any previous year. The London programme was adhered to, and the daily meetings were held in the various churches of the native and foreign brethren in succession. A fervent spirit of brotherly love prevailed, and an earnest desire for a monthly meeting of a similar kind was expressed on all hands, and will, most probably, take shape in the institution of an Evangelical Alliance, which was urged upon the brethren at one of these precious réunions. May the Lord hear all these warm and gushing utterances of prayer, and send us down in greater measure the spirit of all-converting and quickening power! This is the great need of Italy at this present, that brethren in Christ may acknowledge one another, recognise each other's labours for God, and lovingly stir up each other to good works and more self-denying devotion. The congregation of Mr. Magrini here met apart from the united body of believers for prayer; and in Genoa it was not practicable, this year, to gather together in one those who love the Lord Jesus.

THE WESLEYAN AND WALDENSIAN MISSIONS.

I am greatly pleased to hear that the Wesleyan Methodists have undertaken to continue to supply 5,000*l.* a-year, for some time, for the maintenance of their young mission in Italy. All honour to them for this liberality. Would that all the churches of Christ would go and do likewise. This opening for the Gospel in Italy is one of those extraordinary conjunctures in the history of the world which cannot be met by the ordinary system of giving. May the Lord incline the hearts of private Christians of abundant means to devise liberal things on behalf of a land to which we owe so much, and which at this moment so loudly calls upon all God's people to come over and help her in her sad plight of ignorance and superstition.

In this connexion I may mention that while the urgent appeal just made by the Waldenses for aid in their work has been cordially responded to, there is still a deficit of 500*l.*, and nothing in hand to go forward with. Let British Christians ponder the position and claims of this venerable and energetic Church of Christ, now battling in the high places of the field for the grand old Gospel, for which in ages past she suffered so much. It is very generally believed that the Waldensian missions are provided for from some endowments, or some sure source of supply. This is quite a mistake. Their evangelization is wholly supported by the voluntary offerings of Christians of all the churches of Christendom. An intelligent Christian merchant, Mr. James A. Campbell, of Glasgow, makes the following remarks in the report of his late visit to Italy:—

The Waldensian Church has in all fifty missionary agents, of whom twenty are ministers of the Gospel, and this without having reduced its staff of ministers and teachers for the Valleys themselves. Such progress in missionary effort within sixteen years, by a Church numbering at first only about sixteen ministers, is surely remarkable, and is not to be accounted for by any mere access of romantic or patriotic sentiment, or by any encouragement given from Protestant countries. No one can come in contact with the Waldensian missionaries without feeling that it is the simple desire to do God's will in preaching the Gospel to their countrymen which animates them in their work. Earnest, single-minded men they are, labouring not for their Church, but for their Saviour. But while the agents are thus furnished for the work, their support in it cannot to any considerable extent be supplied by the Church which sends them forth, or by those among whom they labour. The Vaudois Church must chiefly depend upon Protestant countries for the means of supporting and extending its missionary agency. It is a poor sister, fully endowed with all the personal, intellectual, and spiritual qualifications for her high mission, but dependent on her wealthier sisters, richer in this world's wealth, for the means to exercise her gifts in a work which should be equally dear to them as to her—nay, which is, in a sense, theirs as well as hers.

And here is a touching sentence from a letter of Dr. Revel:—

We have always said to the friends who, from the commencement of our new position as a Missionary Church in Italy, have encouraged us to go forward as doors should open before us, You know we are very poor; we cannot draw from our own breast any resources for paying our agents. Let it, then, be understood that we do a work as in the name and for the glory of our common Lord and Master. We will do our best to prepare well and supply the ministers, and you will furnish us with the means of supporting them. Of our fifty labourers, from Brescia to Palermo, twenty are ministers, whose salaries require an annual sum of 2,080*l.* For the other thirty, who are lay evangelists, schoolmasters and mistresses, for travelling expenses, rents of rooms for meetings, &c., that sum may be doubled.

SCHOLASTIC EFFORTS.

There has lately been printed the balanced accounts for 1864 of Mrs. de Sanctis's eight Christian schools in the North of Italy, showing an income of above 500*l.*, and those of the Waldensian schools in Florence and Leghorn, for which so successful a bazaar took place last spring in the former town. I had also the pleasure, some time ago, of being present at the examination of Signor Ferretti's school here, maintained by the Wesleyans, and was tremely pleased with the progress of the pill, under the able instructions of Signor Cognigni. While on the subject of education, I ought to mention the plan of a Christian lady home, who is desirous of extending female middle-class Evangelical instruction in Italy. Nothing has been done already in this direction by the Deaconesses Institution in France, and Mrs. Piggott's boarding school for young ladies in Milan. This lady is anxious to meet with some pious Englishman possessed of competent means, who would be willing to settle in some of the large Italian towns, and support the expenses of a well-conducted Christian academy for females of the better classes, who presently are, for the most part, unreached by the ordinary Evangelical schools, until such time as it might be able to pay its own working expenses. As, however, some who have the wealth and the heart to bestow it on such an undertaking might not have the courage or capacity to superintend the work in person, as some who have the necessary energy and gifts may not have the requisite funds at command, this lady would be happy to be the medium of bringing members of these societies together for practical missionary effort in the scholastic department. At this moment, Miss Appia, long the devoted and successful manager of the La Tour Institute, for young ladies, has expressed her willingness to open a similar establishment in Naples, where her father is Waldensian pastor, should the society guarantee for three years be forthcoming. Perhaps some one who peruses this notice may be willing to wholly undertake, or partly aid, the enterprise.

PROTESTANT CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS.

The Christian pastors of Milan have found their sick members so exposed to the tormentations of monks and nuns in the public hospitals, and have been able to obtain so little redress or promise of amendment on the part of the authorities of these charities, that they have now unitedly arranged to support all the ailing adherents of the Gospel cause in a Convalescent Home, already established, and in which the charge is three francs per diem. In Florence, a British Charitable Fund, similar to that which has been for thirty years in operation in Paris, has this month been established, for the purpose of aiding in every way distressed British subjects.

It is not at all unlikely that a similar effort may be made on behalf of the Italian Evangelical poor, many of whose cases are beyond the capacity of congregational and native liberality, in the event of a union for this object being attainable among the evangelists and private Christians of the various denominations. The injured objects of past persecutions still remain a burden on the charitable public, and hardship of various kinds, for the sake of Christ, is far from having died out with the proclamation of liberty of worship and conscience in the Statute of Italy. To overtake these really clamant cases, and diminish the number, if not altogether remove, the impostures of pretending sufferers, would be the aim of this society.

The German Protestant community of Milan have recently built and opened a new and elegant chapel, at a cost of 8,000*l.* sterling, most of which has been subscribed by residents and friends.

GERMANY.

Frankfort, February 16, 1865.

OPENING OF THE PRUSSIAN PARLIAMENT.

The opening of the Landtag (Parliament) at Berlin has more than ever drawn upon itself the attention of public opinion. All the world expected, no doubt, that the conflict of the last session between the Chamber of Deputies and the Ministry would be renewed in this. But it was not thought that the conflict must break out so quickly, and show itself so decided. Even before the opening sitting Berlin could perceive a singular and gloomy prognostic. There exists in this capital the praiseworthy custom of preceding the opening sitting by a solemn act of worship, intended to implore the blessing of God on the labours of the Legislature. The Protestant deputies assemble in the cathedral, and the Catholics in their church. Now, this year (on January 14), the Protestant deputies almost all refrained from attendance at this service; according to the papers, there were only twenty-five of them present. Everybody then cast about to find the cause of this strange fact, and remembered that in one of these religious exercises, some two years ago, a young preacher at the cathedral, named Hengstenberg (who must not be confounded with the professor of that name) had preached on the occasion quite a political sermon—a veritable lecture addressed to the Liberal deputies upon their opposition to the Government. Hence their absence this year! I have before me a religious paper which blames them for this demonstration; and doubtless it would have been laudable on their part to know how to forget that very unpleasant sermon in the house of God, and in so delicate a situation, and one so connected with the powers that be. They should have been all the more ready to forget it, that this young preacher had been censured by the ecclesiastical authorities; and yet more, that this year the religious service had been entrusted to a man of experience and of true piety, the General Superintendent, Dr. Hofmann. But candidly, I cannot, with the journal referred to, lay all the blame upon the head of the deputies. Why do we not find one word of reprobation for that sad system of the dominant party in Prussia, which consists in identifying religion with a certain line of politics? Why make Christianity an accomplice of, and responsible for, absolutist tendencies repudiated three times over by the nation in the elections? Let it be well understood, it is less the preaching of Mr. Hengstenberg which kept the deputies from the cathedral, than the furious and often perfidious war which is waged by the Kreuzzeitung and other organs of that party against the Liberal hopes of the nation. To fight for absolutism in the name of religion: this it is which alienates from the Church, not merely the deputies at Berlin, but millions of men to whom Christianity is misrepresented by being set forth as the enemy of the most legitimate of liberties.

At the opening sitting, which followed the religious service, the King's speech unhappily allowed no hope to remain of seeing the end of the difference between the powers in the State. He spoke of conciliation, no doubt, and we believe that no one in his kingdom desires it more sincerely than he. But he maintained, again and again, with unusual energy, the point contested—the reorganization of the army. Without permitting ourselves any decision on this question, we only affirm, that afterwards, a scheme or proposition for a law presented to the Chamber of Deputies merely aggravates the dispute, by prolonging the time of military service (in the reserve force at least), instead of abridging it, as the Chamber desires. If to this be added the serious question of the budget, still pending, and the special question of funds employed without authorisation by the Minister of War against Denmark, it will be perceived that this session opens under gloomy auspices, and encourages the most serious apprehensions as to its results.

CONFUSION OF RELIGION WITH POL

I spoke just now of the unfortunate fusion of politics and religion which has done so much to the great harm of both, at least of the Prussian party which is known by the name of Feudal. Take one manifestation among a thousand, well fitted to express this confusion. At the meeting of a religious association, held at Gardelegen after the victories of the Prussian army in the last year, an employé of the Government—a Landmann named von Kröcher—made a speech in which are expressions like these, which were carefully gathered up by the Kreuzzeitung, the chief organ of the party: "How can it be that God is with us in so visible a manner? Beyond all doubt, it is because of the just and sincere intentions of the King, the Minister, von Bismark, and because our policy is in harmony with the will of God and carried out in His name. The Minister Herr von Bismark, is, we may say, chosen by God for the task which He has allotted him. His sole aim is to cause the triumph of the divine to triumph. He has raised the standard of royalty by the grace of God, in order to deliver it from the unconstitutional assaults of the democrats. Shall the King yield, or nay, the humble servant of the King, the deputies? That is the question which von Bismark has proposed with firm and immovable courage. A kingship by the grace of God cannot exist if the question is decided in favour of the Opposition. The King and his Minister have constantly maintained in the belief that there is a heavenly God, and that it is the will of God that there should be a King of Prussia, anointed one over the land. It was the belief that the King, at his coronation in Königsberg, took his crown from the altar of God. It has been in this belief that Herr von Bismark has defended, with chivalrous character, the incontestable right of that crown against the attacks of the deputies. He has defended it against the cries of opposition of almost all the papers. He has defended it against the opposition of the people, not only in Prussia, but in Germany, and even in all Europe. Lord our God, moreover, has protected it in a visible manner. It is because of the will of the divine that God has manifested his favour in a manner so marvellous, that one could foresee it, not even the common people. Thus has been displayed the truth saying, 'If God is for us, who can be against us?' It is on this account that all of our Government are so wonderfully blessed; in the question of the budget, in the Polish question, in the question of German unity, in the alliance with Austria, and in the victory over Denmark. Yea, our God lives. There is a God in heaven, let the democrats recognise Him or not; and it is He, the Lord of lords, who wills that there should be upon earth a king by the grace of God."

Assuredly, if the democrats do not believe in God, this is the very worst means for bringing them to the belief. This dangerous aberration has taken such proportions in Prussia, that we have seen formed at Dortmund a politico-religious association between Protestants and Catholics, based exclusively on this principle, and expressly declaring religion and politics inseparable. These persons even have the simplicity to hope that the fusion of the two Churches will be effected on this basis!

JUDGMENT OF A GERMAN PARTY RESPECTING AMERICA.

With regard to the men who still dream of such a theocracy, all their ideas are an enormous anachronism, for they ought to have lived in the middle ages, or rather among the Jewish people. For such men there is no longer any understanding of liberty; they hate it wherever they find it, under all forms, and in all countries. This has lately been proved in a striking manner by one of the most distinguished heads of the party in Prussia which we have just characterised. We refer to Dr. Hengstenberg, of Berlin. In the review which he makes at the beginning of every year, in his Evangelische Kirchenzeitung (Evangelical Ecclesiastical Gazette), of the principal events of the preceding year, we find, among many other appreciations which are very just and very true, a judgment concerning North America, which altogether confirms what we have said. The celebrated Berlin professor can only see in America a people which seeks its glory in shame, which lives in perpetual revolt against authority, which denies the Christian State (!), which is animated by unbounded pride, which has no other God than Mammon, which lives in a condition more hardened than that of Pharaoh, and which has exhibited its hardness in broad daylight, by the re-election of Lincoln, "that man of blood and of tears."

One's hand trembles with indignation while transcribing these last words. The only thing which can mitigate the sin of a professor of theology who pronounces such a judgment, is, that he evidently does not know the first elements of the subject he treats of. In general, the United States of America are only known in Germany in their worst aspects, and by means of the accounts of persons who, blinded by political and religious prejudices, can neither see the great institutions which have made of them a free people; nor the living and flourishing churches which find their strength precisely in their freedom from servitude to the State; nor the immense labours which they originate for the propagation of Christianity in the world. It is needless to say that these men are very little affected by the horrible scourge of slavery, and know not how to rejoice when they see that great iniquity swept away by the whirlwind of the actual war. What is there, then, to be wondered at, if the whole of the party which nukes of despotism a religion, has neither sense nor understanding to comprehend that the re-election of Lincoln is the great act of an energetic people, which, at the cost of immense sacrifices, justifies the government of its President? What marvel, if this party imagines that it has explained the greatest event of contemporary history, when it has uttered the word "hardening," and compared an heroic people to Pharaoh? But what may astonish us, and what is to be explained only by their inveterate hatred of liberty, is that the very men who in Europe, in Prussia, make of their "kingship by the grace of God" a true idol, which they adore, do not feel rebuked in their conscience when they lavish insults upon the President of a great republic, who certainly holds his power none the less "by the grace of God" because he does not wear a crown, "taken from off the altar of God."

One word more. There is not a nation in the world which has less right than the German nation to pronounce such judgments upon America; for if the United States are the countries predestined to hardening in vice and crime, how comes it to pass that every year 200,000 Germans go there to seek for an existence which they no longer endure in their own country, and gain there their daily bread by an honest and laborious life? and how many myriads among them have also found there that spiritual bread for the soul which nobody had dreamed of offering to them in their own country!

THE CONFLICT OF NEGATION AND OF FAITH IN GERMANY AND IN GERMAN SWITZERLAND.

Alas! in this German country, in spite of the fiction of "the Christian State," in spite of the ideal happiness of a Church united to the State, in spite of the sincere testimony of a feeble minority of the disciples of Jesus, that which engages the attention of believers, and afflicts them, is the continuance of the still hot conflict of unbelief against faith. To the protests in favour of the truth in the conflict raised about Dr. Schenkel and his book have very soon succeeded counter-protests in an opposite sense. They have come from Berlin, from the Palatinate of Bavaria, and elsewhere. Under the pretext of liberty of teaching is constantly the absurd idea that all errors and all negations ought to find a place in a Christian church. But how can it be otherwise where the Church is confounded with the nation, governed by the State, or handed over to the influence of the masses?

This same conflict has just broken out in a still more angry form, if possible, in German Switzerland, and chiefly in the canton of Zurich. There a very large number of the ministers of religion have literally substituted for Christianity a sort of mystical Pantheism. Most of them still maintain in the pulpit a certain respect for the old faith, which they know still to be alive in their congregations, before whom they use a sort of scriptural language which maintains them in illusion as to the true principles of their pastors. But in one village of the canton of Zurich, at Uster, there is to be found a man, the Pastor Vögelin, who it seems has been unable to accommodate himself to this absence of sincerity, and who, from his pulpit, engages in a furious attack upon the historical truth of all the facts of Christianity, and against all its doctrines. More than this, he has published a volume of sermons, and uttered before the general public all his absolute negations of the Gospel. This was too much: a large proportion of his colleagues in the same canton, to the number of seventy-eight, have at last broken silence, and have published a declaration against this crying abuse of the Christian pulpit, and in behalf of the fundamental principles of Christianity. Thus war is enkindled; for the party opposed is not silent. This war is better than a false peace; it will at least have as its result the enlightenment of a whole people in the principles of a great number of the men who may still be terrified at the Church and the conscience of a religious condition of the Church singularly favours the rapid increasing congregations which have been there by the preaching of the Gospel in the National Church vigorous making to oppose this devastating incredulity. One rich Christian has built and recently opened a chapel devoted to the preaching of the Gospel. Upon the front of this chapel, in letters of gold, may be read this testimony: "Other foundation can be laid than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ."

THE RELIGIOUS LIFE AT BASEL.

While these things are transpiring in Zurich, a neighbouring canton, there is giving just an opposite example of attachment to the Gospel of truth and in its divine power. Notwithstanding a Christian association has wished to give to the population of the city of Basle the Christian and eloquent voice, and from Frankfort Professor Dr. von Thiersch, who, during the months of January and February, is delivering lectures twice a-week, attended by large audiences from all ranks of society, from the professors of the university to the tradesmen, even the workman in his jacket. This will be an excellent preparative for a religious festival, which is to take place in July. I refer to the great Basle Religious Society, which will then celebrate the anniversary of its foundation. The friends of the friends of missions from Switzerland and all the neighbouring provinces are certain to draw to Basle to entreat beforehand the richest blessing of God upon this great religious gathering.

TURKEY.

Constantinople, February, 1865.

CONTINUED HOSTILITY OF THE TURKISH GOVERNMENT TO PROTESTANTISM.

In my last letter I narrated some circumstances connected with a case of outrageous wrong at Murad Tchai. The English Chargé d'Affaires took the matter up immediately, and

Aali Pasha promised to order the preacher at once by telegraph. A few days later, learning that he was still in custody at Bolu, the case was again before the English Embassy, and again promised his immediate release in spite of these promises, he was not until after a detention of more than at Bolu. We learn by telegraph that he is now on his way back to his home.

Some weeks ago, a Turkish Bible was sold to a Greek, who was going into the interior; but it was seized at the custom-house in Constantinople, and he was informed that it was a prohibited book in Turkey. The British and Foreign Bible Society again complained to the Embassy, and Aali Pasha assured Mr. Stuart that it was all a mistake, and should never occur again; but last week some half-a-dozen boxes of books were refused passage through the custom-house, because they contained a few Turkish Testaments, and the man who had them in charge was informed that they had received the strictest orders not to allow any Turkish Bibles to pass the custom-house to go into the interior. It was only after four or five days of effort and remonstrance that they were allowed to pass the custom-house, to be seized again most probably at the next place where the boxes are examined.

At Angora, where the population is mostly Roman Catholic, and the pasha controlled by French influence, the Protestants are subject to constant persecution. They are made to pay their heavy taxes twice over, they are imprisoned, they are cursed and threatened by the pasha, and are refused the right to enrol themselves as Protestants under the Protestant civil community. They have complained to the Porte, and have obtained any number of orders from the Grand Vizier, commanding the pasha to redress their wrongs; but he simply throws the order in their faces, and abuses them all the more, knowing very well his own interests depend more on the favour of the French Embassy than of the Porte; or, in other words, knowing that these vizierial orders are not given with any expectation that they will be carried out.

At Moohalitch, near Broosa, the Protestants are not allowed to bury their dead. A woman, last month, remained unburied for ten days, and her friends were stoned by a mob every time they attempted to leave their houses, the Turkish governor looking on with perfect indifference, although he, long ago, received orders to furnish the Protestants with a proper place of burial. The Pasha of Broosa refuses to require this governor to carry out the order, or to protect the Protestants from insult. Cases similar to these are now occurring in various parts of the empire, and there is a manifest intention on the part of the Turks to discountenance Protestantism everywhere.

WHAT WILL THE BRITISH EMBASSY DO?

It is very difficult to know what to expect from English influence in opposition to these acts of the Government. If Sir Henry Bulwer returns, we expect nothing—so long as his return is probable, we can expect but little. Mr. Stuart, now Chargé d'Affaires, has lately addressed a letter to one of the missionaries, defining his own position, and the Protestants of Turkey can certainly ask for nothing better than the maintenance of this position by the Embassy. It is practically that of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe. He stated, at the same time, that the English consuls in Turkey had been instructed to take a similar position; but one of the best-known English consuls in Turkey, on being appealed to for assistance in a certain case, denied ever having received such orders. The truth is, as one of these gentlemen stated not long ago, that the consular agents will be very slow to do anything, until they are well satisfied that they will be supported by the Embassy. Perhaps it is due to Sir Henry Bulwer to state that the defence made of his course, the other day, by one of his warmest friends in Constantinople, pointed to Pisani, the confidential dragoman of the Embassy, as being the person really to blame, he being not only a bigoted Catholic, but a Jesuit.

SUDDEN DEATH OF THE CAPUDAN PASHA.

The only really honest and incorruptible member of the Turkish Government died ten days ago, under circumstances which have led the people generally to believe that he was poisoned. As the Mohammedan faith forbids post-mortem examinations, the truth can never be certainly known as to the cause of his death, but it is notorious that he was envied and hated by the Grand Vizier and by a host of other corrupt officers. Mehemet Pasha possessed the perfect confidence of the Sultan, simply because he deserved it. Under his administration, the navy was made far more efficient than it has ever been before, and the expenses of the department have, at the same time, been reduced almost fifty per cent. No calumnies could conceal these patent facts from the eyes of the Sultan. When he heard the news of Mehemet's sudden death, he is said to have exclaimed in bitterness, "God has taken from me the only faithful servant I have ever had; even one such was too great a blessing to last." Mehemet Pasha had been much in England, and once went on a special mission to America. He was brought up in the navy from childhood, and rose from pure merit to the highest place. He was a simple-hearted, honest man, with a vigorous intellect, a full knowledge of his business, and an extraordinary power to compel fidelity and energy in those under him. He was universally known as Fiery Mehemet. He was certainly the best man I have ever seen in high office in Turkey, and his death is the greatest calamity which could have befallen the Turkish Government. It is a sad comment upon the morals of this empire, that his very virtues are believed by the Turks themselves to have been the cause of his untimely death.

A CONVERSION TO MOHAMMEDANISM.

Pera has been for two weeks in a high state of excitement over a young woman, named Cordelier, of Belgian parentage and English connexions, who has gone over to Islam. Her aunt owns a well-known English store in Pera, and this young person was known by sight to almost all the foreign residents of Constantinople. She was sent by her aunt to teach the ladies in one of the harems at the Seraglio to use a sewing machine. She seems to have been dazzled by the glitter of their diamonds and their apparently gay and thoughtless life. It is said by some, that the hope was held out to her of entering the harem of the Sultan—others think that she had in view some person of less rank. However this may be, she ran away from her aunt and took refuge in this harem. She has since made a public profession of Mohammedanism before a Turkish cadi, and has turned a deaf ear to all the entreaties and remonstrances of her Christian friends. No fault can be found with the Turkish authorities, as they have allowed her friends to see her freely, and have opposed no obstacles to the action of the Belgian Embassy in the case. This Embassy hopes to be able to show that she was too young to make this choice independently; but she was more than nineteen years of age, and this plea seems hardly tenable. She must reap the fruits of her folly in the life of wretchedness which she is certain to lead. Unless her fate be more happy than that of other women who have trodden this path before her, she will yet look back to her aunt's shop as an earthly paradise.

SOME INTERESTING FACTS IN REFERENCE TO THE CIRCASSIANS.

The whole number of Circassians who have immigrated to Turkey is about 500,000, and this number does not include the Nogai and Crim Tartar tribes, who came to Turkey three or four years ago. Of this number, about one-half have already died of pestilence and starvation. Those now in Constantinople receive from Government a halfpenny a-day for their support. At home they had no circulating medium of exchange; money was unknown among them. Consequently, when the Russians burned their villages, took all their cattle and implements, and drove them to the seashore, they had absolutely nothing to bring with them to Turkey. Turkish agents had induced them to choose Turkey, rather than exile in Russia, by promises of support, land, houses, and everything which they could desire. Through the stupidity or dishonesty, or both, of Turkish officials, these promises have not been fulfilled. Those now in Constantinople ought to be located at this moment, and furnished with seed; but they have no reason to hope for any settlement until next summer, when they must live on their neighbours, and be helpless for twelve months.

This whole immigration has been a curse to this empire—a terrible and wasting curse upon thousands of villages, which have been reduced to abject poverty by being compelled to support these people; and a general curse to the nation, adding to the inherent weakness of the empire, and the dissatisfaction of the people with the Government.

These Circassians are not Mohammedans. Most of them are Pagans. They were once nominally converted to Christianity under the Greek Empire, but only nominally. Their religion is in some respects Druidical, but as their rites are secret, but little can be definitely known about it. Their languages are very various. No less than twelve or fifteen distinct languages are spoken by these 500,000 immigrants—so different, that they cannot understand each other. Turkish and the other languages of this empire are unknown to them.

It is a question whether the interests of the slave-trade did not influence the Turks to invite these tribes to Turkey. The harems of Constantinople have long been supplied from this source, and the result of the Russian war bids fair to cut off the whole supply at once. Under the present arrangement, every harem has been more than supplied at very low rates. These girls have sold as low as 5*l.* or 6*l.*, from that up to 150*l.* Not only are the harems stocked, but large numbers of these slaves are now held by the dealers on speculation. I know of one man who holds 150, in icipation of a rapid rise in their market value. The slave-trade is more brisk here than it has been for a hundred years, while some fancies that slavery in Turkey is at an end. Most of the servants, black and white, in Turkish families here, are slaves. Turkish slavery is not like American, however. Instances are constantly occurring where slave girls become the wives of pashas, and live in the greatest luxury. I know of one case, which occurred not long ago near me, where a Turkish officer bought a slave girl, exposed to be dying with typhus fever, as a pious act of mercy. She, however, recovered, as he did not want her himself, she was sold for 150*l.* to one of the richest pashas in Constantinople, who made her the wife of his

She has since come in state to visit a poor Turkish captain, and has fairly overwhelmed him with presents, to express gratitude to him for buying her as she was dying by the side of the street. Such cases are not uncommon. Still, slavery, even in Turkey, is a real bondage, and under cruel masters the slaves often suffer as they do on plantations of Alabama. One of the first reforms which Turkey needs to make towards civilization is the abolition of slavery.

POSTSCRIPT.

Constantinople, February 4, 1865.

THE REACTIONARY MEASURE OF THE TURKISH GOVERNMENT.

I have stated it as my opinion that it was a deliberate purpose of the Porte to make it impossible for Turks to become Protestants. This week brings a new and unmistakeable proof of the existence of such a purpose. It is known to you already that Aali Pasha, some time ago, addressed a note to the head of the Protestant civil community, ordering it, in peremptory terms, not to enrol any more as Protestants. But the firmans which have been issued to the various Protestant communities throughout the empire have all contained the stereotyped order to the pasha of the district to "enrol as a Protestant who might wish to join that community." Last week a new firman was issued to establish a Protestant community in the town of Muhapasha to recognise and enrol as a Protestant person belonging to the Greek or Armenian communities who might wish to join the Protestant community. Any one who is familiar with the unchangeable nature of official documents in Turkey, will see at once that this change of phraseology could only have resulted from the determination of the Government to prevent Turks from adopting Protestantism. It is the abolition of religious liberty in the empire, so far as Turks are concerned, and they constitute half the population. Christians may become Turks; for only last week, a Greek priest of this city made a public profession of Mohammedanism, and by so doing obtained his release from the prison where he had been confined by the Greek Patriarch; but Turks cannot become Christians, however pure may be their motives, and however sincere their convictions.

It is of the greatest importance that it should not be believed in England that there has been any satisfactory arrangement of this question of religious liberty in Turkey; for there has not been, and there will not be, any such arrangement until public opinion in England has moved the Government to demand from the Porte a faithful application of the Hatti-houmayoun to all the subjects of the Sultan.

The Levant Herald of this week makes the following statement of the manner in which the Jesuit missionaries obtain their converts. I cannot vouch for its truth, because I know nothing of this particular case, but I presume that it is true, for they are in the habit of making converts in such ways:—

The French Lazzarists occupying the model farm near the Alem-dagh, on the Asiatic side of the Bosphorus, have during the past week had a squabble with the police, originating, if our information be correct, in an "indiscretion" far beyond what was ever charged against our own Protestant missionaries. It appears that some agents of the priests in question recently seized five deserters in the neighbourhood of the farm, and instead of handing them over to the police, delivered them up to the reverend "fathers." The news of their good treatment induced, it is said, two other runaways to join them, and these also were even more than hospitably received by the monks. On the affair coming to the knowledge of the authorities, a party of zapties were sent to demand the surrender of the refugees; but this was flatly refused, and on the police threatening to enter the premises and seize their men, the gate was slammed in their face, and they were dared to attempt an entrance at the peril of the vengeance of the French Embassy. The menace sufficed, and the baffled policemen slunk back to report their failure. It remains to be seen what action the Porte will take in the matter. In vindication of its own authority and impartiality, there can be no two opinions as to its duty.

enemies of everything that is connected with the foreigners. They are even worse than the Poklo people, who put to death a Christian colporteur three years ago. In former years our missionaries used to settle in small places, villages remote from the seats of the mandarins. Our German mission became, therefore, chiefly a Pagan mission in the original sense of the word. I learned the advantages and the disadvantages of this system during my first stay in China, and was, for my part, determined to follow another course, without wishing that the former system, undoubtedly the best one before the war, should be abandoned. I, for the first, made some journeys in countries not yet visited by foreigners, in order to find a place fit for a settlement. The district of Tsang-shing, to the north of the East River (Tungkun is on the south bank of that river), seemed to be the most convenient, especially because it was visited by our missionaries and native assistants, and the people were always found very kind and obliging. But the difficulty was that the city of this district was far from the river side, and that the villagers close to the river side were exposed to the incursions of the daring robbers of the opposite Tungkun side. The difficulty was solved by the offer of Dr. Kerr, an American medical missionary, to assist me in opening a dispensary in Shikhing, a large trading town on the East River. There I have been labouring about eight months, on a really hard field, but by the blessing of the gracious and Almighty Saviour, with great joy, and the inward assurance that I am there in the name of the Lord and according to His holy will. In spite of all the opposition and hostility that I met with in the beginning of my labour there, yea, in spite of threatenings to expel me, even in throwing stones on me in my own room when prescribing for the numerous patients, or in the streets when preaching to the people—I say, in spite of all this opposition, I have prescribed for upwards of 1,000 patients, have preached to some 40,000 people, have sold tracts; and finally, I have succeeded in establishing a school for seventy-five boys, with three teachers. When at home, I give daily one hour in the morning an exposition of the Gospel and pray with the scholars, and every evening a Biblical address.

Christians were to be found, read the Holy Scriptures, preached to them with them. It was a solemn feeling to be leged to have intercourse with these for Evangelical Christendom in this empire. I hope the London society to send a missionary to Poklo, because however promising it may be in its left to the management of the native danger to the newly-converted Christians now I must conclude. May the Lord Christians at home to send out more Christ, because the doors are now opened! "The fields are white already."

CIRCULATION OF THE SCRIPTURES NORTH.

The National Bible Society has a special agent at Chefoo Shan-tung), in the north of China. A gentleman, Mr. Williamson, has made several journeys to towns and villages in this city:—

The first place visited in this way was Chefoo, a small walled city near the coast. They occupied their position on a door-step in the street, Mr. Williamson and his colleagues. They put out their books. A crowd at once gathered, and a rapid sale ensued. The demand was so great that they at last began to sell the tracts brought for gratuitous distribution, to the detriment of the whole. Williamson's attention was turned for a moment, six Testaments were sold, which would certainly sell them, if they were not sold for a price. "For once we had a colporteur who had no expenses." Ning-hai-chow, Lai-shan, and other cities, have also been visited, a number of Testaments, &c., sold in these places. This society has now five native agents at work. One of them—Lien-Sie—is a literary man of high standing, whose degree is equivalent to our own. He has passed successfully all the examinations.

them fast enough." In the course of some 400 volumes, large and small, disposed of, and next morning the entire was cleared off, with the exception of a large tome. At Yan-foh-mian, Mr. Mason attended a great annual fair, lasts for three days, taking with him a load of Bibles, Testaments, Scripture

—
A conical hill is crowded on three sides of waggons rising one above the other foot to the top. These are the travelling of the Chinese, and are now full of women and children. On the level ground, facing the fair is a theatre, in which plays are performed to the admiration of the public, who, carried with the show, can refresh themselves at the stalls which abound on every side, with their favourite viands. In and out the crowd move processions in honour of idols. Painted women are carried above the heads of the people, drums and cymbals and men with daubed faces prance about, mounted on paper dragons, swans, and wild geese. Into the midst of all this hubbub came a cart, and speedily the "bearded barbarian" became the leading attraction of the fair. Crowded round the cart in immense numbers, and heaving like the swelling sea; the men behind tumbling those in front over the heads.

Well nigh a thousand books were sold. Mr. Williamson adds:—

I think I never felt more devoutly grateful and profoundly thankful to God in my life. Leigh Richmond speaks of the happiness he felt in seeing his congregation coming in every direction up to his church to hear the Word of God. One can understand his feelings. And of the same nature, but far more intense, were mine after the sale was over, when seeing the crowd break up, and carry away with them the means of salvation. No missionary had ever been in this district, not a copy of the Scriptures ever circulated, not a book containing the message of salvation ever seen, no voice except that of the Romanist ever heard on behalf of God. But now men were departing in every direction with the truth, so that there would perhaps not be a city, town, or village, or even hamlet, for sixty or eighty miles around, which would not receive one or two portions of Scripture or books. And they read them. It is out of the question to say that they cannot and do not read our books. Every household has one who can read; and if the person who bought the book is unable to read it, he takes it direct to the other and hears of its contents from him. I wonder how any one who has lived in China can imagine, far less assert, that a Chinaman would pay money down for a book and yet not find out what the book said. That is to suppose the Chinese love money less than we do!

AMERICA.

New York, February 10, 1865.

MOVEMENT AMONG PRESBYTERIANS.

proposed reunion of the Old and New Presbyterian Churches is attracting inattention. It is easy to see that many serious disadvantages have attended union; and that a restoration of confidence and co-operation between the two bodies would no less serve their common interests than commend their piety. But what is so becoming promising in principle is not entirely in practice. Thirty years of divided politics cannot be suddenly buried in a scheme of union. The spirit of strife, however, is buried already. But the mutual enmities and the characteristic forms of denominational feeling which separate the two bodies, of education and benevolence have long been nourished, cannot be expected to themselves at once into unquestioning loyalty to the reunited Church. The most ardent friends of the movement have long been giving attention to the means by which these considerable obstacles may be avoided. The most remarkable in this direction has been made in the number of the Princeton Review, the venerable representative of the Old School Church. The scheme therein proposed contemplates not only the healing of the schism between the two bodies above referred to, but a confederacy of all the Calvinistic Presbyterian denominations in the land, including the Scotch and Reformed Dutch Churches. The proposed relation would be somewhat novel and loose; but, if it could be formed and maintained, it would surely put an end to many existing evils. I present you the substance of this latest and most respectable suggestion toward Christian union. I need not say that it attracts attention, and discussion, and opposition:—

In regard to the details of government, customs, usages, &c., we would leave everything just as it is. Each denomination should maintain, as it now does, its ecclesiastical assemblies and church courts; should retain its supreme authority over its existing colleges and theological seminaries, and should hold possession of its endowments and all vested funds, with unrestricted right to apply them according to their original design. Each denomination should continue to regulate its own order of worship without interference, and have the right to decide finally upon all applications for individual and ministerial communion. Each denomination should retain its distinctive name and title at its own pleasure, and so much of its own constitution as relates to its internal affairs, and does not conflict with the terms of union.

We would erect a Synodical Assembly, comterian Church where it may be most effectual in the service of our Master, Jesus.

THE POPE'S ENCYCLICAL.

The Pope's Encyclical Letter has attracted not a little attention on this side of the ocean, though by no means so much as it seems to have awakened in Europe. His word has never been law in this land; and yet there are some points in our country where the advances of Roman Catholicism have been so rapid and so arrogant, as to deserve far more attention than they have received. The Catholic population of this city decides every municipal election as it will. Nothing but the rare occurrence of a schism among its political leaders ever puts the government of New York city in the hands of the educated and responsible classes. And since those who get office have a double motive of gratitude and self-interest for remembering their electors, our city government has long been accustomed to show unblushing favouritism towards the institutions and the officials of the Papal Church. The instances are too gross to be quoted without disgust. The last act of the sort has been the contribution out of the city treasury of a large amount towards the endowment of a Jesuit college. This local experience adds something to the interest with which the Pope's last letter is read in this city. But the general feeling, I think, welcomes this explicit definition of the spirit of Roman Catholicism. It is honest to fight under one's own colours. The Pope's notions of religious liberty have had a long battle to wage. If they are now on the verge of triumph, it was well enough to define them now, that the victor might not so far as I can learn, does not itself to our religious community could be prepared for expression, and could make it the assertion of those great truths would be impressive and beneficent. But to attempt and fail; or to make it a protest against the protest of humanity, Jews, and infidels and atheists, would be good, but very great harm. Most common opinion in America would be a prerogative of Government to promote religious doctrine, against the proportion of its subjects. It is well, accordingly, whether that well-will arrive at success.

Meanwhile we point to another constitutional amendment, which em strongest evidence that we are people—not perfect, as none are, but with the principles of Christ's Gospel readers will remember that it was in the last Congress to secure such ment of the Constitution of the United States as should abolish slavery through states. The necessary resolution Senate; but for lack of a two-thirds its favour, was lost in the House representatives. On the last day of passed the present House by a vast majority, against 56 nays. The result on the floor and in the galleries exuberant joy as befitted so great a victory. The amendment will now need to be passed by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States before it can take its place in the Federal constitution. Twelve of the States have already taken action upon it. Do not suppose that the amendment will be rejected. The measure is feel now like men who walk in a dream. We cannot realize these changes. In these four years we have lived a century. Let any one remember that wild, unwarrantable, but heroic undertaking of John Brown, and set over against it this irresistible and deliberate advance of a nation. Was there ever such a growth? When Sherman cut loose from Atlanta, and set his face toward the ocean, the rear of his column, as they marched out at night, their way directed by the light of the burning city, heard amid the crackling of the flames the band of the Massachusetts regiment that remained to superintend the dreaded work of destruction, playing the melody of that strange army hymn, half doggerel, half sublime :—

John Brown's body lies a-mouldering in the grave,
John Brown's body lies a-mouldering in the grave,
John Brown's body lies a-mouldering in the grave,
His soul is marching on.

As that prophetic strain dismissed the victorious army on its adventurous march, it awakened in the Southern fastnesses echoes that will never die away. An emancipated race, a thrifty and cheerful industry, shall keep them alive in songs of freedom as long as the world shall stand.

Home Intelligence.

CONVOCATION.

The Convocation of the Province of Canterbury met at Westminster on Tuesday, the 14th, and continued its session till the following Friday. As is the usual fate of the proceedings of this venerable body, nothing whatever was concluded, but several subjects of considerable interest both to the Church and the country were brought under discussion.

The only canon that Convocation, since its revived action, has had licence to frame, and which it also obtained the concurrence of the Convocation of York, was one allowing the parent of a child to become one of its sponsors at baptism. In answer to an inquiry from the Bishop of Oxford, the Archbishop of Canterbury stated that the canon so carried by the united authority of the Church had been duly conveyed to Sir George Grey, but he had received no communication as to any action the Government were prepared to take on the subject; on which an address to the throne, praying that the Queen would take proper steps for the due and lawful publication of the canon, was proposed by the Bishop of Oxford and unanimously agreed to. The Bishop of Oxford proposed another address to the Queen, praying that Her Majesty would take steps for the formation of new bishoprics, with St. Alban's, in Hertfordshire; Southwell, in Notts; and Bodmin or Truro, in Cornwall, as the cathedral sees. The Bishop referred to the great increase of late years in the population of the metropolis on both sides of the river, to the manageable size of the Sees of Lincoln and Exeter, and to the extended area and the density of race in Devonshire and Cornwall, for whom the Bishop of Exeter had to preside. His proposition was that the population on the south bank of the Thames should be taken from the two Sees of Winchester and Canterbury, and given to the See of Rochester, while Essex and Hertford, separated from Rochester, should form the new See of St. Alban's; that Nottingham should be under the new See of Southwell; and Cornwall under the See of Bodmin. His motion for an address to the Crown to that effect was seconded by the Bishop of London, and supported by the Bishops of Lincoln, Ely, Rochester, and St. David's; while it was stated that the Bishop of Winchester had given his cordial assent to the plan. The resolution was carried unanimously, and the Lower House, on being asked to concur, showed some disposition to carry the scheme still further; but in the end they fell in with the views of their lordships.

The recent judgment of the Committee of Privy Council on the subject of "Essays and Reviews," giving rise, as it has done, to so much discussion out of doors, did not escape some comment in both Houses. In the Lower House, the Dean of Westminster tabled a series of propositions which may be called a protest against the recent condemnation by Convocation of the "Essays and Reviews," in which he was joined by the Deans of Canterbury, St. Paul's, Christ Church, and Bristol, and several archdeacons and canons. The main grounds on which this protest was urged were, that Convocation had no power, without licence from the Crown, to sit in judgment on any book, and that they had refused a hearing to one of the inculpated parties. In addition to this, a paper was presented, signed by the Dean of Bristol alone, to the effect that in condemning the book the with moving that they be received, he used several arguments in favour of certain modifications of the constitution of the court. The Bishop of London did not deem that the present Court of Appeal was the best that could be desired, in an abstract point of view, but he contended that no substitute had ever been proposed which would not lead to worse evils than those they at present complained of. As there was no practical motion before the Convocation, the subject dropped with this passage of arms between the two bishops. The question, however, is to come up again at the next sitting of Convocation, which is to take place after Easter, when the Rev. Mr. Fendall will bring forward, in the Lower House, a resolution on the subject, of which he has given notice.

The most interesting discussion in the Lower House related to a motion proposed by the Rev. Sir Henry Thompson, founded on the report of a committee for a reform in the constitution of the Lower House of Convocation. The report was of a very guarded nature. It did not touch at all upon the introduction of the lay element into Convocation, nor did it propose to alter the existing usage, by which all deans and archdeacons had seats ex officio, while the chapters have a distinct representation of their own. His motion, therefore, was limited to the mode of electing the proctors for the clergy, and he proposed that there should be two proctors chosen for each archdeaconry, and that the election should be made directly by the clergy. This would increase the number of clerical proctors from 42 to 112, giving them a slight numerical increase over the dignitaries, who number subject discussed was that of an increase of the episcopate. It was unanimously resolved to petition Her Majesty to constitute additional sees—Southwark, Bodmin and Southwell.

CLERICAL SUBSCRIPTION.

The report of the commissioners to consider the question of subscription required in all persons taking holy orders, has been made. The chief recommendations are, that the words "unfeigned assent and consent" be no longer used, and that the declaration of simony is to give way to a single declaration now proposed to be used by a clergyman runs as follows:—

I, A B, do solemnly make the declaration: I assent to the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion, and to the Book of Common Prayer and of Ordering of Bishops, Priests, and Deacons, as I believe the doctrine of the United Church of England and Ireland, as therein set forth, to be agreeable to the Word of God; and I will use the form in the said book prescribed, and none other, except so far as shall be lawful authority.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON'S FUND.

We slightly alluded last month to the state and progress of the Bishop's fund, and by a meeting held just as we were going to press. We now give the exact state of the fund, and the purposes to which it is applied, as stated in the report read at the meeting:—

The total receipts of the fund to Dec 31, 1864, are 100,456*l.*, and a further sum of 10,000*l.* has been promised. About eight-ninths of the amount required has been already received.

75,781*l.* Nearly 12,000*l.* has been paid by local associations, and a further sum of 2,477*l.* has been received as parochial collections; and nearly 9,000*l.* has been obtained from church collections and offertories. The committee think that this statement of the income of the fund will encourage the efforts of all who are interested in this work.

With regard to the appropriation of these funds, the committee say:—

From the time when the fund commenced its operations, to December 31, 1864, provision has been made under these grants for the employment of 48 missionary clergy. Grants have also been voted for 40 parochial curates. The total number of additional clergy for which grants have thus been made is 88. Within the same period, grants have been made for 47 Scripture-readers, whose stipends are entirely, or in part, paid from the fund. Grants have also been made in aid of the stipends of 15 parochial mission women. Grants in aid have been voted for four parsonages, 4,250*l.* as been applied to the erection, purchase, or engagement of 11 schools. For the sites of three other schools 1,400*l.* has been granted; and 1,000*l.* has been placed at the disposal of the Diocesan Board of Education, to be applied for the purchase of fittings, and for other minor expenses incurred in the establishment of new schools. It should be observed that in almost all cases the mission-stations and school churches for which grants have been made are used as schools on week days, and that a large addition has been made to the school accommodation of London. In apportioning their grants, the committee have also had to consider that public provision is made for the establishment of schools under the parliamentary grants. 1,200*l.* has been voted as aid towards endowments; 17,955*l.* has been voted for 27 mission-stations, school churches, and temporary churches, or for sites for the above purposes; and grants amounting to 1,639*l.* have been voted in aid of the erection of permanent churches, or the purchase of sites for permanent churches.

UNIVERSITY EDUCATION AMONG DISSENTERS.

The Congregationalists have lately held a conference on the training of students for the ministry, which it appears to be universally admitted is susceptible of improvement. The Rev. T. Binney, chairman of the Council of New College, presided, and tutors and delegates from all the Nonconformist colleges were in attendance. The discussions chiefly revolved upon the amount and quality of education it is desirable Congregational ministers should possess, and how it can best be secured. A committee was appointed to consider a suggestion made by the Rev. H. R. Fyfe, of Cheshunt, for the establishment of a Senatus Academicus, who should test the merits of the various colleges in Biblical knowledge, by a graduated series of examinations. This, observes the Patriot, "will be to have been the most important document read at the conference." The papers, among which was one by Dr. R.

Vaughan, are to be published under the superintendence of a committee. The same journal also observes:—

While the desire for higher scholarship shaped itself in practical form, and the resolve of our best men was strengthened to place our denomination in a position to influence and educate the leading classes of the community, the desire to extend and widen our operations amongst the masses of the community also found expression and universal sympathy. Mr. Gwyther, of Manchester, gave voice to the common feeling when he said that there was a clear recognition and cordial approval of the services which may be rendered by the Nottingham and Bristol institutions. It was confessed that our regular colleges, doing their utmost, could not wholly supply the growing demand of our churches; for now that demand seeks for assistant ministers, congregational missionaries and evangelists, as well as pastors. At the same time, it cannot be denied there are many men in our churches unfit by age and their educational disadvantages for a long and classical curriculum, who, if suitably trained, would render great service in the lower ministries of the Church. Everything depends on a suitable training. And here the explanations made by the directors of the new institutions awoke confidence. A wide and superficial training would be injurious; but an unambitious and thorough training, which confines itself to a discipline in the English language, in the English Bible, and sound theology, and in missionary work, avoids this evil. The friends of these institutions have faced the evils that have been dreaded, and, with a vigorous grasp, which public opinion, we trust, will compel them to maintain, are bending their discipline to practical and needful ends—to train men for aggressive work among the millions of the working classes. In this work, as auxiliaries to our larger colleges, we cannot but endorse the sentiment of the conference, and wish them well.

CHAPEL BUILDING IN LONDON.

The London Congregational Chapel-building Society has recently held its anniversary meeting, at which Mr. Eusebius Smith presided. During the sixteen years' existence of this institution it has been instrumental in the erection of sixty chapels, costing in the aggregate a quarter of a million of money. These are all now occupied by large congregations. Recently the society has expended a large sum in the purchase and restoration of George Whitefield's well-known chapel in the Tottenham Court-road; and this is now crowded Sunday after Sunday by a numerous body of attendants. During last year the income of the society was 12,698*l.*, and by its assistance six chapels were finished and opened, all now containing congregations of a very encouraging character. A noble offer has been made by Mr. Samuel Morley, which has been accepted, to contribute 500*l.* each towards twelve chapels, in aid of the erection of which the society is to furnish an equal amount. In most instances these chapels will be built with special reference to the working classes, and when completed will be worked on the principle of the "territorial" or "domestic mission" chapels found so successful in several parts of Scotland.

The Baptist denomination have been of late less successful. It appears that a proposal of Sir Morton Peto to erect four chapels in the metropolis, defraying one-half the cost himself, on condition that special subscriptions to the Baptist Building Fund were made for the other half, has met with so imperfect a response, that Sir Morton has been induced to withdraw his offer. "The proposal," we learn, "has been before the denomination for two years, but only about 900*l.* has been contributed towards 7,000*l.*, the sum required; so that there seemed but little probability of the remainder being subscribed. Under these circumstances, the committee have had no alternative but to consult the subscribers as to the disposal of the several sums contributed." The Freeman, the denominational journal, regards this result as "deeply mortifying," but some of its correspondents assign various reasons for taking a different view of the subject. One of these is that the trust-deeds of the society are not "in harmony with the catholic spirit of the age now present and in the near future," and that some persons, "though firm Baptists in principle and practice, believe that the time is ripening for a new church on a simpler, wider, and more scriptural foundation than that underlying any existent denomination." Some, therefore, object to limiting the use of the chapels to "Particular Baptists," or to Baptists of any class. Others appear to be averse to "doctrinal trust-deeds" altogether.

RAGGED CHURCHES.

The following is from the Secretary of the Ragged Church and Chapel Union:—

Your correspondent, Mr. E. J. Hythe, in his letter in your number for February, makes no allusion to the existence of the Ragged Church and Chapel Union, through whose instrumentality the various Ragged Churches in London are mainly supported. Most of the services are conducted in buildings used during the week as Ragged Schools; but there are many expenses which the Ragged School Committee, willing as they may be, are unable to pay, and which are mainly met by the grants of this union. In connexion with its work, there are now fifty-one Ragged Churches, most of which would be closed but for the pecuniary aid thus rendered. We cannot but heartily rejoice at the success which has attended them, but it is right that the public should be informed through whose instrumentality they have been established.—Yours faithfully, W. A. BLAKE.

THE LATE CARDINAL WISEMAN.

This great dignitary of the Roman Catholic Church died at his residence, in London, on the 15th February. He had been in a precarious state of health for months previous, and for several days before his death there was no hope whatever of his recovery. It is impossible not to be reminded, in contemplating the decease of this prince-prelate of the Romish Church, of the excitement which his coming amongst us occasioned throughout England, some fifteen years ago. The country then, to the sanguine followers of Rome, appeared to be on the eve of a return to the bosom of that corrupt communion; and it was thought that the sending amongst us of a cardinal and the construction of a complete Romish hierarchy for England, would complete the process. How thoroughly they were disappointed, it is not necessary here to say. That the Cardinal was himself sensible of the failure of his mission, it might perhaps be rash to affirm; but it is certain that he soon found cause to lower the arrogant tone he at first assumed. Within a short time from his residence amongst us, Cardinal Wiseman dropped all assumption of being the grand spiritual ruler, and was content to take his place as the pleasant companion, the polished gentleman, the graceful and accomplished teacher. In this work and in the reorganization of the Romish Church in England, he spent the latter portion of his life. His rank probably gave a standing to his Church which it might not otherwise have attained, and in gathering up under his own superintendence and control the scattered influence and resources of his co-religionists, he was probably able to bring greater weight to bear upon any scheme on which he had set his heart upon than would otherwise have been possible. But this was not done without an effort. We have always understood that the bishops and priests who were in England before his arrival were jealous of his domination, of the exercise of which he was by no means sparing; bickerings arose in more than one quarter; and some stubborn Romanists down in the North were audacious enough to appeal to the heretical British Parliament, to preserve their respective charities for them, and keep them out of the hands of the Cardinal and his satellites. These matters at last settled down, however; the recalcitrants were bought off or were crushed down, and for several years no scandal has attended the Cardinal's administration. But for the last two or three years his health did not allow him to take a very active part in the conduct of the affairs of his diocese.

Monthly Survey of Missions.

INDIA.

The last annual examination of the Free Church Institution, or College, at Calcutta, was presided over by Sir John Lawrence, the Governor-General. It is said to be the first occasion of the kind on which an Indian Viceroy was the chairman. Upwards of a thousand youths were in daily attendance during the year. Of these more than 400 of the older pupils assembled in the great hall, with many distinguished visitors, for the distribution of prizes. In the course of his speech, his Excellency observed that the natives of Calcutta owed a deep debt of gratitude to that great and good man (Dr. Duff) who had given them so magnificent an educational institution.

The origin of the newly-established Chumba mission, in the Himalayas, has been already narrated by a correspondent of Christendom (1864, p. 555). The Rev. Mr. Ferguson, of the National Scotch Church, resigning his appointment as a military chaplain, commenced his work without the promise of any support or salary from any one. Clad in his robes as a minister, and accompanied by two Christian catechists, he passed along the streets of Chumba, pausing now and then to repeat a text of Scripture. When he had done so, each of the catechists translated it into the native patois. The Rajah (though a heathen) has undertaken to pay for one year the expenses of the mission, and he is now learning the Hindu language, that he may read the Bible.

The results of this first year's solitary work at Chumba are forty-two converts already baptized; several applicants for baptism; one whole family of three generations brought to the knowledge of Christ; and indications of whole villages preparing to accept the truth.

A letter from Mr. Ferguson says:—

I had a very interesting interview here yesterday with the head-men among the Chumins, at their own desire. There is a universal desire among the whole set to embrace Christ; and if one of the head-men would take the lead they would all follow. As yet they fear worldly consequences. They were thoroughly satisfied with all that was said yesterday. I did not press them to say what they meant to do. It seems to be simply a matter of time.

Two converted Affghans, "not counting their lives dear unto them," have responded to pressing invitation from the people of Kafiristan to preach the Gospel in that part of central Asia. They left Peshawur last autumn on their perilous enterprise, marching by way of Cabul. In a few months, if spared, they return to report and arrange for permanent operations. Another encouraging circumstance is, that a spirit of inquiry has of late been manifested among the Affghans—

Daily, numbers from Eusufraie and other districts call upon us. One is a learned Syud, who calls upon us as often as he is able. He has read the New Testament and the Mizan-ul-Huk, and is effectually convinced of the truth of Christianity. But he fears that death would be the result of his avowing Mohammedanism, and as yet he has not strength to confess the faith of Christ crucified. In the cases of two others, grace has been given to renounce the faith of their fathers, and they are now under instruction for baptism.

The Church Mission in Afghanistan has sustained a serious loss in the death of Major James, C.B., the Commissioner of Peshawur, and the last of the founders of the mission who remained there.

One of the most popular gods in the Mugra (Rajpootana) is a local deity, called Makat, who owes his fame and the divine honours which he receives to his exploits as the captain of a gang of robbers, who had their home in the hills, and thence descended to prey upon the unfortunate lowlanders. The temple of Makat is at Todgurh, where he is represented by an image rudely carved in stone, seated on horseback, holding the bridle with one hand and pointing a javelin in the other. Hither, at the last great annual festival held in his honour, came one evening two of the missionaries of the United Presbyterian Church, the Rev. Wm. Robb and Dr. Shields, attended by a native catechist. The appearance of the missionaries was most unwelcome to the bhopas or priests, who begged them to go away and return the next morning, when they promised to show them all that was to be seen. This the missionaries declined, but sat down to witness the spectacle, which took place at midnight. The chief actor (says Mr. Robb) was the bhopa or priest, who, as he affirms, and as the people firmly believe, becomes possessed with the spirit of Makat:—

While in this state, he is supposed to lose all consciousness and self-control, and to be wholly under the influence of the god, so that the words he utters, the capers he cuts, and the wonders he performs, are not those of himself, but of the deity within. This sort of thing is very the Mugra. The possessed bhopa sometimes turns prophet, and foretells to eager and anxious things affecting their future weal or woe. At other times he becomes juggler, and through his tongue and cheeks, without making a wound or drawing blood, much to the amusement of the poor ignorant rustics. Again, madman-like, he howls and dances about, belabours his own back. On this occasion, however, we were informed that the bhopa, as afflatus should come upon him, would rush forth from the temple, and, vanishing in a circuit of twenty-four miles, and, having visited a number of villages, would return less than half-an-hour in the opposite direction.

The time having arrived for the spirit of Makat to descend—

On a sudden the bhopa darts forth. He does look not unlike one possessed. A shawl round his loins is all he wears in the shape of clothing. His long black unkempt hair loose over his naked shoulders, and his eyes are red and staring. In his right hand aloft a naked sword, and with his left waves the chaunrie over his head, for he is now transfigured into the god. Thus accoutred, and without halting for an instant, he started at a kind of keeping time to the music, on his midnight circuit of twenty-four miles, a number of bearing red sticks running some before and some behind him. These latter, however, accompany him the whole round. Having conveyed him safely beyond the limits of the returned, leaving him to pursue his nocturnal trip alone. After dallying for a little out a second time in the opposite direction, to escort back the bhopa on his return. They as formerly into the darkness, and after a short delay again appeared, bolting along at the speed, the bhopa figuring in their midst. They enter the enclosure and form a circle, the bhopa danced for half a minute, and then suddenly disappeared inside the temple amid the people. I need scarcely say that the bhopa's nocturnal circuit is a very narrow one—of twenty-four miles, but of a few hundred yards—not among the villages of the Mugra, but brow of the hill.

The first performance over, a second of the same kind was gone through by the bhopa, when, as he was about to re-enter the temple on his return, the missionaries forward resolved to unmask the deception :—

As soon as he appeared, we planted ourselves in his way, and called to him to challenge took him by surprise. He heeded not, however, and was rushing past us, when a pundit laid hold of him and barred his farther progress. Thus forcibly detained, we that if his pretensions were true, and if in addition to his wondrous powers of locomotion also divine secrets, then he might favour us with a small exhibition of his skill in this and, holding out something in my closed hand, demanded that he should say what it was response vouchsafed by the perturbed bhopa was an unintelligible grunt, a rolling of his sundry capers. We repeated our demand a second time, and our oracle replied by taking to the temple.

The bhopa's compeers were very angry at the exposure, but the missionaries turned account, and did not leave the place until they had pointed out the wickedness of what had seen, and preached repentance towards God and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ.

The Church mission on the Godavery is carried on by a native catechist, who acts as pastor of a small congregation composed of people drawn from many districts for the river works, and also as an evangelist among the Kois. These last have to be sought out amid the wide-spread jungles over which they are scattered. Four villages have been brought into a manner, taken possession of by the establishment of schools in them. The Society has resolved upon commencing a mission among the aboriginal tribes in the district, and have appropriated 5,000*l.* from their Jubilee Fund for that purpose.

The native Church in Bombay, under the care of the Free Church mission, received an addition of seven converts. Three of them are young men—two Mohomedans and one a Hindoo. The others are inmates of the female boarding-school. It is something remarkable that the profession of Christianity by the young Hindoo was opposed by his parents. Two additional baptisms of converts from Hindooism, however, have also taken place at the Free Church mission, in Poonah.

The native female boarding-school of the Free Church mission in Bombay, with expulsion from its rented premises, found no small difficulty, even with the aid raised for the purpose, in obtaining "a local habitation." Land rose to a fancy price in Bombay, and it was literally not to be had from natives, who possess most of the land "for love or money." In this emergency, Sir Bartle Frere, the Governor, was applied to, and having satisfied himself, by a personal inspection of the school, of its efficiency and its claim to support, has presented to the mission a site, in a suit of land owned by the Government, and which exceeds 3,000*l.* in value.

Two German missionaries have been lately called to their eternal reward—Mr. Sternburg and Dr. Brandt, of the Chota Nagpore Mission. The latter was on his way to Berlin, in order to recruit his health. A somewhat rum-unstance occurred in connexion with the death of Mr. Sternburg, whose missionary career extended over a quarter of a century :—

Eleven years ago, our brother, now deceased, was necessitated to return to Germany from a general failure of health. While on board ship he became so much worse, that the doctor abandoned all hope of his recovery. The patient, gathering from what he saw and heard, that his life was in imminent danger, very fervently besought the Lord mercifully to raise him up again, and add to his life ten more years, and allow him to return and labour in India, till his death. It pleased the Lord to listen to his prayer, and from that hour his recovery commenced, and when he reached Berlin, he was in the enjoyment of vigorous health. After returning to India, he continued steadily to labour during the appointed period, and uniformly enjoyed good health and physical and mental vigour. But after the ten years were past, he said to his wife, that his time here on earth was now over. He wrote to a similar effect to his children in Germany, and instructed them to be ready for his departure from this world. Mrs. Sternburg remonstrated with him, and told him that the Lord could mercifully grant him another extension of life, and that His goodness would not be limited by the ten years that were past. To this he very solemnly replied, that he could not ask the Lord again for another extension of life, but he must now entirely submit to His will. In keeping with this remarkable conviction, it pleased the Lord suddenly to remove him.

While honoured labourers are thus called away, others are raised up and being sent out to take their places in the mission field. Eight labourers, five brethren and three sisters, were about being sent out from Berlin to reinforce the missions on the plains and in Chota Nagpore.

CEYLON.

The interesting movement referred to in our January number (p. 38) as taking place in the Talampitiya district of Kandy, is gaining ground. Fourteen adults (nine men and five women) have been baptized, in addition to the thirteen previously reported. In ten of the villages converts have been found, who all seem zealous in making known the truth to others. Each, according to his ability, is setting apart a portion of his land towards the maintenance of a teacher; and they are also subscribing liberally for the purpose of building a small church. Two of the converts are preaching in the country around, and determined to give to the work of evangelization all the time they can secure from their daily labour. The missionary offered to give them a small sum to meet travelling expenses, but they preferred to go forth at their own charges, and declined all assistance.

CHINA.

According to a statistical table prepared by the American Presbyterian mission at Ningpo, nineteen missionary societies are now at work in China. Ten of these are American—viz., the American Board, Presbyterian, United Presbyterian, Reformed Dutch, Episcopal, Baptist (North and South), Methodist (North and South), and Free Will Baptist. Twelve great centres of operation have been occupied, from which the Gospel radiates in many directions. These cities are Canton, Hong-Kong, Swatow, Amoy, Foo-Choo, Ningpo, Shanghai, Han-kow, Chefoo, Tung-Chow, Tientsin, and Peking. There are 84 ordained missionaries reported, 108 stations and out-stations, 57 churches, 2,576 converts have been received into the churches, of whom 2,028 still remain.

In a principal suburb of Peking a small place for preaching has been established by Dr. Martin, of the American Presbyterian Church. Here the Rev. W. C. Burns, of the English Presbyterian Mission, taking alternate days with the native assistants, has had crowded and interested audiences.

The Reformed Dutch mission at Amoy have received four converts (all women) to church-fellowship by baptism.

Formosa has been visited by two English Presbyterian brethren from Amoy, and as the result, one of them, Dr. Maxwell, has resolved to commence a medical mission here. The point selected for a station is Tai-wan-foo, described as a noble city with a busy and thriving population, and having no foreign residents. On this exploratory tour the missionaries preached as they had opportunity, and found attentive listeners. As a rule, the people were kind and civil in their bearing to the strangers, and manifested great eagerness to obtain books and tracts. Several baptisms have taken place in connexion with the English Presbyterian mission at Amoy and Swatow.

WESTERN AFRICA

"Can this be real?" asks Bishop Crowther, when engaged in the first ordination on the banks of the Niger; "is this the way Christianity spread to remote countries in the centuries of its promulgation? . . . If so, let the Church of Christ buckle on her armour, for this is the time of her action." The good Bishop not only exhorts to action, but labours himself with remarkable zeal and energy. He left Liverpool towards the end

It is believed that when the great men, such as the king, chiefs, and other person country, die, they go to the white man's country, and become such as I am, tray white men, having adopted their habits; hence they regard us as their countrymen and taken our next state in the white man's country, and are therefore feared. A know whether the white man's country was not in the neighbourhood of God's resid and consequently much nearer to God than the black man; and whether, by looking we could not see and know when any one is about to die; that is, how much longer to live in this world. It is also believed that when we see any person of note, such take him in a book to the white man's country. The magic of photography, which I take at Gbebe, confirms their idea of this notion. I was glad that I did not take Idda with his photographic machine, which would in all probability have so frigt and kept him shut up in his place, that there would have been no possibility of s during my stay at Idda, lest he should be photographed and taken to the white man's would have been construed into hastening his death.

Another difficulty in obtaining an interview arose from the royal cal thickly studded with unlucky days :—

From one market-day to another there are three intervening days, as follows :—

Eke, a market day, unlucky for the Ata to see strangers.

Ede, an intervening day, lucky or good day.

Afo, " " unlucky or bad day.

Uko, " " lucky or good day.

Eke, repetition of the first, a market-day, unlucky for the Ata to see stran
From Eke to Uko. Four days; four days is their cycle of reckoning, the l repetition of the first, so their every alternate day is unlucky for the Ata to see str these lucky and unlucky days, the Mohammedans have made the people to believe tl Aljima, is an unlucky day to undertake any work of importance, and the Ata did not this to his stock of unpropitious days.

The Bishop was almost tired of waiting, and about to return without s when he was promised an interview the next day. It took place accord obtained a conditional promise of his sanction to establish a mission at three weeks afterwards, Dr. Crowther paid his second visit, in company with the Investigator. On this occasion no difficulty was experienced in seeing his sanction was given unconditionally for the commencement of the missio Bishop Crowther baptized ten adults and seven children, all children of conve

Seventeen adults were baptized during last year at the Bread-fruit Station mission at Lagos. "Many more might be baptized," writes the missionary, only make the door of entrance into Christ's visible Church wider." The du the support of religion has been inculcated upon the native congregation so last year there was a prospect of their weekly contributions reaching nearly year before it had only amounted to one-fifth of that sum. The missionaries view the establishment of the native church upon the principle of self-support

The baptism of fourteen adults—eleven women and three men—took pla towards the close of last year, at Ake, one of the four stations of the Chu open to the messengers of the truth. One good sign is that the road between Abbeokuta and the coast is now free from obstruction; and that in consequence of this, cotton has been taken down to Lagos of the value of upwards of 12,300*l*. The whole of this sum (except a small per-centage for duty) is the price of native labour. "It is," we are told, "over the value of 1,000 slaves, caught in war: 2,000 Dahomians would scarcely be worth that amount."

It is saddening to find that, although the people of Abbeokuta have been so signally and repeatedly delivered from their enemies, the rites of Oro still continue to be practised by some of their number. The Rev. J. A. Maser writes:—

The whole town is much agitated by rumours that persons are to be caught in order to make sacrifices of them. Our boy, who fetches daily milk, could not be sent alone to the place, because we were afraid he would be taken. In the afternoon I had a burial at Owu; Robert Coker, who died the previous evening, being fully persuaded that Jesus was his Saviour, who had forgiven his sins, was to be interred. Whilst we stood on the solitary hill committing his body to the ground, in the sure and certain hope of the resurrection to eternal life, we heard the dismal noise of the Oro whips in the valley about the Aro gate. One of the few Christians who were there said he and his township would not be safe in going to the place of Oro: only the pure-born Egbas were now there, engaged in expelling the spirits of the slain Dahomians from the late battle-field: it was then seventy days since the battle had taken place. The report that human sacrifices had been made on the occasion was asserted by one and denied by several whom I asked about it. Who can know what happens on such occasions? Gross darkness covers the people. I was told, never since the days of Shodeke were the people of Abbeokuta more terrified than during those three Oro days.

It may be remembered that the native catechist Doherty, at one time reported to have been put to death by the King of Dahomey, was subsequently stated to be still alive. This statement, we are happy to learn, is confirmed, and some further encouraging intelligence has been received of the captive catechist. One of the Church missionaries writes:—

From the balogun, or chief warrior of Ishagga, who escaped when the Dahomians took that town, I heard, a few days since, that Doherty was still in the Dahomey country. An Ishagga woman had found her way from Dahomey to Okeodan, where the balogun saw her. She lived not far from the farm where Doherty was. She told him, before leaving, her purpose. He wanted her, if she succeeded in reaching a safe place, and had an opportunity, to salute his wife and children, and tell them he was still alive, and hoped some day to see them again. She said he was accustomed to call the Ishagga people, of whom there were many within a short distance, together, and hold meetings for prayer; that he tried to keep Sunday as a day of rest and worship. It is not difficult to guess what would be the burden of the prayers of that little band in captivity. I cannot help but ask myself sometimes, whether God has not allowed this to take place for the purpose of opening a door for the Gospel into Dahomey. One, at least, cannot forget that it was a little maid in captivity, too, who was instrumental in leading Naaman to the knowledge of the one true God.

The missionary is sometimes privileged to interpose between the murderous aims of ferocious heathens and their intended victims. An agent of the American Board at the Gaboon writes, that one Sabbath morning—

A man fleeing for his life came up the steps at my back door—one man at his heels with a hatchet raised, and another a few steps behind him, with a long spear poised. I knew some of the men, and saw in a moment the state of the case. He was accused of having "witched" a man who had recently died, and while being led to execution escaped, and fled for his life. I stepped between the fugitive and the pursuers, and there the pursuit ended. They did not dare to enter my house, but they howled around it in such a manner as no other provocation could have excited. The prey had been snatched from the teeth of the mighty. There were some persons engaged in the affair who ought to have been in better business on that Sabbath morning; but no member of the church was compromised by it.

The same missionary states that the district had been visited by Popish missionaries, and adds:—

They make little or no attempt to check the killing of those accused of witchcraft, or killing by charms. They have no hope for the Mpongwes or slaves, but only labour for the foreigners. Their schools have very few Mpongwes in them. They sell rum and other spirits without stint. This we could not believe till it was put beyond all doubt.

SOUTH AFRICA.

An annual gathering, lasting two or three days, is held by the Zulu converts of the American Board. The last occasion of the kind, at Inanda, was of deep interest. One of the missionaries who was present writes:—

Two young men who had been employed by the native Home Missionary Society were examined, and received a licence to preach the Gospel to their countrymen. I believe these are the first natives formally set apart to this work in Natal. As you have already been informed, the native Home Missionary Society is an offshoot of our own, the progress of which we contemplate with great interest. The two men just licensed receive their entire support from this society. Collections were made for their support for the coming year, and with a liberality worthy of commendation, the people laid on the table sixty-seven pounds sterling in cash, pledging twenty-one pounds more. As I know that some of these contributors are really poor, and have hardly sufficient means to buy necessary clothing, no longer intent upon the acquisition of a gun, but desiring, above all things, to attain to the only true God. He expressed his determination to go no further, but to remain here, where he might be instructed in the things that make for his peace. He was received into one of the classes on trial, and became a most earnest seeker of salvation. When I met the class for tickets, his emotion was so great, that he was unable to speak on that occasion, he said he could not help weeping to think that he, who had until recently not believed in the existence of a God, was now numbered among His children. At the baptismal service that he tried his utmost to keep down the tumult in his breast; but when I came to the place where the command of Jesus is cited, "Go ye, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," he was compelled to give vent to his feelings in sobs and tears.

Cases of persecution sometimes occur among the Fingoes, but it is satisfactory in a recent instance, the chiefs so discountenanced it, that the offenders were brought to trial and on appeal only obtained an augmentation of the penalty.

The Wesleyan missionaries in the Bechuana district, as the result of a conference upon the subject at their annual meeting at Grahamstown, have resolved wholly to discontinue the toleration which some of them have hitherto exercised of the practice of certain customs by their members. The buying of wives with cattle, circumcision, the use of lity wala (a highly-intoxicating beverage, brewed from Kaffir corn), and the use of tobacco, are wholly prohibited throughout the Wesleyan stations. While these old customs were abolished, the class-leaders report to the minister the contemplated introduction of novelty, which they appear to view with suspicion:—

Several of the members of the church were arranging together to have a timmi (a tea-meeting) preparations were in hand. Bread was being made; sugar and other commodities collected; and an ox was to be victimised. Many invitations had been sent out; and it was to come off on the following Sunday, at the close of the afternoon service. I hesitated to do so, but was at a loss for a considerable length of time to understand what could be the character of this, to me, new custom of timmitti. The leaders assured me that this was not anything of the kind had been known on the station. A question or two brought out the import. It was a "tea-meeting" that they were intending to have. The promoters were imagined, principally of the "fair sex," if that term may be applied to the sable daughter. The meeting was held; but, of course, the missionary insisted upon that part of the programme being altered which fixed it for Sunday.

MADAGASCAR.

Christianity, not only at the capital, and in the surrounding country, but in the remote districts, is reported to be visibly extending and gathering strength. There are congregations and native chapels, two recently erected, in Antananarivo, each with a minister attached, besides a central training-school. Each of the congregations is presided over by a European missionary, assisted by native pastors and deacons. The population of the capital number 7,000, of whom 1,410 are church members. This is exclusive of the surrounding villages, in many of which there are congregations and churches, where the Gospel is still spreading. In one of these—Ilfy, an ancient, pictu-

the prosecution of their work. The French Minister for Foreign Affairs expresses his regret at the occurrences complained of, assures the British Ambassador that "the most stringent orders had been sent to prevent a renewal of them; and that, so far from there being any desire on the part of the Imperial Government to discourage the labours of Protestant missionaries in the Loyalty Islands, there was every disposition to foster and protect them." The Emperor's reply is as follows:—

Gentlemen,—I have received the complaints which you have addressed to me relative to the recent proceedings of the Governor of New Caledonia, in the Loyalty Islands. I have caused a letter to be written to Commandant Guillaum, condemning any measure which might impede the free exercise of your ministry in those distant countries. I am certain that, far from raising difficulties in the way of the representatives of the French authority, the Protestant missions, like the Catholic, will aid it in spreading amongst the aborigines of that archipelago the benefits of Christianity and civilisation.

Receive, gentlemen, the assurance of my distinguished sentiments.
Tuileries, Jan. 24, 1865.

NAPOLÉON.

It will be remembered that there are three islands in the Loyalty Group—Lifu, Maré, and Uea. The proceedings of the French governor at the first of these, referred to above, have been already reported. We now learn that Governor Guillaum had previously visited Maré, taken the Rev. John Jones, the missionary, to task for living in that place, which he claimed as a French colony, without "a permit of residence;" annulled all purchases of land from the natives, closed the Evangelists' Seminary, and all schools, except those conducted by natives; prohibited the Rev. Mr. Jones from preaching to the heathen; and interdicted the Rarotongan and Samoan evangelists from pursuing their work. "We are now nothing better than prisoners," writes Mr. Jones, "for what crime we are not privileged to know; but it is a fact that we cannot move about without first obtaining permission, and when we seek that, it is refused us." There is reason to believe that the same restrictions have been imposed upon the missionaries in Uea.

Erromanga—where, it may be remembered, repose the remains of the devoted John Williams and George Gordon, both slain by the natives—has been visited by the Day-Spring mission-ship, under circumstances which seem to indicate that speedily there, as elsewhere of old, "the blood of the martyrs" will prove "the seed of the Church." As the vessel neared the shore, natives came down to the rocks and shouted an invitation to land, while others waved cocoa-nut leaves in token of their good-will. The missionaries were welcomed on disembarking by a large number of natives, one of whom is a Christian teacher. The missionaries' hearts were gladdened by the intelligence that about 300 people around Dillon's Bay were attending the means of grace, and were really anxious for instruction. They had within a few months erected four chapels. Several of the natives, it is believed, have heartily embraced the truth, and are desiring to live in accordance with the will of God. The missionary party came in contact with the murderer of Mr. Gordon, who "seemed to understand very little the enormity of his crime." The natives by whom they had been welcomed made them a present of the best of their provisions, and parted from them with regret. As the visitors left the shore to return to the vessel, the women who had followed them to the boat set up a loud lamentation.

In the Friendly Islands, the Wesleyan congregations at Vavau continue to experience the reviving influences of the Holy Spirit. There had been an increase of eighty-four church members during the previous quarter, and more than one hundred and fifty were candidates for admission. The brethren are opposed by French priests, whose spurious Christianity is seen in their patronage of systematic Sabbath-breaking. "The Papists assemble on the afternoon of the Lord's-day to sing songs and play different games. This is not permitted by law, but they have done it on their premises, as a part of their religion, to keep the people out of mischief." The priests are able to make but few converts, however, and these are of bad character—"the worst of the worst."

Seventeen persons have been received by the Rev. Mr. Snow, of the American Board, to the little church at Elbon, Micronesia. All the chiefs, however, are now on the heathen side, and the missionary feels that it will be remarkable if all the professing Christians should stand firm against opposing influences.

It is our painful duty to record the decease of another of our missionary correspondents—the Rev. P. Gould Bird, a young and energetic labourer in Samoa. He and his wife—whose death preceded his own—were sent out by the London Society but little more than six years ago. The Rev. J. J. Dennis, of the London Society's mission in Travancore, has so been cut down in the prime of life; and in other parts of the field two missionaries of the same society mourn the loss of their wives.

Literature.

The Bible Manual: an Expository and Practical Commentary on the Books of Scripture, arranged in Chronological Order. Translated from the German Work edited by the late Rev. Dr. T. C. BARTH, of Calw. Nisbet and Co.

CERTAINLY the cheapest, this is withal one of the most comprehensive and satisfactory of commentaries. A continuous effort to answer the question, "Understandest thou what thou readest?" its pages are encumbered with no irrelevant matter, and the points on which thoughtful readers desire information it explains in the fewest and clearest words. At the same time, it has none of the curt and uncomfortable conciseness which renders abridgments and compilations so bald and arid. The work of a sound divine and a saintly man, it is pervaded all through by his gentle, loving, and serious spirit, and is well fitted to strengthen the faith and warm the devotion of the reader. It is called a translation, and so in one sense it is; but they are English thoughts which Barth has written in these German words. The only time we saw him in his peaceful seclusion on the edge of the Black Forest, we remember how one of his apartments was hung round with portraits of English Churchmen, and another with English Nonconformists. Why he had separated the two classes we do not know; but both sets of worthies looked equally well in that mellow Wurtemberg air; and these chambers of innocent imagery were emblematic of his own mind, in which English thought, and especially English theology, had become naturalised, and grew side by side with the careful scholarship and minute exactitude of Germany. Hence, although it has already gone through repeated editions abroad, in coming to Britain it seems as if his book had at last come home; and we trust that it is destined to prove a lasting blessing to the churches of these lands. For missionaries, for young men going abroad, for emigrants, we do not know any book of Biblical elucidation at once so comprehensive and so portable; and its exegetical value is greatly enhanced by its practical tendency, and the devout and reverential spirit which breathes through all its pages.

Joc Witless: or, the Call to Repentance. By ELIZA B. HUNTER. Morgan and Chase.

MOST persons are acquainted with members of the Witless family, and will readily perceive that our author has studied the character and course of one of them. She has drawn up a sketch which will, we hope, be found attractive to the young, for whom it is written, and be useful to them. The book will be a very suitable addition to popular and school libraries, for which its graphic style and practical tendency seem to fit it.

The Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan Ben Uzziel on the Pentateuch; with the Fragments of the Jerusalem Targum: from the Chaldee. By J. W. ETHERIDGE, M.A. Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. Longman and Co.

THIS is the second and concluding portion of Mr. Etheridge's undertaking. The former volume contained the books of Genesis and Exodus, with a literary preface or introduction; and this contains the three last books of the Pentateuch, with a preface explaining a variety of technical and other Jewish terms occurring in the Targums on the Pentateuch. The editor and translator is well known for his diligent prosecution of Hebrew and Aramaic studies, in which he has published several works. That which is now before us is perhaps the most practically important of them all, because it illustrates the Jewish methods of explaining the Books of Moses. The word "Targum" signifies an interpretation, whether a literal translation or a paraphrase, and is akin to the word "dragoman," which is continually applied to an interpreter in books of Eastern travel. The Targum of Onkelos is an almost literal Chaldee version of the Pentateuch, and is of considerable use as an aid to the understanding of the text. It was probably written after the middle of the second century. The Jerusalem Targum is a much more recent explanation of portions of the Pentateuch, and is very diffuse and fanciful. The Targum of Jonathan Ben Uzziel is still more modern, and is not only diffuse and fanciful, but abounds in fabulous additions. Mr. Etheridge's version is avowedly literal, and is somewhat eccentric in its spelling of proper names; but it is a work of real interest, and is the only translation of these curious productions in our language. He deserves much credit for the execution of his work, which we have no hesitation in recommending to all who wish to know the true character of the Targums.

Meditations on Select Passages of Holy Scripture. By the late Rev. JOSEPH THORPE MILNER. With Brief Memorial of the Author, by the Rev. GERVASE SMITH. H. J. Tresidder.

A BOOK like this is rather to be read than to be criticised, for it is one long utterance of a Christian soul on the verge of that eternity which it expected soon to enter, and actually entered in little more than three months after the pages were finished. We learn from the preface that the whole of it was written in two months, amid great bodily weakness, and with the idea that it might be its author's last work. This is why we call it "one utterance." The accomplishment of in so short a time, was under the most remarkable; and yet there seems no want of spiritual energy. The book is well fitted for closet reading, and is well fitted for the pulpit. It comprises twenty meditations on passages of Scripture. It is characterized by fluency of expression, diversity of thought, and peculiar earnestness and spirituality. The author was a highly-respected Wesleyan minister and author, whose varied labours and extensive usefulness will cause him to be long remembered in that branch of Christ's Church to which he belonged. We hope the volume will, as it deserves, meet with extensive acceptance.

Monthly Retrospect.

FOREIGN.

His Encyclical Letter, its reception by the French bishops, and the opposition thereby placed themselves in to the Imperial Government, continues to be of general society in France. The letters of our correspondents throw much light on the ideas that pervade society there, and on the way in which the Encyclical is received by all classes, Protestant and Roman Catholic alike. It is understood that the Emperor, or his advisers, have become sensible that this celebrated document has gone too far in irritating the Imperial power, and that a sort of apology has been tendered and accepted. But the Emperor remains firm to his principle of withdrawing his troops from Rome, and has now fixed their final departure to date from the day that the Emperor took up his residence in Florence. But perhaps the opinion of the Emperor on the Church of Rome may best be derived from his speech on opening the Chamber, which took place in the early part of the month. This speech was regarded with considerable interest, as it was expected that his Majesty would show more than his usual frankness, his policy for coming years. The speech did not disappoint public expectation. With regard to the refractory bishops, he threatened that he reminded the Legislature that as the Roman Catholic Church received advantages from the State, which were not accorded to other communions, it was incumbent on the dignitaries of that Church to respect the authority and maintain the independence of the State from which they derived those favours. In respect to the other parts of Europe, the speech was eminently pacific. After dwelling upon the success of our arms in Algeria, in Mexico, and in China, during the previous year, the Emperor exhorted the Legislature, in terms that will be generally echoed throughout Europe, that it had been done for glory, and that it was the duty of France now to cultivate the peace, and to devote herself to a course of internal improvement. He dwelt with emphasis on the propriety of extending the blessings of primary education to all classes, especially necessary in a land of universal suffrage. He also recommended as a measure for the abolition of imprisonment for debt, besides other projects of social character. These pacific sentiments will reassure the Governments of Europe and enable the different Continental Powers to follow the French example, and devote themselves to the cultivation of the arts of peace.

The state of Italy assumes daily a more interesting aspect to the friends of civil and religious liberty. The quarrel with the Pope grows even more irreconcilable, and that through the obstinacy of Pius himself. There is no doubt whatever that the King of the Romans would gladly make terms with him; for they well know that whatever the case in the large towns, in the country districts the hold of the Church upon the minds of the population is still very strong. They would therefore be willing to grant him almost any concession, on condition that he would sanction and still further consolidate the Italian kingdom; but that is the one concession which he will not make.

His obstinacy is doing more to contribute to his own downfall than any other cause at work; and the active-minded among the people—the minority, perhaps, but the minority that inaugurate and accomplish great revolutions—are becoming rapidly convinced of the notion that the Pope and united Italy are two powers which cannot exist together.

When the French troops are withdrawn from Rome, which the Emperor has recently repeated his determination to effect, then will come the strain upon the resources, and then it will be proved how far he is in a condition to maintain himself without external aid. In the meantime it is gratifying to learn, from various sources, stances, the circulation of God's Word is rapidly extending, and there is a preaching of the pure Gospel which, unfortunately, the agencies now at work are unable fully to supply.

In the other portions of the Continent of Europe there are few subjects to that would be of interest to our readers. The question of the Duchies remains unsettled, as it is said that Austria and Prussia cannot agree on their final disposal. Spain, the nation has been pleasantly surprised by a voluntary offer on the part of the Crown to sell the Crown lands for the national benefit, reserving to the Crown only a part of the proceeds of the sale. The flush of prosperity which attended Spain a few years ago has long been dissipated by her insane Moorish and St. Domingo wars; her property, or large portions of it, were confiscated in the course of the various wars, and the refusal of her Ministers to acknowledge former loans, rendered it hopeless to attempt to raise another in any of the money-markets of Europe. In this straits no resource open to her but the sale of the Crown lands; and if the offer is made, the Queen deserves credit for the self-denial which has prompted her to this sacrifice.

The intelligence from Turkey is far from satisfactory. There seems to be a determination on the part of the Turkish authorities to render civil and religious liberty in Turkey, so far as it relates to the Turks themselves, a dead letter, and to treat the humayoun, that splendid monument of the wisdom and genius of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, as a piece of waste paper. Protestants are, in the outlying districts, often subjected to doubled taxes; in no case is it allowed that a Turk should turn a Protestant. This is curiously illustrated by the fact that whereas hitherto the firman for the establishment of a Protestant community directed the pashas to enrol any Turk who might profess the Christian faith—though such an enrolment never in fact took place—now the mere permission is taken away, and the firmans direct only Greeks and Armenians to be enrolled. Mr. Stuart, the Chargé d'Affaires, is acting with an earnestness of purpose which secures for him the respect and gratitude of all the Protestant bodies in Constantinople; but as he is only in temporary charge, he cannot take any decisive measures he otherwise might, nor can he command the same attention from the Sultan. While on this subject, we may mention that the official correspondence on the subject of persecutions has lately been laid before Parliament, from which it will be seen that Mr. Russell lost no time in fulfilling the promises he made to the deputation that waited on him that he would institute a full and searching investigation. Among other things he transmitted to Sir Henry Bulwer a copy of our correspondent's letter, which appeared in the Evangelical Christendom for the month of November, last year, and called upon the Government for an explanation of the charges there made. The reply of the Ambassador is not yet received, and it will be seen that, with every disposition to deny the truth of these statements, and to underrate their importance, he is constrained to admit that much of them may be true.

amendment recently passed for the abolition of slavery. It was not to be expected that these terms either on the one side or the other would be accepted at present. Each party meant the complete submission of the other; and neither is so exhausted or prostrate as to accept peace on such terms. It is something that the idea of meeting to negotiate for peace has established itself in men's minds; a beginning has been made. They will, perhaps, get familiarised to it, and each party may abate something of its first high pretensions. But for the present the war must go on. The Federal generals are imitating Sherman's brilliant scheme of piercing the interior of the Confederacy, and marching through the heart of the Confederate States, where no troops are found to offer resistance. The Confederates, on their part, refuse to arm their slaves; whether from confidence that they can conquer independence without their help, or whether from a selfish desire to withhold their human property from the service of the State, it is impossible to say.

The irritation that had grown up in the Federal States against Canada, in consequence of the release of the St. Alban's raiders, has now in great part subsided. The Canadians on their part have shown every desire to do what is right in the matter. The released prisoners were recaptured on another warrant, and are now to be given up to the States, and effective measures are about to be taken to prevent similar outrages for the future. The Federal Government has caused it to be notified to England that the termination of the engagement for the disarmament of the Lakes is only for a temporary object, and for purposes of police, and Lord Palmerston is said to be so satisfied with these explanations, that it is not now intended to send an additional naval force from England to cope with the Federals on these inland waters.

From Mexico we learn that the Emperor Maximilian has already embroiled himself with the Pope. It may be remembered that he was welcomed to the country by the clerical party, who had just before been defeated by Juarez. The defeated faction expected to find in the new Emperor an instrument by whom they could take vengeance on their rivals, and restore the reign of clerical domination; and their annoyance and chagrin are extreme on finding that, though opposed to Juarez on political grounds, his ecclesiastical views are much nearer to him than to those of his own friends. The Pope has interfered on behalf of the clericals, but with no effect whatever. Maximilian is as liberal in his opinions on Church matters as Louis Napoleon. It is said that the defeated party are again making head, and whispers are heard in various quarters that the French troops have been defeated in more than one engagement.

HOME.

The last session of the present Parliament was opened on the 7th of last month. There was a report that Her Majesty intended to perform the ceremony in person; and the prospect of such an event sent a thrill of joy through the hearts of her people, as it indicated that Her Majesty was at last able to overmaster her great and consuming sorrow, and to give herself, as she was wont to do, to the public duties of her high station. But it was not to be. As the time drew near, the Queen felt herself still unequal to the task, and the opening of the present session, as of so many before, was performed by commission. The Royal speech was even more than usually meagre; and it is understood that little will be attempted in this closing session of the Parliament beyond the passing of the estimates and other unattractive work for the year. Some measures of social reform are, however, promised, and among them, one of considerable importance has been introduced in relation to the poor laws. It provides that the poor-rate shall no longer be collected, as heretofore, from each separate parish, but that it shall extend over the entire union, and, as a consequence, that an applicant for relief need not be removed from one parish to another, if the parish he has a claim on, and that he resides in, are in the same union. Every step which gets rid of the social misery and the pecuniary waste of these pauper removals is a conferred advantage, and will be welcomed at least by the poor, while it is asserted the ratepayers also will share in the benefit. This, and measures like this, which are all that will probably occupy the attention of Parliament in its closing hours, do not bulk largely in the public eye, but they correct many petty evils, and redress some grievous wrongs. More exciting questions might easily be imagined, but it is no slight cause for thankfulness to the Supreme Ruler, that He has so ordered our national affairs, and infused into the minds of our people such a spirit of peace, unity, and concord, as to leave us at leisure for the adjustment of these minute but important points in our social system.

more seditious associations of Fenianism. The middle class, however—a body steady growth in Ireland—are too sensible of the blessings they enjoy to risk them either the one association or the other. At the meeting referred to, credit was ta association for nominating the new candidate for Tipperary. But the truth is, he by the bishops, who happen to be members of the association; and their dicta have been equally powerful with the electors had it been against the association the seat was vacated by The O'Donoghue simply because he had incurred the dis these prelates by preferring the Fenian agitation to the quieter, but perhaps no gerous, movements of the National Association.

We have given elsewhere a summary of the proceedings of Convocation, wh three or four days last month, and separated under a promise from the Archbishop are to have a second meeting, with a full fortnight for the transaction of bus Easter. It will be seen that this venerable body intermeddles with many questic power to deal with any is of the smallest. The Convocations of both provinces a time since to the establishment of a new canon, on a point so small as the permi parent to become one of the sponsors for an infant in baptism; but even this can the sanction of the Crown to make it legal, and that sanction does not appear to be fo The censure on "Essays and Reviews," which was passed last year, is now protested a portion of the Convocation, insignificant neither in numbers nor influenc discussion took place on the question of a reconstruction of the Court of Appe grand debate is to take place, we understand, in the Easter sitting.

Death has been busy among our eminent men during the past month. Th Northumberland died, in the 73rd year of his age, at Alnwick Castle, early in He possessed almost unbounded means of doing good, with a disposition to means to the utmost. The improvement of cottages on his extensive estates was local revolution in that part of the country, and a little before his death he had t to build and endow ten new churches on his property, which the increase of popu rendered necessary. His death was followed, within a few days, by that o Wiseman, to whom we have referred elsewhere, and of whom we need only say tl be doubted whether his Church has reaped more good than harm from that misse to England which was announced fifteen years ago with such an arrogant tru from the Vatican. The latest in the list of mortality was an old companion in a Duke of Wellington, the Viscount Combermere, who had been a man of war from having served all through the wars in the Peninsula and Central India, had been oft wounded, and yet lived to enjoy his hard-won honours to a ripe old age, surviv former military companions, and dying at last at the patriarchal age of ninety-five.

Evangelical Alliance.

NOTE.—The Evangelical Alliance is responsible only for what is inserted under this head.

WEEK OF PRAYER, 1865.

There is reason to believe that the annual circular inviting Christians throughout the world to spend the first week in the new year for united prayer has been more largely responded to this year than on any former occasion. Numerous communications have already been received of most interesting character, showing the wide-spread sympathy felt with this call to simultaneous and united supplication, and that in many instances gracious results have already followed. The following extracts from a few of the letters will be read with interest, encouraging the belief that the presence and power of the Holy Spirit manifested during the week of prayer will be more abundant blessings than have yet appeared:—

CHINA.—A correspondent writing from Shanghai, dated December 26, says: "I duly received a circular for the proposed week of prayer in time to send copies to the missionaries in Peking. Since the frost closed the northern rivers, I have also sent copies to Hongkong, in the south, Amoy, in the centre, besides Ningpo and Foochow, in our more immediate neighbourhood. I have also placed copies in the hands of the different missionaries here. All promise co-operation."

TURKEY.—Constantinople.—Public meetings were held in the chapel of the Dutch Embassy, in the city, under the auspices of the Constantinople branch of the Evangelical Alliance, and also in other parts of the city, and throughout the empire. It was "in every respect a happy illustration of practical Christian unity and Christian sympathy among those of different nationalities and different churches of the one true Church."

WALLACHIA.—Bucharest.—During the week of prayer, meetings were held every evening in connection with the mission and its community. A spirit of earnest devotion and longing desire pervaded them.

SWEDEN.—Stockholm.—Extract from a private letter, dated January 7, 1865: "It is most refreshing to see the work of God going on here as elsewhere, more powerfully than I ever have seen it anywhere else. It is almost in vain to try to get in to any of the churches where popular preaching is to be heard, unless you go nearly an hour before the time. The Evangelical Alliance prayer meetings are now going on, and with them is the same. They are crowded to excess. Yesterday evening, Bethlehem Church, which holds about 1,200 people, was not only full, but the doors were open, and hundreds were standing in the street gathering up the sounds that reached them from within."

Aristonstad.—Much interest is felt in all our country by the churches on the observance of the week of universal prayer. We in this our Fatherland all covet to see great effects following our united prayers in the great name of our Saviour.

Believe humbly that many sinners have found the road they were travelling, and are on the good way. We have seen many tears in our assemblies, and in Stockholm the consistorium is obliged to report to the King that the churches of the capital cannot hold the people, and that more must be built. The prayers of the Wednesday, when special supplication was made for the children of Christian parents, were more than usually heartstirring. In my parish a baptism returned to his parents the last days of that week.

SWITZERLAND.—Neufchatel.—We have prayer meetings every day during the special week of prayer. They were held in a chapel containing about 400 persons. Pastors of our National Church, of the Free Church, and of the Moravian Brethren, presided alternately every day; from five to eight or nine brethren of their different denominations led the prayers of the assembly. The whole week was a blessed one for our little town.

Geneva.—The week of prayer was observed in this city of the great Reformer. The meetings were well attended, and were felt to be fruitful in blessing.

GERMANY.—Berlin.—I write you a few lines about our prayer meetings at Berlin. A number of the most influential clergy of Berlin united in making arrangements for these meetings. The most frequented was the one held Thursday, January 5, in the large and handsome hall of the "Evangelische Verein." It was distinguished by the presence of her Majesty the Queen Augusta of Prussia. The Queen was received on her arrival by the members of the committee of the Evangelical Alliance, and expressed her particular sympathy in this work of the Alliance. The addresses were delivered and prayer offered by General Superintendent Hoffmann, Pastor Dr. Kögel, Pastor Wünsche (Moravian), and the home missionary Heesekiel. The riches of thought in the addresses, and the fervour and warmth of the prayers, made evidently a deep impression upon all who were present. Her Majesty, at the close of the meeting, inquired very particularly how long this week of prayer had been observed in England and Germany, and expressed the urgent desire that these prayer meetings might be repeated annually in Berlin. At the same time, the Queen observed, that she had been much gratified and edified by the meeting. It is surely a matter of rejoicing, if the great ones of this earth begin to turn their attention to the cause of prayer.

Bremen.—The week of prayer has always been to us a time of refreshing, but this year the children of God have not only been richly blessed, but sinners were awakened and converted. Every evening our lecture-room was filled with praying people, and as great interest seemed to be felt, the meetings were continued till Saturday, the 21st, and about ten persons professed to have found peace in the blood of Christ. The teachers of the Sunday-schools commenced prayer meetings with the children, and here also the Lord manifested himself, and several children found the Saviour, and prove till now that they are in earnest. In D—, eight miles north-east from Bremen, in the Grand-Duchy of Oldenburg, the Lord has also heard the prayers of the people, and conversions interest felt in them.

ITALY.—Naples.—You will be glad to hear that the week of prayer was observed here very generally. I send you the programme we had printed. It will show you how all the Evangelical churches here were represented. The meetings were very well attended, and cannot fail to have impressed any Papists with the fact that there is a oneness of spirit and aim amongst us higher than that of their associations, which are of earth. The Evangelical Alliance strikes everywhere a blow at Rome's vaunted unity, and shows its hollowness, by setting forth the substance of true unity.

FRANCE.—Paris.—Agreeably to the wish expressed by the Evangelical Alliance, Christians in Paris united their petitions day by day to those which ascended from all parts of the earth to the Throne of God, in the name of Jesus Christ, the only Mediator. There were two series of meetings, one in the English language in different chapels, and the other in the French language. The attendance was variable, but a hallowed influence pervaded them, and the addresses were deeply interesting. Besides these general meetings, there were, in different suburbs, réunions for prayer and religious conversation.

Le Vigan.—Our Evangelical Alliance committee has opened this year, as it did the last, with meetings for united prayer, which were more largely attended than on previous occasions. In many neighbouring towns and villages there have also been meetings held with much satisfaction, though with smaller numbers. It is not, however, the number of those who assemble, but their sincerity and fervour, that give importance to the meetings. They were not many who prayed on the mountain when Joshua fought against Amalek, and yet they prevailed. We also fight and pray, not depending on our own force, but on the force we call down from above, and we shall conquer, not in obtaining the destruction of the Amalek opposed to us, but in seeing them lay down their weapons, and pass over converted to the ranks of our blessed Saviour's army.

Lyons.—We largely circulated translated copies of your circular invitation for the week of prayer. The meetings have been well attended, especially week of this year, it would be to it now to be the Lord's remembrancers, and recall the prayers of that time, beseech fulfil His promises, and to do for His sake more than we can ask or think.

CANADA WEST.—Kingston.—The week has been observed in this city by all people of all denominations together in Hall. The spirit manifested was good, principle and according to the circular of the Evangelical Alliance.

JERSEY.—St. Heliers.—The week of prayer was observed in St. Heliers as in former years besides services on the Sundays, mid-day on the six successive days, in the late town, which was well filled each day with various ministers presiding in successive general meetings was also held on the Friday, which was crowded, hundreds being in the room. Much interest was felt in the meetings, and a deep impression appeared to have been produced.

Grantham.—Meetings were held daily also in several country places, and such meetings as few, if any of us, remember to have privileged to attend before. The amount of influence and power which has since a preaching of the Word, and the number now seeking the Saviour, prove to us that what has been heard, and is being answered.

Torquay.—The daily united meetings were largely attended; indeed, every day was crowded, and often many people who could not get admission.

Pembroke Dock.—In former years united prayer has been observed in this town in different churches separately; this year we solved to act in concert. United prayers were therefore held, which were earnest and to the point, fervent and interesting. I am convinced that the churches have been greatly drawn to God, and I believe that the spirit of God has been greatly quickened. The attendance at our week-night services has been doubtless trebled. We have much reason to thank God for the courage.

Leamington.—The January prayer meetings

Nottingham.—Our united meeting during the latter week was overflowing, and was a solemn and edifying occasion.

Kewick.—Meetings were held and well attended. It would be premature to speak of any marked results, except that I am confident there has been an increased cementing of heart together among Christians, and a deepening feeling of our mutual unity. This in itself is an unspeakable blessing.

Ramsgate.—We had a week of united prayer, and I trust this delightful institution may become permanent throughout our land and the entire world. I have heard of the case of an individual who obtained great comfort, if not perfect peace, at the first of these meetings, and our missionary and other friends who speak to the people in the villages, have told me that they have had more belief and power given them in speaking, and that their hearers have evinced an unusual earnestness in receiving the Gospel.

Barrogate.—United prayer meetings were held here during the first week in the new year, and were well attended. Several acknowledge receiving the convicting grace of God during these services, and by means of them.

Gratifying communications have also been received from many other towns, including those of Scotland and Ireland.

THE FOREIGN SECRETARY'S VISIT TO BÜCKEBURG. —INTERVIEW WITH H.M. THE KING OF HANNOVER, AND CONFERENCE WITH THE BRETHREN IN HOLLAND.

At the committee meeting held January 25, the Foreign Secretary, who had returned from the Continent the previous day, reported the result of his mission:—

1. To Bückeburg, the capital of the principality of Schaumburg-Lippe, on behalf of the Baptist missionary Scheve, of Herford (Prussia), who, in consequence of his having administered to members of the Baptist Church in that principality the sacrament of baptism once, and of the king's Supper twice, had been sentenced by a court of justice at Bückeburg to eighteen months' imprisonment, material bail having been refused for his appearance whenever called upon.

He had appealed against this sentence to the same Court of Appeal at Wolfenbüttel (Brunswick), but, owing to the want of means and an able counsel, he had requested the Foreign Secretary to use his influence with the Government at Bückeburg to obtain a reversal of the sentence. The Foreign Secretary, furnished with letters of introduction to the leading Government officials, went January 12 to Bückeburg, and after a long conference with the President of the Government, Mr. Lane Münchhofen and the Councillor Mr. von

Wiese, he obtained the promise that Mr. Scheve should rely upon a free pardon as soon as he would file in a petition to the Prince to that effect. The Foreign Secretary was unable to see the Prince on account of his absence from Bückeburg, but he met with his Court chaplain, a devoted minister and friend of the Evangelical Alliance, several times setting forth the principles and operations of the Society, as well as a copy of the Narrative of the Evangelical Alliance deputation to Madrid, which he promised to hand over to the Prince. He at the same time engaged to mention to his Highness the object of Dr. Nettan's coming to Bückeburg, and the results of his conference with the principal members of his Government.

2. To Hanover. Reported interviews with the Minister of Worship at Hanover, and the venerable President of the Consistory, from both of whom he received the assurance, previously communicated to him by members of the Baptist Church, that in the kingdom of Hanover the Baptists (who had formerly suffered much persecution) were enjoying at present the blessing of religious liberty, and the free exercise of public worship. The Foreign Secretary reported also his interview with his Majesty the King of Hanover, at the palace of Herrenhausen, when he had ample opportunity of making his Majesty acquainted with the principles, objects, and results of the Evangelical Alliance. His Majesty was pleased to accept copies of the Narrative of the European deputation to Madrid, for himself and the Queen, as well as several papers relating more especially to the character and operations of the Society, which he assured the Foreign Secretary, he would not fail to have read to him. His Majesty very minutely inquired into the religious condition of the British churches, and especially into the different missionary societies of Great Britain—viz., by what churches they were supported, their characteristics, fields of operations, results of their missions, and the names of their respective Presidents. The Foreign Secretary took an opportunity of thanking his Majesty for the amount of religious liberty the Baptists at present enjoy in his kingdom, and in parting his Majesty requested the Secretary to present his Christian regards and salutations to the President of the Evangelical Alliance, and to its Vice-President, Lord Roden, as well as to the members of the committee, all of whom he would ask to remember him and his whole family in fervent prayer, that God would grant unto him especially grace, that by his life and conversation he might adorn the doctrine of Jesus Christ, and also heavenly wisdom to fulfil his mission as a Christian monarch in such a manner as above all to strengthen the cause of the pure Gospel and to exalt the name of Jesus Christ, his only Lord and Saviour.

3. To Holland. The Foreign Secretary having read the letter of introduction with which, by a resolution of the last meeting of this committee, he had been furnished, stated once more the difficulties which had arisen among the Dutch brethren in agreeing to the doctrinal basis on which the proposed conference in 1866 should be convened. In answer to the points raised in the letter of instruction, he laid upon the table a letter from Pastor Cohen Stuart, of Rotterdam, in which the writer expressed the warmest Christian thanks of the Dutch brethren to the London committee for having sent their Foreign Secretary among them, "who, by God's blessing, had fully succeeded in effecting a reconciliation which, without doubt, may be now considered as a guarantee for true union and co-operation." The Foreign Secretary stated his conferences with the brethren at the Hague, Rotterdam, and Amsterdam, which had resulted in the unanimous adoption of a form of invitation satisfactory in all respects, and which placed the Evangelical Alliance, with its doctrinal basis, in the place due to it.

The Foreign Secretary then read the following form of invitation, with which the committee of Council expressed themselves fully satisfied:

month, 1866, ——— place), similar to the great conferences of London, Paris, Berlin, and Geneva."

DAY OF SPECIAL PRAYER FOR THE CHILDREN OF CHRISTIAN PARENTS, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 5, 1865.

At the meeting of the Committee of Council held in January last, a letter was read from R. Finlay, Esq., Belfast, suggesting the appointment, this year, of a day of special prayer for the children of Christian parents, similar to the one observed last year. Communications to the same effect were reported by the Secretary. In compliance with these, the Committee have issued the following Invitation to Parents in all Countries.

Last year the Committee of the Evangelical Alliance, mindful of the many promises given in Holy Scripture to believing parents, invited Christians throughout the world to set apart a day for united prayer for the conversion, holiness, and usefulness of their children. Results have confirmed the best hopes of the Committee, and called forth much thanksgiving and praise.

Assurances have been received from glad and grateful parents that prayer has been already answered. The prodigal, living "afar off," has been brought nigh to God. Worldly sons and daughters have, in reported instances, been led, by the teaching and grace of the Holy Spirit, to renounce error, and to find peace through justifying faith in the Lord Jesus Christ; and some, who were enemies of the Cross of Christ, now glory in it, and even preach the Gospel, and testify to the faith they once despised.

The Committee have been urgently requested this year to repeat the invitation. With this request they cordially comply, in the belief that the godly will respond even more largely than on the previous occasion, and that united prayer will be followed by a still more abundant blessing. "I will pour water upon him that is thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground; I will pour my Spirit upon thy seed, and my blessing upon thine offspring," is a gracious declaration, which bespeaks the infinite bountifulness open to faithful

April next, at Freemasons' Hall, street, commencing at eleven and names of chairmen and speakers w announced.

T. R. BIRKE, M.A.
EDWARD STRANE,
W. M. BUNTING,
DAVID KING, LL

JAMES DAVIS, Secretary.
HERMANN SCHMEITAT, Phil

All who sympathise with the solicited to aid in circulating Notice of Special Prayer, and in holding their several towns or villages; or, impracticable, in drawing special a in domestic worship.

Ministers of the Gospel are requested to bring the subject before their congregation their attendance at the public meeting.

It is also suggested that, at the readable portions of Scripture be read, private addresses on the responsibilities encouragements of parents.

PROVINCIAL MEETINGS

Manchester.—The Secretary has visited during the past month, and held a series of meetings of members of the Alliance and others. Esq., M.P., in the chair. Information of the progress and operations of the home and abroad. The following resolutions were unanimously passed: "This meeting heard Mr. Davis' address, expressing with the communication just showing the great practical value and its claim for more extended more liberal support." The opinion unanimously expressed that much probably follow if the way could Christians in Manchester to invite Organization to hold its next annual this city; and it was resolved to extend friends of the several denominational subject.

Southampton.—Sermons were preached on Sunday, January 29, by 1 and on the following day a public

Evangelical Christendom.

THE COLENZO JUDGMENT.

gment of the Privy Council in the case of the Bishop of Natal will t some and surprise all. The Bishop of Capetown's friends in this country tless express their disappointment in their own way ; and perhaps the mself may try a nullification policy, and make it the plea for secession munion with the National Church at home. We leave the Bishop and his express their disappointment in their own way ; but we are free to confess ise. If the Court had refused, on technical grounds only, to recognise the Capetown's right as metropolitan, or even allowed Dr. Colenso to plead ase was out of the jurisdiction of the Privy Council, we should not have heir decision so strange. But when, going to the root of the question, and o the whole law of the Crown's supremacy, the Privy Council decided that had no power either to create such a court as that of the Metropolitan own, without the consent of Parliament, or to create bishops at all in a hout the consent of the Legislature of that colony, we are brought at once e with a new view of the Crown's supremacy, and one which must totally elation of the mother Church at home to her daughters in the colonies.

not for us to dispute the law of the Privy Council, or to see whether the not been strained in the direction of non possumus. We have a shrewd that, on ecclesiastical questions, the prerogative has not been as carefully as in civil. The latter being of infinitely greater importance to the nation nd touching the daily interests of every man, has been bounded and defined. th the Crown's supremacy in ecclesiastical matters. The Act of Toleration issenters in their civil rights. Those who conformed did so knowing what o submit to ; those who did not, had the remedy in their own hands. the Establishment to be governed by the Crown, as it had been in the days th, James, and Charles I. It was no concern of theirs how corrupt it rough the unchecked prerogative of the Crown dispensing its patronage al ends. Hence, while the boundaries which define the prerogative in ers have been closely watched at all times, and have become so narrow at the king can do no wrong, only because he can do nothing at all but by the a Minister responsible to Parliament, nothing like this has occurred in f ecclesiastical jurisdiction. Our lawyers have to look back two or three for precedents for anything which seemed to abridge the Crown's preroga- clesiastical causes. The creation of the High Commission Court, under was declared to be invalid by the 16th of Charles I. ; and they therefore there is no power in the Crown to create any new ecclesiastical tribunal or n. The second instance relied on was the fact that even so arbitrary a Henry VIII., in constituting four new bishoprics, applied to Parliament ity to do so. The wording of the act, however, seems to give the King ral power, which the Crown lawyers now wish to restrain. It enacts—is Highness shall have full power and authority, from time to time, to declare and y his letters patent, or other writing to be made under the Great Seal, such number such number of cities, sees for bishops, cathedral churches and dioceses, by metes and the exercise and ministration of their episcopal office and administration, as shall and to enclose them with such possessions, after such manner, form, and condition as excellent wisdom shall seem more convenient.

ead this rather like an instrument conveying to the King the general pre-
L.—VI. NEW SERIES.—APRIL. R

to create ecclesiastical dignities in India as at home, but then would have provided for their endowment as well. This the Crown was not willing to do, and in the local authorities, not so much to sanction any stretch of the prerogative of creating a bishop as to bear itself free of the charges of his maintenance in the civil, not the ecclesiastical act, which the Colonial Legislature is not empowered to sanction, and where there is no endowment in the case, we do not see how the Crown's ecclesiastical supremacy can be impaired by the fact that a civil court has been given to any particular colony. The Privy Council should take care not to declare such cases as these extra curiam, they should abate one of the most unquestioned prerogatives. For our part, we do not see that the prerogative of the Crown is impaired by any of these precedents adduced by the Privy Council. The Crown, under Henry VIII., entered on the supremacy claimed by the Pope. All will admit that the Pope claimed the right to found new bishoprics and metropolitan sees over them, and as no statute has ever been passed directly to take the Crown from exercising the general right of creating ecclesiastical tribunals and settlements within the jurisdiction of the Crown, we do not see that the fact that the metropolitan of the Cape is proved to be illegal or ultra vires, or that the erection of the See of Natal was a stretch of the prerogative, because it was not sanctioned by the Natal Legislature.

The real gist of the matter appears to be this—though it does not come clearly in the judgment as we could wish—that the Crown's supremacy is not in tension inapplicable in a colony in which there is no National or Established Church whatever. We do not see how any act of the Cape Town Legislature, in establishing the Church of England in the colony, could make Bishop Grey's patent valid; but that does not impair the Crown's right to make Bishop Grey metropolitan, or release Bishop Colenso from the duty of obeying him as metropolitan. So long as these two ecclesiastics continue members of the Church of England, whether living at home or in the colonies, they are bound to abide by its fundamental rules, that the Crown has the appellate power formerly exercised by the Pope. To judge the question by a similar case of dispute between the Roman Catholic bishops: Suppose the Pope were to found a new see, for instance in Ireland, and were to assign to Dr. Cullen, as metropolitan, a visitatorial jurisdiction over the bishops of that see. It would be a strange plea for that bishop to make case of Dr. Colenso), those who cannot conform to its rules should leave the Church. A colonial bishop enjoys, we admit, no more legal status or authority in the colony than a Scotch bishop or the Moderator of the Free Kirk Assembly. But as a Dissenter at home is bound in honour by the laws of the body with which he is connected, so a bishop of the English Church should not on a technical plea refuse to face the tribunal to which he is summoned to give an account of his teaching.

But the question which the Privy Council have raised will not stop with this particular case. They have laid down the broad position that all ecclesiastical acts of the Crown, without the special sanction of the local legislature, are null and void. Now as in our colonies no sanction will ever be given to any ecclesiastical act whatever recognising any religious body as such, the consequence will be that our present system of Church extension in the colonies must end, and bishops go out as missionaries on the voluntary principle. For our part, we shall never regret this. The anomaly of a National Church planting itself out among communities in which a National Establishment has no existence, is declared to be illegal. Moderate men of all denominations have long seen the contradiction, and yet they thought it hard to deny the Episcopalian the right which all allow to a Presbyterian or Congregational Church, of carrying, not the Gospel only, but the principles of Church government as well, to our settlers in the colonies. But the Privy Council have brought matters to this pass, that as the Crown has not the right to create bishoprics without legislative sanction in its foreign possessions, and as it is clear that no body of bishops can do mero motu what the Crown cannot do, the Church of England must restrain herself to be the Church in England, and must forfeit her missionary character, if she would preserve her status as the National Church at home. Noblesse oblige, but we doubt if earnest-minded High Churchmen would wish to retain the Establishment under such damaging disabilities as these. They will say, Give us a Free Church altogether, and allow us to expand in our own way, but do not tie our hands before us, and call this dignity. If the supremacy of the Crown is disabled for want of Parliamentary sanction in the colonies, let us be rid of the Crown supremacy altogether. If the Crown lawyers are so very squeamish as to the Crown's ecclesiastical jurisdiction in the colonies, let us have a jurisdiction of our own. We appeal to the Crown to deliver us from a teacher of error, and the Crown says it will be no judge in these matters. To your tents, O Israel, is all we can say. We must have a Free Church, to do what a National Church has refused to do for us.

The judgment of the Privy Council in the case of the "Essays and Reviews" gave orthodox Churchmen a shock which they have not yet recovered from. A second failure to bring a verdict home against an acknowledged teacher of error must shake the minds of many as to the possibility of continuing much longer our system of National Churches. Zwinglius, in his first public discussion at Zurich, in 1520, laid down this position, that the Church may be joined to the State only on the condition that the State shall declare itself Christian, and that on any failure of the State to support its Christian character, the Church was bound to re-assert its independence. A state of things has occurred in Zurich calling for the application of Zwinglius's own rule. The State there, by its Kirchenrath (analogous to our Privy Council), has countenanced open infidelity, and refused to take any cognisance of remonstrances made against such teachers thrust in on the Church. In such a case, earnest Christians are bound to see whether it is not their duty to shake themselves loose from such God-dishonouring compromises as these, and to set up a Free Church, instead of the National Church, which has sunk into a mere creature of the State.

The example of Scotland and Geneva seems to suggest to Christians in Zurich understood as hastening on the world day, writing as we do from the point of the Establishment, and loyally bearing office in it. But there is a party that sit on, if they have their way much longer—a party who feel their conscience by the present terms of subscription, and would wish to see a National Church on the lax, nonconfessional pattern of the Swiss National Churches. If this is on partly through bit by bit relaxation of the terms of subscription, and through repeated failures of justice in cases like those of Williams and Co course will remain open for those who love truth above uniformity, but to the Establishment and form Free Churches, as in Geneva and Scotland.

There are other causes, which we have not space to write upon, which day render such a step inevitable. So long as states are small, and the people homogeneous, some common form of Christian profession is possible. But as the State has grown to such dimensions as ours has, and religious divisions have thrown the idea of dissent into the minds of the people, a National Establishment is an anachronism which must in time die of itself. Zurich has thus been obliged to throw away the close-borough system in Church and State, which still prevails in some of the smaller cantons, and the next step will be to denationalise the Church and declare the State, as in America, neutral to all parties and creeds. We are now approaching this state of things at home. It is the result which a timid conservatism may look on with dismay, but to the deep and tried believer the cause of alarm. He can sing with Luther's hymn, Ein feste burg ist unser Gott. The waves of the sea are mighty, and rage horribly, but yet the Lord that sits high is mightier.

J. B.

THEOLOGY OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

A PAPER upon this subject was read by the Dean of Westminster at a meeting of London clergy, at the Rectory of St. James's, on the 5th of 1865, and its substance has been given to the world in Fraser's Magazine. It might be suggested by the appearance, in Fraser, of a dissertation on theolodignitary of the Church of England. During its whole career, Fraser has been as the most daring and capricious exponent of political, social, and ecclesiasticalism. Once upon a time it could not have been seen on the study table of without creating a ferment in the parish, and occasioning a grave and mconsultation between the clerk, headle and doctor's appointment on the main urning to Fraser's Magazine as a vehicle for that magnificent extravaganza, Sartor Resartus, state his reason to be that it was "all strewed (figuratively speaking) with the maddest Waterloo-crackers, exploding distractively and destructively," and likely therefore to accept what more decorous magazines would reject? We shall not decide whether the ecclesiastical dignitary in the instance before us has become assimilated to Fraser, or whether Fraser, growing sober with the advance of years, has learned to adapt itself to the tastes and compositions of deans. It seems to be agreed upon by all parties that, in these days, no communication to the public, critical, scientific, or theological, which cannot be classed as light literature, will secure for itself a hearing. After all, the question of importance is not where a thing appears, but what it is; and we are bound to admit that Dean Stanley's paper on the Theology of the Nineteenth Century is not only a serious, but an able and instructive performance. As an illustration and a proof of the interest taken by every class of readers in theological discussion, the admission of an article on theology into Fraser may be not without significance and propriety.

The Dean of Westminster is the leader of that party in the Church of England which used to be cautious and reticent, but has of late stepped forward into visibility and audibility as one of the recognised institutions of the country. The date of its emergence agrees with that of the decision of Lord Westbury in favour of Dr. Rowland Williams and Mr. Wilson; but we shall pronounce this nothing more than a chronological coincidence. The time had assuredly come when, both for the sake of their own reputation and influence, and for the general benefit of the country, the advance party in the Church should become fully known. Phœbus Apollo had too long made himself vuxti ioxas, "like unto the night." The illumination had shimmered dubiously through the clouds, but unsophisticated persons could not tell whether it was that of dawn or that of wandering meteors. This state of things is now to terminate. In his place in Convocation, in meetings of the clergy, in the pages of popular magazines, Dr. Stanley is willing to declare what Broad Churchmen believe, what they propose, what general position they take up. Already the difference is perceptible, and perceptibly pleasing. In the article before us, which, to put it in one word, is an attempt to prove that the theology of Dr. Williams, Mr. Maurice, and Professor Jowett, is par excellence the theology of the nineteenth century, to be cordially accepted and infinitely esteemed by all right-thinking minds, Dean Stanley assumes that tone of benignity and toleration which befits one who has nothing to complain of. Broad Church writings used, not long since, to suggest painfully—even to readers who were no cynics—that the authors had something to hide, something to fear, and something to resent. They seemed—we shall suppose that it was only seeming—to hint at beliefs, or abandonments of belief, beyond those they stated; they seemed to fear being misunderstood and, in consequence, getting into trouble; they seemed to resent the treatment they received from Evangelicals and High Churchmen, and the airs of superior orthodoxy and more legitimate Churchmanship assumed by these. Dr. Stanley has not a harsh word for his opponents, and quietly and smilingly takes it for granted that he and his party are the men to whom, in the future, Evangelicals and High Churchmen will look up. A writer in this mood is pleasant company. Horace told authors that, if they wished to make people weep, they must weep also; and it is but the counterpart of his statement that, if a writer wishes to make his readers feel comfortable, he must, when writing, be in a pleasurable mood. Let us have Broad Churchmen about us that are fat, sleek-headed men, and men that sleep / nights, without being perturbed by the ghost of an apprehension that they may be in the morning to find themselves minus their benefices. It may be stated as a naturalisation of Broad-Churchism in the Establishment if it is to discover opinions of the party, clearly spoken out, are not so startling as had been.

We assent, then, to the Dean of Westminster when he details, as he prehensively, concisely, and well, the advantages which theologians of the century possess over those of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. A genuine and wholesome progress—has been made in relation to the Bible, to general history and philosophy, and in relation to Christian doctrine. An informed man will deny that we possess a knowledge of Scripture of a kind which the Reformers and Puritans were little conversant with. We are more acquainted with the state of the ancient text both of the New and Old Testaments. A flood of light has been thrown, by historical, critical, topographical and archaeological research, upon the various books of Scripture. Palestine, of which our fathers had the scantiest and most obscure notions, has yielded an invaluable harvest of information to the patriarchal and the New Testament history. “Egypt and Assyria have been brought before us, in all their intimate relations with the sacred history. They had hardly ever been since they ceased to exist as kingdoms. The classics of Greece and Italy have been ransacked for elucidations of Scripture. Such works as those by Dr. Howson.” It is true that the effect of this discovery, whether historical or topographical, upon our acquaintance with the Bible may be exaggerated. Intelligence of those great truths on which dependence of mankind was not made conditional on local and external associations is the opposite extreme to refuse to acknowledge that, by realising the circumstances under which the books of Scripture were composed, and the difficulties which the Saviour delivered, we get rid of many a perplexing obscurity, and that instruction communicated is conveyed with new vividness and new force. Dr. Howson justly and eloquently observes that “the paramount glory and power of the Bible has become far more evident to us by this nearer, closer investigation. I have here,” he adds, “of that divine faith and supernatural spiritual excellence wholly independent of all such lesser details, but of the increased reverence and veneration, derived from a knowledge even of these. Can any one, for example, doubt that the enjoyment which a merely ordinary student possesses of the Book of Deborah, or the Book of Job, far exceeds that of the fathers and the scholars of the last century, whom those magnificent poems inspired hardly a spark of poetic recog-and a conception of the mutual influences and bearings of philosophy and religion. Inquiring into all systems of belief and all forms of national existence, the thinker of our time is able to discern better than his predecessor the minglings of good in the great chaotic mass of human evil. Looking with Mr. Maurice into the "Religions of the World," he is able, more intelligently than was formerly possible, to apprehend those wants of the soul which men have attempted to supply in false religions, and which are met and satisfied only in the religion which is divine. The missionary has thus a new vantage ground in pressing the Gospel upon heathens and idolators.

Once more, it appears to us that, in one respect at least, the method of theologians in the nineteenth century is to be preferred to that of their predecessors. If we may so speak, the Divine Founder and Centre of the Christian Faith, Jesus Christ, was known and studied by the old theologians in the abstract. Selections of texts were made by which His attributes and offices were described and defined, but the attempt was not made to realise His personality, to conceive of Him as living man and living God. The moderns, on the other hand, "insist on knowing Him in whom they have believed"—they are not contented till they have drawn out, as far as they can, the actual characteristics which alone give real significance to the old theological words. To do this is the mode now adopted more or less by almost every school, for preaching, expounding, and recommending the great doctrine of our Lord's divinity. The more this can be done, the more fully it is understood what He was, what He did, what is meant by His life, by His death, by His resurrection, so much the more fully will the Church understand the sense in which He was divine, and the sense in which He was human. This is theology in the very highest and most solemn sense of all, because this is an endeavour to ascertain what God is—what is the essence of the nature of God himself. And to this same end conspire from all quarters all inquiries into this great subject. To know Christ—to ascertain the drift, significance, relative importance, of the tenderness, wisdom, truthfulness, love, comprehensiveness, elevation of His whole appearance and of the several parts of it, is the object, we may say, of the deepest theological researches everywhere. For the sake of a nearer approach to Him, much that shocks, much that distresses, may be tolerated, must be endured. For the sake of this, passages even in Renan's work may be read with instruction. For the sake of this, the "Life of Christ," by Ewald, to many amongst us hardly perhaps less distasteful, has been welcomed with ardour by one of the few learned Roman Catholic theologians of France as "Le vrai tableau de la vie de Jésus." "Si c'est là ce que nous laisse la science, après avoir tout vu, et la critique, après avoir tout contesté, qui ne voit que l'esprit humain va remonter vers Dieu, et vers le Christ, vrai Maître de tous les siècles et de tous les hommes? Si l'on veut surtout peser certaines paroles de ce beau livre, on y verra, ce semble, l'équivalent du dogme de la divinité de Jésus-Christ."

To sum up, Dr. Stanley maintains that the theologians of the nineteenth century are in a position to know the Bible better, to know Christ better, than their predecessors. Surely, if this is all he asks us to concede, we need not discuss the point. If, with an intensity of faith in Christianity equal to that of our Reforming or Puritan fathers, with a fervour of love equal to theirs for Jesus Christ, we use the new appliances provided for us by the general advance of the age in ascertaining more accurately what Christianity is, and gaining a more perfect knowledge of the personality of the Saviour, we may claim to have reached a higher point than they. But, can Dr. Stanley allay our apprehensions on this point? What we fear is that the torch of modern inquiry, flashed so freely upon the page of revelation, is permitted too frequently to ignite the manuscript, so as not to illumine it, but to consume. At the risk of being thought old-fashioned by the Dean, we must take up the question of stakes and boundaries. "He that doth not withstand," said a man whom Dr. Stanley venerates, S. T. Coleridge, "has himself no standing-point. Neither in the Bible, which always utters its commands as final, and lays down its truths as everlasting; nor in conscience, which, as Butler says, speaks with the accents of a king, and demands unconditional obedience, do we find any sanction of the notion that universal flux and change is the law of the moral universe. "There are interminable prospects," says Dr. Stanley, "before us; where we shall have advanced thirty or a hundred years hence, is in the hands of God." Again: "It [the new theology] will succeed, because it does not pretend to completeness. It is one of the charges against it, that the details of its results are constantly changing; that it is a half-way house, a stepping-stone to something beyond, of which we cannot see the end. Most true is this." Such a statement is, we humbly think, inconsistent with stability of position or genuine heartiness of faith. It is in repose that the soul grows strong, and a truth held provisionally, held with a tacit admission that it may or must ere long be abandoned, will have no potent influence on conduct or character. Dr. Stanley speaks of essentials and non-essentials, and we presume there are certain points respecting which he would say with Paul, that if an angel from heaven bid him change his belief, he would not obey. But he gives us no hint as to what is essential, what non-essential, no standard or test by which we may discriminate between what is perishable and what is eternal. We are haunted with the idea that ancient truth may be replaced by modern fantasticality, and that smart professors and conceited intellectual foplings may offer us their paltry originalities for those simple verities on which men like Augustine, Luther, and Calvin grew into strength of moral manhood, into glorious vitality of Christian life, and on which nations in their noblest time, England in the days of the Long Parliament, Scotland in the time of the Covenant, buttressed their souls. Dr. Stanley must bear with us if we are jealous of the integrity of man's priceless inheritance, the inheritance of truth, and if we regard with suspicion that prevailing originality which is so often simulated, so often feeble, so often false. Bigots or not bigots, we like the old words, and we like them in the old meanings. Exquisitely woven veils of sentiment, do they really make more brightly visible, or do they obscure, the countenance of the Son of Man? Ingenious accommodations to human passion or prejudice, do they really satisfy the soul as those plain and massive truths which Paul preached? This robe of lofty aspiration and beautiful thought, is it indeed the robe of Christ's righteousness, mantling the sinner in the day of God's wrath? This delicate philosophising about sacrifice—this dainty cautiousness of reference to blood—can we accept it as a satisfying response to the ancient and very bitter cry of the human soul, What is it that will take away my sin? We thank the Broad Church for what it has given us, but we own our apprehensions as to what it may unsettle, and as to the length to which it may go.

P. B.

ON THE SPIRITUAL CONDITION OF THE MINISTRY IN ITS INFLUENCE ON THE PEOPLE.

A PAPER READ BY THE REV. A. MOODY STUART, EDINBURGH, AT A PRIVATE CONFERENCE OF MINISTERS, ON THE 20TH OF FEBRUARY, 1883.

IN selecting this subject for consideration this evening, I wish to be understood as regarding it simply in itself, and not in comparison with ministerial learning or activity, or other qualifications; and if I should seem to overlook these, it is not at all in the way of disparaging them, but only of stating the paramount claims of this one qualification for ministerial usefulness.

It is almost overwhelming for a minister to consider the likeness of the people the priest, to see his own image reflected on them for good or for evil, himself multiplied a hundredfold. No doubt the absence of this likeness is often very servable. You may see a member, an elder, a deacon, a precentor or doorkeeper in a church, sitting for twenty years under a ministry of a very marked character, without a single feature transferred from the pulpit to the pew; and over many of his hearers the most faithful pastor must often complain, "I have laboured in vain, and spent my strength for nought." But, on the other hand, the minister is very commonly reflected in many of his people, and his cast of thought is frequently exaggerated in its reappearance among them.

For example, in Brainerd's converts among the Red Indians his doctrines and his own experience were brought out in a depth of humiliation, such as in saying that they were willing to be condemned, beyond what he had himself preached; yet the natural fruit of his preaching, and still more of his spiritual experience. The work of the Spirit was both evident and great in their own individual conversion; yet it seemed, in almost every case, to take the type of their spiritual teacher and pastor. This was, doubtless, the embodiment in them of his intense and singular earnestness. But there is no reason to doubt that a similar process is taking place, to a greater or less extent, in all our congregations, and that our people are imbibing both our doctrine and our spirit; our earnestness, our humility, our love, our faith, our repentance, our joy, our prayerfulness, or our sloth, our self-sufficiency, our narrow-mindedness, our worldliness; our heavenliness, our lively hope, our spiritual insight, or our blindness to the unseen and the future, to God, to Christ, to heaven, to hell, and the value of the souls of men.

Independently of preaching, and even of personal intercourse, our spiritual taste tells continually upon our people. Their impressibility on the Sabbath depends much on prayer through the week; and their praying for us and for themselves depends much on our praying for them. And then on the Sabbath how much hangs, not merely on the words that are spoken, but on the spirit in which we speak, in which we preach and pray. Especially in extemporary prayer, we are in constant danger of sinking into a formality perhaps more lifeless than if we were using a form; a formality which we must all have detected in ourselves, by falling into the groove of the same words, for want of fresh life within. Or if in such a taste we make an effort at the moment toward real prayer, the prayer is constrained and laboured, instead of the spontaneous utterance of our thoughts. When the mouth speaks out of the abundance of the heart, out of spiritual desire, spiritual sorrow, or spiritual joy, what conciseness, what tenderness, what power is in the supplication, taking the people along with us in all our petitions, or else making them to feel their own lack of the spirit of grace. This one ordinance in our church, of public prayer without a form of words, shuts us all up to a very peculiar necessity of becoming and continuing to be men of prayer; shuts us up under the pressure of a severe penalty, resting on ourselves and on our people week by week, as the sure consequence of our failure. Then in our preaching it is often what is within us, in the hidden thought of our own hearts, that influences our hearers, more than the mere words that are flowing from our lips.

But to be more specific, it is freshness of spirit that tells more on people than any other mental condition. Freshness of desire, of faith, of hope, of repentance, of love, seems to have far greater moving power than the amount of actual spiritual attainment. A minister's attainment appears to produce no effect on his people in comparison with his progress. It may indeed with new hearers, or in another spirit, because it has there the effect of freshness, but not with his own congregation.

present to herself that she describes, but Christ absent from her, and intensifies for her. More lovingly and more gloriously than anywhere else, she there to the daughters of Jerusalem her great Bridegroom in all his attractive picture is as full as if He were most brightly revealed at the moment ; yet as He is not seen by her, but only vividly remembered and ardently desired by her, "sought him, but could not find him, and called him, but he gave her no answer." Freshness or reality is, as we have said, that which is most of all influential in the ministry. Hence, therefore, one great and constant element in a young minister endowed with any measure of spiritual life, even if his life is largely supplemented by the merely natural fervour of youth. However wise, almost the whole power that has been found recently in lay preachers for the most part, as soon as they lose this one element of influence everything. But as long as they retain it, this alone gives them far more good than all the rest without it ; for as in the days of Solomon so a living dog is better than the dead lion."

Immediately connected with freshness of spirit or the "dew of youth" is another spiritual element of incalculable power in preaching, that is faith. No gift more valuable for the ministry, than faith in God that He will not let the minister return to him void. When the minister's soul, however, relapses into death, necessity dies. "Dead faith" is as weak as everything else that is lifeless, and faith is never separate from freshness of spirit, either as its root or its offshoot. Besides that faith in the promise of God which we are so apt to let go, and all cherish habitually in preaching the Gospel, there is another development of a subtler and rarer character, yet undoubtedly the mightiest element of success of the Word. This faith is most rare and precious, hard to find, and difficult to describe ; yet wonderfully simple to the soul to which it is given, and marvellously communicative in its effect on the souls of others. It is a peculiar gift of God, and sovereignly bestowed for a special end, but uncommon under any powerful work of the Spirit in a neighbourhood. At times it is often habitual or abiding in the heart ; and the man who is thus favoured with faith and of the Holy Ghost seems to be enabled to carry this faith with him to other places, where there had been no work of the Lord, and to be used to kindle the fire of Divine love where all was dark and frozen before.

in weakness, and in fear, and in much trembling. I have conversed about it with some of the most thoughtful and successful Irish ministers after their great revival was past. They said that during that whole period, as compared with the previous years of their ministry, the chief and most characteristic difference, both in the state of their own souls and in their preaching, consisted in faith; a faith which they had never known before, and which they could not command or recall afterwards, but which was then simple and abiding in their own hearts, and in their daily ministrations to the souls of others, individually or in public. They believed, and therefore spoke; they spoke and believed that God would own their words, and that their preaching would by the Spirit work conviction, enlightening, and salvation; and they were not disappointed. Daily believing thus, daily they were not put to shame, for the Lord himself confirmed the Word daily with signs following. That was a sovereign gift in a peculiar season. Yet such men as Whitfield almost seem to have been habitually endowed with a faith nearly akin to this; and in coveting earnestly the best gifts, we should all earnestly pray, "Lord, increase our faith."

But apart from this more special faith, freshness of spirit appears to be the chief element in spiritual influence, and this has its origin and daily maintenance only in personal intercourse with the living God, the Father of the spirits of all flesh. "My covenant was with him of life and peace; he walked with me in peace and equity, and did turn many away from iniquity. If they had stood in my council, and had caused my people to hear my words, then they should have turned them from their evil way, and from the evil of their doings." (Mal. ii. 5, 6; Jer. xxiii. 22.) To stand in Jehovah's secret conclave or council, to "hear and mark his words," to get them there fresh for ourselves, and so to carry them fresh to the people, is the great condition of ministerial success. Other things we may have, or lacking them we may be losers by the want; but this is essential to life, and for it everything else must give place. Whatever time it takes, we must have this intercourse with our Master. "Behold, I am against the prophets, saith the Lord, that steal my words every one from his neighbour. I have not sent these prophets, yet they ran; I sent them not, nor commanded them, therefore they shall not profit this people at all." (Jer. xxiii. 21, 30, 32.) [No doubt this prompt running seems to save time and labour. We have not found God, Christ, the Spirit, for ourselves; but we have the words of the Lord, and we may run with these at once to the people, especially when by going first to himself we could not get other words after all. But our Lord brands these as "stolen" words, even when they are his own, but heard only at second-hand by us; and denounces the hasty self-sent messenger as wholly profitless to the people.]

Our warfare is maintained in an enemy's country, and our first essential for safety, not to speak of victory, is to keep the line of our communication clear with home; with the base of our operations, with the source on which alone we depend for all our supplies, for our bread and water, for our shields and armour of defence, for our arrows and arms of assault. If we are surrounded and cut off from our only source of supply, we are inevitably defeated; and in that event we must first of all fight our way back to Him who sent us, we must retreat into our refuge and bet and rock of defence. This we must do at whatever cost of time and effort, at whatever loss of other operations, however urgent, otherwise we are ourselves lost.

Now, surely in us and in every believer the soul can be kept in some right attitude toward God, unless we fall into culpable neglect. We cannot prevent temptation or the harassing of Satan; but through grace we may strive against it, and faithful conflict with the enemy is as pleasing to the Captain of our Salvation as victory itself. We can neither destroy the old man nor arrest his working; but the conflict; if not of spiritual vigour, yet of humiliation for weakness; cleaving to the Lord with purpose of heart, yet of distress for cleaving to Him. Our hearts ought to be always right toward God; and if we are not slothful, they may be always right in this wide, yet true sense of the truth. They may be, habitually and permanently, not drawing back from the Lord, as do others, not divided and double-minded, not shut up in things seen and not seen. Adequate time given to the Word of God and prayer will usually suffice for the righting of the heart. It may not soon effect its restoration, but it may at least obtain at least this blessed issue, "My desire is toward thee, remembrance of thy holiness." A passing desire will not suffice, for thou desirest and hath not; a brief effort may bring only a transient amen. Ordinary exercises of devotion may end and leave the spirit as lifeless as when it began. In that case we cannot always resolve with Robert M'Cheyne on a particular occasion, "I cannot begin my work; for I have not yet seen the face of God;" for the work may be such that we must enter upon it, however it may be. But we may often follow this example; our work may often lie over us, we may see the face of our God, and be both faster and better done through delay and the Divine help; and to a spirit resolved to "seek first His kingdom and righteousness" the delay occasioned by the search will commonly be very beneficial. Before laying ourselves down to rest after the labours of the day, we may take sleep to our eyes or slumber to our eyelids without some fresh assurance of the promise attached to the Word of Life when held fast by the soul. When thou goest it shall lead thee, when thou sleepest it shall keep thee, and when thou awakest it shall talk with thee." There will be little sleep lost by such a while that which is given will be the sleep of the Lord's beloved. The minister's daily walk with God one unwatchful hour may involve great guilt to himself, which, if not soon repaired, may entail a serious injury to his people.

But along with spiritual freshness, through abiding nearness to God, returning to God, there must for a long ministry be also its sure fruit in growth, and therefore spiritual variety. If there is the same man in the same place with the same people in the pews for many years, there is a great rehearsal of the same thoughts to unimpressed listeners. Now, while rest, study and other means are necessary to variety, and largely conducive to

And if there be health and growth in his soul, he will taste for himself the goodness of God in all these, and be helped in a wise stewardship to give meat to the household in due season.

But we note finally, that a minister should seek indefatigably to be an example to his people, and ought therefore to aim at being the holiest man in his congregation; the meekest, the lowliest, the kindest, the most joyful, most watchful, most prayerful, the strongest in faith, the liveliest in hope, the highest above self, the nearest to God and to heaven, the purest or the least spotted image of our Lord Jesus Christ. Our falling almost infinitely short of this standard is no reason why it should not be our earnest, constant, and determined aim. The sight of many members of our flock before us will not therefore fill us with grief, but with joy; yet we ought to grieve deeply for our own lagging behind them in the race. Perhaps ministers, while far from being the least, are not commonly the most spiritual in their churches. Now, certainly, on every account a minister ought to be the holiest man in his congregation. His spiritual life is of ten times more importance than that of any other member in his church; and his calling and position are far more favourable to holiness than any other vocation. There is in all these things the exercise of a high sovereignty, and the base things and the weak, and the things that are not, are evermore exalted by Him who chooseth the poor in this world, rich in faith, that no flesh may glory in his presence. Yet as no other place in the flock requires grace like the pastor's, so none is so favourable to grace. His calling shuts him up, more than any other, to the daily and weekly need of Divine help, and grace is promised and given according to need; given, that is, to faith apprehending both the need and the promise. He is tempted by Satan as no other member of his church is tempted, and stronger temptation, if resisted, ensures more abundant grace; he is prayed for by his people as no other member is prayed for; and above all, He who walks amid the golden candlesticks holds him more than any other as a star in his own right hand.

Our very helps we do indeed transform into hindrances, when instead of rising to the level of our sacred calling, and being sustained by it there, we drag it down to the level, and therefore far below the level of any other calling; ministering in things holy as if they were common things, instead of walking as a holy priesthood into God. But the truth remains, that ministers ought to be the highest Christians; and blessed be God, the fact remains that the highest specimens of saints have been ministers of the Gospel in all ages of the Church, and the accompanying fact that it was their being great among the saints that rendered them great in the ministry. Such has been the case not in one age or in one class of ministers, but in every age and in every character of the sacred calling. Moses and Elijah, John and Paul, were quite as eminent among the saints of God as among the ministers of his Word. But so amongst intellectual and studious men were Augustine, Owen, Edwards, and hundreds of others, higher as saints in the kingdom than as preachers of the Gospel; and probably nearer to God and liker to Christ than any of their hearers. So likewise with working pastors of parishes, with Newtons and Venns in England, with Calders in the Highlands and Bostons in the Lowlands of Scotland, and with men like M'Cheyne in our own day; they were eminent in the ministry, chiefly because they were eminent in grace; and they could, with Paul, say truly to their people, Be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ.

Clearly this is not the exceptional, but the normal state of the Gospel ministry; because other things being equal, men with most grace should give themselves most readily to the ministry; and in the ministry most grace is provided for them, because they have most need of it and most use for it. Yet we seem to be too often contented with a sadly lower state. We have all to mourn a hundred deficiencies in objects; and there are other defects which bulk much more largely with our people often more largely with ourselves. Yet there can be no doubt, both from the of God and from the dying testimony of faithful men, that when it comes to and judgment, and the giving in of our account, the words, "Without me ye nothing," will stand out in all their simple and awful magnitude; that thing and many done without Christ, though in his name, will go for nothing, wh least word spoken or act done in his strength will abide for ever. "Herein Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit," is to every one of us a great c stimulus to manifold and unceasing exertion; but there is light never to be neq thrown on the nature of the fruit, and the manner of the fruitbearing, by accompanying words, "He that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringet much fruit."

COMPARISONS OF THE KINGDOM: A GRAIN OF MUSTARD :

The plant which yields mustard is pretty well known; at least, every one kno bright yellow flower which too often in the months of May and June mak corn-fields golden. The hard black seed of that charlock, when crushed, is h pungent, and is extensively sold as mustard; and the true mustards are species selfsame genus. In England they grow to a height of four or five feet, and warmer climate and rich soil of Palestine they become much taller and luxuriant.

Few interpreters, however, are content with such an "herb" or veg They want a literal "tree," with a wooden trunk, and large enough for bi build nests in the branches. So they suggest the Cissus arborea and Sal Persica—trees which no man was likely to sow in his "garden," and whi original word would never suggest to a Greek or Hebrew hearer. Others, that Sinapi is the well-known herbaceous mustard-plant of husbandry, are n anxious to magnify it as much as possible. Thus Rabbi Simeon Ben Chala frequently quoted, who says: "There was in my field a stalk of mustard, into I was wont to climb, as men are wont to climb into a fig-tree." The Rabbi d tell us his size, but either he himself must have been very small, or his po imagination very great.

If we look at Matt. xiii. 31, Mark iv. 31, and Luke xiii. 19, in the light o locutions and usages which govern every language, we shall find no difficulty. seed is sown, and when it is sprung up it becometh "greater than all herbs"—than the pulse and dill and other pot-herbs around it—in fact, "a tre arborescent that the finches and other little birds which are so fond of its seeds in its branches. Not a word is said about their building their nests, as som imagined: they simply perch or "lodge" (κατασκηνοῦν, "tabernacle"); and the need to picture up among the boughs an eagle, or osprey, or any such rara Rabbi Simeon. The mustard is a little seed, but sown in a favourable soil it up, and by and by can scarcely be called an herb: it is quite a tree, so that th which come to devour its seeds are hidden in the branches.*

Such is the meaning of the words. Then for the purport of the parable.

* "That a forest tree should be large enough to afford shelter to the birds, is nothing ful; the parable is hinged on the fact that the garden herb (ἀράχων) became a tree (i. It seems to have been in Palestine, at that time, the smallest seed from which so large a pl known to grow. There were, perhaps, smaller seeds, but the plants which sprung from th not so great; and there were greater plants, but the seeds from which they sprung we small."—"The Parables of our Lord," by the Rev. W. Arnot—a book of clear exposit lively illustration, and filled to the brim with words of love and truth and soberness—family-book on the Parables.

if the fathers take occasion from it to descant on the medicinal virtues of the substance itself. Augustine says that mustard has the power of expelling poison, and just as the mustard plant overtopped the other herbs, so the true doctrine will outgrow and cast into the shade sectarian dogmas. Hilary remarks, that just as the sharp flavour of the mustard seed is brought out by tribulation—by crushing and grinding—so the efficacy of the Gospel is brought out by persecution and affliction. The other “herbs” are the prophets, whose preaching was given to the weak and sickly Israelites; but the branches of the mustard tree are the apostles, to whom—like little birds tossed in the tempest—the nations resort, and wearied with the storms raised by the prince of the power of the air, seek refuge in the branches.

All this may be ingenious, but it is quite irrelevant. The design of the parable is obvious. The underlying thought is simple and single. A little germ and a large result—a small commencement and a conspicuous growth—an obscure and tiny granule, followed by a vigorous vegetation—the “least of all seeds” and “the greatest of herbs”—such is the avowed contrast of the parable; and the resemblance to this of the Gospel, or the Christian dispensation, is the declared lesson of the Lord.

Is it not so when we glance at the history of real religion in the world, in communities, in the individual soul?

I. For instance: What a little and unlikely thing was the cradle of Bethlehem! Most cradles come to nothing; most infancies result in very ordinary specimens of upgrown humanity; and to the outside spectator there was no particular promise in the cradle watched by that Hebrew mother. It was not a cot of ebony or ivory, ornamented with tapestry and covered with some wonder of the loom, and beneath such silken canopy as guards and glorifies the slumbers of imperial infancy. It was placed in a stable, and was in fact the manger where a little while before the ox had lunched his provender—cobwebs the canopy, a carpenter's cloak the covering. Nothing could look liker the outset of an abject existence, the germ from which you would expect a very poor and vulgar history to spring. Thirty years after you could only expect to find the occupant of that manger grown up into a rough, hard-ended, toil-worn man, tramping out and in among the bores of Bethlehem, tending these cattle like the foster-brother who had grown up among them, and exerting his energy in feats of rustic sport or prowess.

Thirty years passed on, and the tender plant had grown up, the root out of a dry ground began to bud forth and blossom. Jesus was manifested to Israel—the Son of Mary had become the marvel of Palestine. In words such as earth had never heard, because man had never spoken, He was revealing the Father: He was ringing God into the abodes of men—into the hovel of the fisherman and the tents of the trader; and with prodigies of power, such as seemed a natural accompaniment of supernatural sanctity, He was healing the sick, was raising the dead, was stilling the tempest, was feeding the hungry, and was on every side making the question, When Messiah cometh, will He do greater miracles than this or doeth? Even so. Blade by blade and branch by branch the seedling of heaven had expanded, till a shekinah was visible in its Burning Bush; and the child born in the stable, the infant cradled in Bethlehem's manger, answered to the name, Wonderful, Counsellor, Mighty God, Everlasting Father, Prince of Peace.

Dark, hard, unlovely, there is no resemblance between that seed and the luxuriant plant so broad in its branches, in its blossoms so golden. Such a mustard seed is the Cross of Calvary. To those who had begun to look for redemption in Israel, the Cross was a crushing disappointment: to priests and Pharisees it was a source of rage exultation: to the rabble of Jerusalem it was an exciting spectacle, and the finis finish of a strange career; and whilst like a sword it pierced through Mary's this seed has begun to shoot forth gloriously. Not two months, when that lifted up, and looking to Him whom they have pierced, Jerusalem's inl begin to weep. Again it is lifted up, and thousands more are melted. I out of Palestine, speeds across the seas, penetrates strange lands, and st Spirit goes with it. The savage, coarse and hispid, learns from it God's me rises from his knees a new, a mild, and gentle creature. The scorning as struts along, and with curled and contemptuous lip disdains mankind, espies divine, and conscious of a mysterious magic, a benignant balm which has g where in about his heart, the great deep opens, a fountain begins to flow in arid but now dissolving nature, and he goes forth amidst his fellows, a sun his face, and a hand open as day to melting charity. With red arms th clasps it, and in its mighty expiation the crimson turns to snow. With already stinging, the blasphemer presses to his burning bosom the healing the undying worm is no longer there. In life's last hour, the awakened r sees in Christ crucified the full range of God's mercy, and from the jaws of is transported to Paradise. And thus, with the powers of darkness in its fi an altered world behind it, the Cross of Christ moved on ; and though so stumbled, and some Greeks were foolish, it soon proved itself to the various mankind God's saving power—till of all seeds the least and most unlikely l topped all other herbs—had outgrown the philosophies and supplanted the of the East and West, and sent out its branches to the world's end.

II. So with communities : so with the history of religion in given re localities. In the year 1789, the crew of the ship Bounty turned their cap officers adrift and carried the ship away. After many adventures, the nine s mutineers landed in the little island of Pitcairn, with the heathen wives brought from Tahiti, and some Tahitian men. Their first years passed in and feuds, in drunken brawls and deliberate murders, till, in 1800, John found himself the only man in all the island. His conscience was awal frightful dreams ; but though the island was cut off from all the world, he had a Bible and a Prayer Book, which still remained from the stores of Bounty. By reading that Bible, he found how a sinner may obtain forgiven as the patriarch of the island, he set to work to instruct the children Tahitian women ; and such was his success, that when, in 1814, Captain visited Pitcairn he found it peopled by a race virtuous religious chas

for nearly half the year the Atlantic clings his angry billows, keeping the handful of inhabitants close prisoners. Most of it is bleak and barren, but there is one little bay rimmed round with silvery sand and reflecting in its waters a slope of verdure. Towards this bay, one autumn evening, 1,300 years ago, a rude vessel steered its course. It was a flimsy bark, no better than a huge basket of osiers covered over with the skins of beasts; but the tide was tranquil, and as the boatmen plied their oars, they raised the voice of psalms. Skimming across the bay, they beached their oracle and stepped on shore, one, two, three, as many as twelve or thirteen, and on the green slope built a few hasty huts and a tiny Christian temple. The freight of that little ship was the Gospel, and the errand of the saintly strangers was to tell the frightened heathen about Jesus and His love. From the favoured soil of Ireland they had brought a grain of mustard-seed, and now they sowed it in Iona. In the nursery of their little church it thrived, till it was fit to be planted out on the neighbouring mainland. To the Picts with their tattooed faces, to the Druids creeping and muttering in their dismal groves, the missionaries preached the Gospel. That Gospel triumphed. The groves were felled, and where once they stood arose the house of prayer. Planted out on the bleak moorlands, the little seed became a mighty tree, so that the hills of Caledonia were covered with the shade; nor must Scotland ever forget the seedling of Iona, and the labours of Columba with his meek disciples. And if God give the increase, who can tell to what mighty trees those little seedlings may grow from that hardy nursery transplanted to Canada and Australia, to Calcutta and Amoy, to Caffraria and Old Calabar?

III. So with the rise and progress of religion in the individual soul. "The man by faith shall live"—a text so small, long latent in Luther's memory, and long dormant, when quickened by God's Spirit, became not only gladsome liberty to himself, but the germ of a glorious Reformation. And so, "A word, a thought, a passing sentence, may prove to be the little seed which eventually fills and shadows the whole heart and being, and calls all thoughts, all passions, all delights to come and cluster under it." (Alford.)

A great encouragement to those who are teaching others. Whether it be your school scholars or your own children, it is not so important that they should commit to memory great quantities of Scripture, long chapters or long psalms, as that they should have indelibly engraven on their hearts a few of the most precious portions, Psalms like the xxiii. and ciii., hymns like "Rock of Ages" and "I lay my sins on Jesus," texts like those faithful sayings which proclaim the love of God, the cleansing blood of Christ, the power of believing prayer. A tract in the pocket, a testament in the trunk, is a good thing, and may lead to the happiest results; but when the youth goes away and leaves you, a text in the memory is better—some great living truth, terse and simple as it occurs in the lively oracles, or as it has been woven in immortal verse or more immortal music, or as it has been embalmed and made for ever sacred by some tender association—some touching incident or earnest exhortation. When the set time comes—in the distant colony, in the tropic ship, in the house of bondage, serving the citizen of a far country and envying the husks which the swine do eat—that faded but familiar truth may return upon his memory, and, as he ponders, long closed fountains of feeling may reopen, till the resolve is made, and he will arise and go to my Father."

And a great encouragement to those who are trying to find favour for any useful word or good idea. As long as it remains in your own mind, it is the seed in the hard pod; but cast into the field, or the garden, it will grow. Thus David Livingstone's notion of a house to house visitation of the London poor has grown into the town and city missions which are the salt, the saving element, in our over-crowded world.

crowded centres. Thus the first Bible-woman has been repeated, till they hundred. Thus John Pound's little scapegrace, bribed by a hot potato his daily lesson, has multiplied into our ragged schools, with their teachers, and myriads of scholars. Thus the system of total abstinence of Father Matthew reduced the whisky-drinking of Ireland from twelve gallons in one year, to not more than five millions. And thus any true thing will grow, if it gets but a good and honest soil, and is so happy as its fair proportion of sun and shower.

Which suggests our concluding thought—the treatment we ourselves give the truths of God. An acorn on the mantel-piece—a dry bulb in board, a mustard seed in your pocket or a pill-box—won't grow. The only hope for is from the seed which you cast into the ground and take till it sends up first the tender blade, and by and by the branching stalk or truths in the memory, are acorns on the shelf, seeds in the pill-box. You have them, but don't leave them there. Take out any one you like and ponder. Ponder the saying till it grows wonderful—till its meaning comes out and you feel some amazement at its unsurmised significance. Ponder it, till like the phosphorescent forms of vegetation, the light of its expanding falls on other things and revelation is itself revealed. Ponder it, till the smallest of seeds grows into the greatest of herbs, and a brief maxim of heavenly wisdom develops in you a beauty of holiness. Ponder it, till like the bulb taken out of the cupboard no longer dead and dry, but with the scent of water at its roots and the light at your lattice from its pedestal of amethyst or beryl, it warms with its own the wintry weather, and sends through all the hidden chambers of your life perfume, suggestions of joy which even now exist elsewhere, though the flowers around the trees are stripped, and the world is cold.

Foreign Intelligence.

FRANCE.

—, France, March, 1865.

INCREASING DIFFICULTIES IN THE RELATIONS OF FRANCE WITH THE COURT OF ROME.

Your readers are all aware that according to the Franco-Italian Convention of September 15, Napoleon III. is pledged to withdraw the French troops from Rome within two years, or even before that period, if possible. At the same time, Pius IX. has been formally requested to accept the means of becoming reconciled with Italy, and to organise a Papal army sufficient for the maintenance of public tranquillity. It is, in fact, evident, that after the departure of our soldiers the power of the Pope will be in the utmost peril, if he should not have at his disposal a military force capable of resisting revolutionary movements.

Well, what has happened? In concert with the most fanatical cardinals, Pius IX. absolutely refuses to come to any understanding with Victor Emmanuel refuses to take the measures necessary for the defence of his throne. He remains politically impassible and inert, the follower of Mahomet, who holds of fatalism; and he treats the day of September 15 as if it had no ex-

What is the meaning of these things? The organs of the Jesuits incessantly repeat that the Holy himself to Divine Providence,—upon a blessing from above,—that Church is imperishable,—that the Peter has never been engulfed in and other phrases of the same kind does for the devotees, who ne beneath the surface of things.

Political men explain this success of Pius IX. differently. They say that the Pontiff, in not adopting the policy of personal protection or precaution, was not afraid to intimidate Napoleon III. as quences of the withdrawal of the French troops, and to compel him to keep our soldiers at Rome, for fear of exciting universal commotion.

This last is the most probable explanation, and our Ambassador, M. de Sartiges, recently asked a private audience of the Roman Pontiff in order to get him to facilitate, by his own procedure, the execution of the treaty of September 15. It appears that this interview was very painful to the representative of France. On the one hand, Pius IX. persisted in declaring that he would do nothing, and that he should quietly await the Lord's will. On the other, he uttered some vehement words upon the Imperial policy; and after this audience, he assembled some of the cardinals with whom he is most intimate, and repeated to them the famous watch-word, Non possumus. A Ministerial journal of Paris even announces that the head of the Romish Church is disposed to make a treaty with Spain, according to which, if he should be compelled to abandon Rome, he might find a refuge in the Balearic Isles.

This struggle, you see, becomes more and more serious. What will be the final determination of Napoleon III.? Will he consent to prolong the occupation, by our regiments, of the city of the Vatican? This is scarcely probable after the solemn promise which he has made to Italy, France, and Europe. What will he determine then? Will he, by recalling our soldiers, expose himself to the reproach of having provoked the fall of the Papacy, and will he assume the responsibility of the exile of the Pope in Spain? It is a terrible alternative; for Roman Catholicism still exerts considerable influence in this country, and the Emperor's crown does not sit very firmly upon his head.

DISCUSSIONS IN THE SENATE ON RELIGIOUS AFFAIRS.

These last remarks lead me to speak of the discussions which have taken place in the Senate on the Encyclical, the Syllabus, or Catalogue of Errors, and similar points. The discussions have been long and keen; they have not even completely terminated at the moment I am writing this letter; but it is easy to foresee the decision of the noble Chamber.

M. Rouland, who long exercised the high functions of Minister of Public Instruction and Worship, made an eloquent speech, in which he pointed out the spirit of domination and usurpation which characterises the Romish Church; and while expressing—perhaps by a clever stroke of oratory—the most profound respect for the Pope, he applied himself to maintain the independence of the civil power against the encroachments of the hierarchy.

Other senators, M. Bonjean in particular, took the same ground. They are especially struck with this fact, that the Papacy, under the pretext of its infallibility, attacks the ideas, the maxims, and the laws of our era, and claims, in the name of God, complete supremacy over the proceedings of the civil authorities. They say that the liberty of princes and of nations is absolutely incompatible with such a theory, and that it is necessary, as well for the dignity of the State as for the common security, energetically to protest against Romish tyranny. They cite especially the example of England, which long delayed the emancipation of the Roman Catholics, because the Papacy claims that the members of its church should submit to the see of Rome rather than to the institutions of their country.

M. de Bonnachose, Archbishop of Rouen, who last year received a cardinal's hat, endeavoured to reply to the arguments of MM. Rouland and Bonjean. His speech was carefully prepared, and gave evidence of ability; but the arguments were poor. It presented no solid reasoning—no clear and satisfactory conclusion.

The position of the cardinals amid the deliberations of the Senate is very embarrassing. These reverend personages fully understand that if they were to maintain the extreme opinions of the Court of Rome, they would excite general dissatisfaction in the assembly. But they are also apprehensive lest they should shock and irritate the Pope by adopting the principles of the present age. They are therefore reduced to the necessity of inventing subtle distinctions, of employing equivocal terms, and of avoiding the use of a plain yes or no, upon the most important matters. This is a sad and wretched part to play.

M. Darboy, Archbishop of Paris, was the best of these ecclesiastical speakers, and the Senate listened to him with approval, to which they gave marked expression. This is easily accounted for. M. Darboy is comparatively liberal; he distinctly maintained the rights of the civil authorities; and his Gallican principles had prepared the senators beforehand to lend him their sympathetic attention. But if Archbishop Darboy is applauded in Paris, he will excite not a little displeasure at Rome.

The most undoubted result of these discussions is the assurance that our public men are fully resolved to make no concession to the Romish See in the civil domain. Pius IX. has received a severe warning ; and if he is not completely blinded by his narrow prejudices, he must acknowledge that the publication of the Encyclical has been, upon his part, a grave mistake.

CURIOUS REVELATIONS AS TO THE CONDITION OF THE CLERGY.

But this is not all. The speeches of MM. Rouland and Bonjean have revealed certain facts, by which public opinion has been deeply moved.

It has been proved, first, that, under the appearance of unity and harmony, the Popish clergy are often troubled by keen intestine disputes. The bishops possess official supremacy in their dioceses, but their authority is rather nominal than real, especially if they display Gallican tendencies. The Ultramontanes—priests, monks, and even simple laymen—wage an obstinate war upon them, and compel the prelates to yield to their pretensions, the more as they are almost always assured of the support of Rome. The unhappy bishop often becomes a slave, while having the titles and functions of a master.

Secondly, the senators already named denounced with much energy the bad education given to the students in the clerical seminaries. It appears that the professors in these establishments attack without circumlocution the Gallican liberties, and even the famous declaration which was signed, in 1682, by Bossuet and all the French episcopate. They endeavour so to train the young priests, that they may be entirely submissive to the influence of the Jesuits. There is here a serious danger for the future.

Thirdly, the monastic bodies are growing formidably extensive. Everywhere there are new convents, everywhere there are monks, who, without being authorised by the Government, are labouring to obtain an ascendancy over the minds of the population. They usurp the place and the rights of the humble country curés, organise confraternities, preach fanatical sermons, inflame the minds of women and young girls, and become the confessors and spiritual directors of devotees. They constitute a well-disciplined militia, submissive to the orders of the superiors-general, who reside at Rome, and are always ready to stir up the people against the powers that be, by invoking the infallible privileges of the Pope. They are foreigners, often enemies, established in the heart of the country. The disciples in particular, distinguish themselves from these monks by their intrigues and persistent scheming.

The members of all these monastic orders speedily acquire considerable property. A senator affirmed that they possess a monstrous sum of more than 500 millions of francs (20,000,000*l.*), if we reckon of their territorial property, their cash, &c. All this wealth has been surreptitiously transferred from its natural heirs by the incestuous connivances of the Jesuits and priests, who, in the dying the felicity of heaven, upon the condition of their bequeathing to the Church a part of their fortune.

Such are some of the facts revealed by the Senate and to France by men whose words are in their hands, as they say, authentic and satisfactory evidence. The evil is great, and it is to be remedied ? It is a very serious problem to solve ; for the political parties neither can nor ought to interfere with the secret workings of the conscience. Nevertheless, these revelations will no doubt inform the French nation has thus been informed ; and it will certainly be a step towards raising barriers against the encroachments of Jesuitism.

Nothing would be more efficacious than the culture of the faculties among the lower classes. The priests and monks turn the ignorant peasantry and working men into a machine of profit ; they rely chiefly upon the prostitution of the feminine portion of the population, and then, with the help of the pulpit and the confessional, they govern the entire circle.

PROPOSED NEW LAW FOR PROMOTING PUBLIC EDUCATION.

The French Government, both in order to secure the public security and in order to promote the good, has been concerning itself a great deal about public education. The Emperor, upon opening our Legislative Assembly, declared all citizens having the right of suffrage ought to learn to read and write. It is for us a humiliating fact, that a third of the French people, of twenty years of age, are utterly ignorant. They have never been sent to school, or at least have not frequented it long enough to have acquired the most elementary knowledge. The women are still more ignorant than the men ; a great number have never learned anything but the Creed and the Virgin. By what right pompous title of the great nation, while we are in such a shameful state of inferiority? M. Duruy, Minister of Instruction, published an interesting report on this subject, prepared a legislative measure which would tend to multiply elementary schools considerably. This statesman proposed to introduce into France gratuitous and compulsory education, as it is established in Prussia, Switzerland, and other countries. A part only of his plan has been adopted by the Privy Council. Popular education is to be favoured and extended; but the new bill neither render it absolutely gratuitous nor compulsory.

Hence comes this resistance to M. Duruy's plans? First, the cardinals and bishops have recourse to all the means of influence at their disposal to prevent the increase of elementary schools; they pretend that compulsory education would be contrary to liberty, as if liberty attached immense importance to having no men! Then, certain political personages themselves fear the diffusion of knowledge among the lowest ranks of the people. We shall soon see the course adopted by the Chamber of Deputies, and I shall have occasion to return to this important question.

RE-ELECTION OF M. GUIZOT.

You will doubtless have learned from the correspondence, inserted in the English papers, that M. Guizot has been re-elected a member of the Presbyterian Council. His re-election has an ecclesiastical election excited deep and general attention, nor aroused, among Protestant Churches, such excited feelings. The political press belonging to the Catholicism and scepticism eagerly took part in this intestine dispute, so that the candidature of M. Guizot obtained the sanction of a public event.

How is this fact to be explained? Above all, the reputation and the high position of our illustrious co-religionist. The name of Guizot was sufficient to excite universal interest. It seemed astonishing, and even incredible, that such a man, who was for many years the first political personage in France, should be exposed to expulsion from ecclesiastical councils. Impartial and able writers in the daily journals—those of the Journal des Débats, for example, and the editor of the chronicle in the Revue des Mondes—ask with surprise by what blind chance it happens that M. Guizot has been subjected to this species of ostracism.

Moreover, the partisans of the negative school have spared no pains to extrude from the Presbyterian Council of Paris so intelligent and firm an opponent. They know by their own experience that M. Guizot will never consent to enter into any compromise adverse to the Christian faith, and that he possesses every accomplishment necessary for maintaining triumphantly the cause of orthodoxy; so the Protestant Radicals multiplied, with unheard-of persistency, circulars, electoral meetings, and appeals of all kinds.

In spite of their prodigious efforts, M. Guizot obtained a majority of ten votes, in about 2,600—the total number polled. The majority is certainly small; but Evangelical men render thanks to God for their victory. At length, their list of candidates has been accepted in its entirety, and they have now an interval of three years, during which to enlighten the electors of Paris, and, by the Lord's grace, to infuse into them more pious sentiments. M. Guizot, in this grave juncture, will be a faithful champion of our time-honoured doctrines, and his presence in the Presbyterian Councils is one more precious guarantee that the wisest measures will be taken for the restoration of things to a more orderly condition.

CRITICAL POSITION OF FRENCH PROTESTANTISM.

It must be sorrowfully admitted that our Protestant Churches in France are passing through a crisis which is without a parallel in former times. During the reigns of Louis XIII., Louis XIV., and Louis XV., our fathers, the old Huguenots, had to struggle against the persecutions of the Romanists. They had sometimes to sacrifice their goods and persons. But they were at least united among themselves; they encouraged and strengthened one another; and if they suffered much, they had great strength and abundant consolation in their fraternal unity.

Now, our position is quite different. Our most active enemies are in our own bosom; they even fill the places of pastors; they are labouring to demolish our holy citadel, by allying themselves with Freethinkers, Deists, Pantheists, and even Atheists, as well as with republicans and demagogues. They are constantly invoking the great words liberty and progress, in order to secure the placing of every kind of doctrinal teaching upon the same level, and the irresponsibility or omnipotence of pastors. How are these attacks of a new kind to be surmounted? The question is a solemn one, and the future alone can answer it.

X. X. X

principle of religious liberty is beyond of harm ; on the other, the publicress to the deference and interest shown towards the Catholic Church, by giving its places of worship, ameliorating the situation of the clergy, and presenting the Senate to the princes of the . . . In Italy there was a situation ; the object of just alarm to sensar-sighted men. The strengthenkingdom of Italy, in part founded on ruins, was to be brought into harmony with the maintenance of the independence of the Holy See. The convention of 1815 is intended to secure this object. By this solemn pledge, the French Government binds itself to respect the Pontifical territory, and to protect its frontiers against every direct or indirect aggression, thus affording an efficient guarantee of the independence of the Sovereign. On the other hand, in removing the capital to Florence, and fixing it there, it has placed itself in a definitive manner. We must be the punctual and loyal execution of the engagements which reciprocally bind France. There are, doubtless, many things which human prudence cannot always foresee ; but full of confidence in the future, we approve your having on this point reserved your full liberty of

ON ECCLESIASTICAL ELECTIONS—A ULTRAMONTANE JOURNAL—A BIBLE DROPPED FROM THE FLAMES.

in praying that the elections to the General Council of the Reformed Church in Paris may be annulled, on the ground that undue and illegal restrictions had been placed upon qualified voters—a charge fully denied by the pastors and to whom the elections were conducted and referred by M. Baroche, Minister of Worship, to the Council of State. Gallicanism is to have, in April, a new trial, a small one and cheap—eighteen francs—to contain nothing but what is the tendency, in morals, politics, and together with a sharp little leader to overthrow its terrible adversaries. Its true name is to be Petites Nouvelles. The judge of the Petites Nouvelles is to befulness by those given already by its promoters, the agents of the Ministry of St. François de Sales ! It is stirred up in dark corners by the agents of the Encyclical may be judged of by the following : A convent cook was busy at his work a few days ago, when a nun entered the kitchen, with fury in her looks, and something gathered up in her apron. "Open the oven !" she exclaimed ; and when it was done, she threw in a large volume, crying, "Begone, accursed book !" No sooner had she left the kitchen, than the cook hastened to withdraw the volume from the flames, and wrapped it in a wet cloth. It was the Bible. And now this man and his daughter-in-law are reading the rescued Word of God, for the first time, and with earnest feelings. It was the epithet that excited his curiosity.

THE LATE M. DEVERIA.

The Bible ! only let it speak simply to the attentive heart, and that heart is definitively detached from Rome, infidelity, and the world ! It was so with one of our celebrated artists, Eugène Deveria, whose loss has plunged the Church of Pau into mourning. At the age of twenty-one he had distinguished himself by his fine painting of the birth of Henri IV., now in the Luxembourg Gallery, in Paris, and the most brilliant career of art was open before him. But the Lord had designed higher things for him. When painting in the Cathedral of Avignon, an affection of the lungs brought him nigh to death, and he was sent as a dying man to the Eaux Bonnes. There, however, he found health and life—temporal and spiritual. Up to that time he had been totally unconcerned about religion ; but his alarming illness had brought serious questions to his mind, which he could not solve alone : What am I ? What is my origin, and what my destiny ? Is religion a reality, or is it not ? He wrote first to Romish priests, and then to ministers of the Gospel. One of his friends advised him to go straight to the source—the Bible. He did so : read, studied it, and believed. He joined the Protestant Church, as the most conformed to the Word of God, and found happiness, which inspired him with new life and the wish to communicate it around him. No life could have been better and more fully employed. Obligated, on account of his health, to reside in Pau, he lived there for twenty years. His talent never left him, nor his industry ; and the Lord blessed his words to some who sat for their portraits. For eighteen years he superintended the Sunday-school, which was his favourite employment. He spoke at the Sunday-evening meetings, and was full of the most exquisite tenderness. Winter and summer he was up at five. The three first hours were given to prayer, reading, and meditation of the Word of God.

the two parties are clearly defined, and as they stand face to face, tenacity of purpose and earnest resolve to win the day characterise both. The Pope, on his side, is not disheartened by the desertions of his soldiers, which have reduced their ranks from 8,000 to 5,000 men. He refuses to recruit his forces and increase his militia, boldly asserting, with the arrogance of fatalism, that when the French withdraw, there will be no want of troops to serve his Government. After a recent inspection of the convents of Rome, he harangued the assembled nobility in the famous Church of the Jesuits, and assured them that this would be the last year of revolutionary princes and peoples. However the Papal prelates in the French Senate may strive to throw oil on the troubled waters, and stultify by blandishment the policy of the Emperor, the Pope has sent out, on February 25, through Cardinal Patrizi, the circular of holy invitation with regard to the forthcoming Jubilee, promising plenary indulgence to all the faithful, and rekindling his encyclical wrath against all the pernicious errors of liberty of conscience, of the press, of worship, the theory of "accomplished facts," education in the hands of the laity, the interference of the civil power, the Royal veto, the prohibition of Peter's pence, and the alienation of ecclesiastical property. We are also stoutly told that the Encyclical is the utterance of the Visible Head of the Church, whose voice is the word of God, and that whosoever will not hear forfeits his right to eternal life in heaven. It is said that his Holiness has every desire to place the Emperor's "Life of Cæsar" in the Index, and has ceasing hostility to the press in only a few cases, do they obey.

A knot of priests at the formal address of congratulation to Pallavicini, in connexion with exploits against the brigandage provinces, and the famous archbishop of Milan has ordered a hymn to be sung throughout the birthday of the King, in honor of the many mercies vouchsafed to the Family; but elsewhere not feigned sympathy or conciliation. Despite the loudly-proclaimed King Victor Emmanuel to take weeks, in the festa of the Archduke which has been shorn of all since the Grand Duke's departure, birthday on Tuesday last was except by the humble Evangelist to pray for the King. The pulpits of Florence this filled with able monkish passionate bursts of invective against the government, more unrestrained years, are the subjects of a indignant protest on the part of the townspeople. A priest intended to baptize a child by the name of Filippo, and a colporteur in prisoned and fined in 20 francs for seizure of 150 Bibles. Watches after the shape of the chains blessed by the Pope, are in Central Italy; while in the breast-pins are distributed by money, with the image of the then re-collected to make a blazing bonfire. In our own Tuscany, close to Arezzo, we have lately seen the municipality of Vernio withdraw the allowance for 1865 of the communal female teacher, under the conviction that the education of girls was a mere matter of luxury, and that they could do very well without it, while an adjoining township reduces the teacher's salary to 4*l.* a-year, and lays upon her the obligation of paying the rent of the school. This wide-spread ignorance and superstition, especially in the South, as letters from Naples testify, form the greatest difficulty to the Government in the suppression of convents, monasteries, roadside shrines, and highway religious processions, while the hosts of priests, and monks, and nuns all over the country, of every grade and caste, and in relation more or less intimate with so many individuals and families, and acting unitedly against the freedom of Italy, constitute a well-nigh insuperable barrier to the spread of the enlightening influences of civilization and Christianity. A few Evangelicals write most dispiritedly from the little town of Cosenza, in Calabria, that there are twenty-four large convents within the walls, besides an infinity of other clerical associations, that the lyceum is in the hands of the priests, who are everywhere, in the café and the theatre, the private house and the public street, the prisons and the charitable institutions.

There, at Epiphany, a wooden doll is publicly baptized; elsewhere, drops of the Virgin's milk are vended; in one place, an annual holy fair takes place, for the benefit of Mother Church, at which a traffic on human affection is maintained—lovers purchasing at high prices the gifts in wearing apparel of their fair friends; in another, the pig of St. Anthony feeds all round the village, till the festa of the saint comes round, when, like the fattened calf, he is killed and cooked for the table of the priests. Ten thousand of the most heathenish and superstitious practices prevail in this beautiful land, and have a prodigious hold on the ignorant and superstitious, as traditions handed down from time immemorial.

INDICATIONS OF ANTI-PAPAL TENDENCIES.

On the side of progress, however, there is an increasing phalanx of intelligent and resolute men, who have no fear of the result of the present terrific struggle of light with darkness. io papers are more statesmanlike and worthy of attentive perusal than the reports of Parliamentary committees on the great vexed questions in dispute in Italy—the restoration of the parishes of Italy, of the free election of their priests, and the administration of their church funds; the right of civil marriage, against which the priests have been unweariedly pouring in petitions; and the summary abolition of all conventual establishments. The great topic of the day is the large majority by which the Italian House of Commons has passed the measure for the abolition of capital punishment, thus assimilating the other provinces of Italy on this point of legislation to the practice of Tuscany. “No more Convents!” is the attractive title of a clever, cheap, and very popular pamphlet this month. And at the very moment when the Pope is urged, and is supposed to be willing, to fill the many vacant sees in Italy with his own creatures, despite the veto of the King, another pamphlet appears, with a very long but significant heading: “The Right Inherent in the Crown of Italy to Nominate the Bishops and Archbishops of the Kingdom, and the Right to have the Bishops Confirmed and Consecrated by their Respective Metropolitans, without the Need of Pontifical Bulls.” This able theological-canonical-historical demonstration is dedicated to the Senators and Deputies of Parliament, and will show you how the wind is blowing in influential quarters. The students of Padua, again, with a cleverness which could only be developed in circumstances of oppression, have openly burned the Encyclical of the Pope in the court of the University; while the municipality of Naples has withdrawn 1,200*l.* sterling per annum from the priests and the Sisters of Charity, judging them to be unfit to properly educate the young Arabs of the town committed to their care.

Garibaldi puts in another strong word against the priests in a letter to the people of Palermo, to whom he says: “You have the right to demand, once for all, that an end be put to all these dark dens (seminaries and cloisters) of a false religion, where conspiracies against the country and the human conscience are hatched; where nature, which is life, is condemned to sterility; where love is profaned; where paradise is sold in handbreadths in exchange for vast and rich earthly possessions; and where ignorance is preached as a doctrine, though it has been the mother of misery and despair, the old curses of the world. Remember that of all the religious corporations, the most numerous, the most powerful, the most hurtful is that of the priests.” The Pope, too, is involved in difficulties about the renewed farce of martyr-canonization, which is in contemplation for this summer, as the Minister of Holland in Rome protests against any honour being shown to the so-called martyrs in question, whom he asserts to have been soldiers of the Duke of Alva, and slain in the War of Independence by the army of the Prince of Orange, while the Russian Ambassador equally threatens to resent, as an insult to the reigning dynasty, the beatification of the Archbishop of Polock.

FACTS FROM ROME.

Nor has the Pope much to hope for from his own subjects, the 3,000 Jews in the Ghetto having been recently so tyrannised over, that the Archives of Israel opens its columns for a subscription to aid their emigration from Rome, while the Romans are bright and happy, in the hope of a speedy deliverance from the tender mercies of the Vatican.

An intelligent friend writes from the Eternal City: "We have been surprised to see how thoroughly Italian the population of Rome has become. You can perceive at once that the sentiment of a united Italy pervades society. Despite the precautions taken by the Government to prevent the entrance of news, every one hears all that is going on. The yoke that weighs so heavily on the poor people strikes you forcibly upon your first arrival. They can only read permitted books; they can only have their children taught by the Jesuits; they can only obtain a passport to travel on presenting a confessional paper from the parish priest; and so on. . . . Our letters were all detained at the post, some of them for fifteen days. Evidently, they wished to know who we were, and what our purpose was in the town. . . . All the talk now is about the departure of the French troops in April; at least they say that 4,000 are to embark at that time. This will be a great event, and a serious loss to Rome, for this enormous garrison spends a great deal of money every year, and the soldiers have known how to call forth the esteem of the townspeople. It will be very interesting to observe the course of events, once the French have gone. Many pretend that the Pope will then become the spiritual head of Catholicism, and will be forced to renounce his temporal sway. . . . To us, it seems that incredulity has made immense progress here. The churches are deserted. There are scarcely any but poor old women who attend the mass, and at St. Peter's there are none but strangers. . . . There is presently officiating at the Capitol, in the Prussian chapel, Pastor Coulin, of Geneva. How we wish the Romans could enjoy the benefit of his noble Evangelical sermons, but you know well that even those who understand French dare not go. So that people here don't go to mass, they don't believe any longer in miraculous images, and they cannot hear the Gospel preached. There is an excellent work, however, going on among the French soldiers, many of whom are Protestants, and all of whom are very coldly affected towards Catholicism, since they have observed closely the head-quarters of their religion. Some of these poor fellows are well disposed, and yet have spent two years without attending public worship anywhere."

NOTES OF A COLPORTEUR'S TOUR.

The work of God in Italy owes much to the persevering and self-denying labours of a godly band of colporteurs. Here are a few interesting extracts from the journal of one of these men:—

In the public square, I conversed on the subjects of purgatory and auricular confession, always with the Bible in hand, citing the scriptural passages which demonstrated the falsity of the doctrines of Rome. I was delighted when some of my hearers and purchasers asked me where I lodged, that they might come and listen to a discourse on the Evangelical doctrines. I am sure that few priests have such a request made to them. I gave them the address of my hostelry, to which, after some hours, after closing my stall, I returned. There, sure enough, I found my friends, who were busy discussing where they could find a hall for evangelization, as my host had refused a room in the hotel, well knowing the troubles with which the priests would visit him, if he consented. Much time was spent in the search for a place, but it was in vain. Every locale was prohibited to the heretics. The priests had been to all the proprietors, and had pronounced the dictum, non possumus; so that not even the week after could we succeed. At 1.—I sold little; only three Bibles, five books, and some Evangelical almanacs. It was here that a lady called me to her house in order to purchase a Bible, and preached to me, instead of allowing me to act the evangelist. She uttered such a diatribe against the priests, that, if I had belonged to their fraternity, I should have bolted as fast as my legs could carry me. But she also enlarged upon the dogmas of the Papacy, in regard to which I found her very enlightened and Christian; and returned to the priests, whom she spoke of as the followers of a Pope-king, and not of Christ; and she concluded by thanking me exceedingly for affording her the opportunity of purchasing a copy of the Scriptures, which she had desired for a long time to obtain.

From 1.—I went to B.— In the evening, talking on all possible subjects in the large room of the inn, I quietly introduced the usual topics—confession, indulgences, the Bible, the priests, &c.—and was listened to very atten-

ely. Nobody made any opposition. While trying on the conversation, I produced my Bibles and effected a good sale. The next day I made a round of the country-side, stopping here to visit this man, and there with that other, purely to speak about Christ. My success was wonderful, for I found many free of prejudice, and what is more, some of them well-disposed towards our Evangelical work. During the day I made a first-rate sale—eleven Bibles and tracts, a dozen Christian books, and nine almanacs. The same evening the benches at "Albergo" were crowded, and our subjects of discussion were keenly canvassed. I had no time to bring them forward, for they formed the order of the day. Every one was loud against the priests and their teaching, for all sorts of reasons. The personal, private, and political ones were the more numerous, so that I had some difficulty in bringing back the conversation to time to time to the religious ground. When, however, some of them uttered words of dissent with regard to the Bible and the religion of Jesus, I entered largely into the arguments against Rationalism, showing especially the harmony between the ancient prophecies and Gospels. Among the crowd there were the ring-leaders, beadle, and some of the clerical assistants of the church, none of whom were dissatisfied. It was so far gratifying to see that the infidel notions were not convictions, but statements heard and repeated, and handed out unchallenged from one to the other.

At B——, too, that a priest bought a Bible from me; aye, and told me that it was his to circulate the Scriptures in the vulgar tongue, and that it was high time the people were acquainted with them.

At N—— I was informed that the priest had been and burnt a Bible and almanac, which had been bought on my former visit by the son of the innkeeper. The poor boy was ashamed to have yielded to the priest—who had painted the blackest colours, the impiety and blasphemy of these books—and asked to be supplied with copies.

From this trip I have brought back only three pleasant impressions—and they are these: the ignorant hatred of the priests to the Gospel; the general ignorance of the people; and the present indifference in regard to religion.

THE PLYMOUTHIST CONTROVERSY AGAIN.

Another live coal of controversy has been kindled in the Evangelical camp here by an English lady, resident in Italy. Previous to commencing a Quarterly Record of Evangelization in Italy, now issuing in London, for the purpose of commending the Plymouthist to the English Christians, this lady published "A Letter on the Free Italian Church." It appeared anonymously, has been sent to all the friends and supporters of the Waldensian Church, and gravely accuses that ancient Church of holding the doctrines of sacramental grace and salvation by works, and of omitting all mention of the Holy Spirit in their ecclesiastical constitution. Garbled extracts from the Waldensian standards and ten-year-old private letters of Dr. de Sanctis are the basis of these rash and unfounded charges. The object aimed at, to ruin the resources of the Waldenses, is not likely to be served by this policy, as Drs. Revel and Geymonat, at the request of many friends, have just published here a most convincing reply, rescuing their old Gospel banner from the suspicion of the shadow of a shade of complicity with such unevangelical tenets, while Dr. de Sanctis has appended an indignant exposé of the unfair use made of his name and private papers. It is deeply to be deplored that such serious and damaging statements should be scattered abroad among the Christian public by persons engaged in Italian evangelization, and who shield themselves from merited disgrace under the cover of an incognito. It is doing the work of the priests, and not of the Lord Jesus, and will only excite the stronger sympathy for the maltreated Waldenses, whose doctrinal views accord with those of all the Churches of the Reformation, but who are held in great dislike by the little Plymouthist faction in England and Italy.

EVANGELICAL NOTES.

Our young Prince Alfred was expected to be present at the recent consecration of the English Church in Naples, which has been built on ground granted so handsomely by Garibaldi, in 1861, out of gratitude for English sympathy with Italy.

Two priests have lately renounced Popery in the most solemn manner in the Evangelical Church at Palermo.

The flourishing work at Sienna has, of late, fallen back, owing to the numerous changes of evangelists, Messrs. Simpson Kay, Peccennini, Jallier, and Cocorda having been stationed there during the last two years.

The peculiarity which has marked the work in Naples from the commencement is still maintained—viz., the public discussion of religious ecclesiastical questions. Mezzocannone is crowded every Tuesday evening to hear a lively controversy, in which the interests of Rome are defended with the greatest cunning and energy by a Signor Don Mauro, editor of a well-known Popish organ, the Conciatore. Every week, in the columns of his journal, this valiant Jesuit chants victory over the Evangelicals; but

The question of the Duchies of Schleswig, Holstein, and Lauenburg, which still so powerfully engages public attention in Germany, has not advanced a single step towards a solution during the last few months. On the contrary, it has been complicated by every new incident, thanks to the annexationist ambition of Prussia, and to the principles of feudalism which yet prevail in our German Governments. For the moment the Duchies have two proprietors, who dispute about their respective rights. I refer to Austria and Prussia. The last named had made at Vienna certain propositions for arrangements, which were almost equivalent to sovereignty, and which were to be decided in its favour before the question as to the future prince of the Duchies was so much as introduced. To this prince there would scarcely remain any prerogative, but that of being a pasha dependent upon Prussia. The Austrian Government has distinctly rejected these pretensions, and instructed its representative in the Duchies firmly to maintain its rights to equality with Prussia. The rivalry of these two Powers, in respect to their influence over Germany, was sufficient already to dictate this line of conduct to the Cabinet of Vienna, which otherwise does not want to shock the sensibilities of the secondary states, upon which it has need to lean, in order to maintain its influence against Prussia. This is where we are. The provisional may continue for years in the Duchies, to the great detriment of all their interests, and to the contempt of their right to be their own masters and to govern themselves under the sovereign whom they have chosen and proclaimed so many times state of things :

Now, if we are to believe the a fresh plan is occupying the and one which is favoured by foreign Powers ; it consists in annexation of the Duchies to Prussia that the north of Schleswig restored to Denmark. What is there for this scheme ? And who of it ? Time will tell. Mean nothing which is ridiculous may to the feudal pretensions of princes, here is the Duchess of pouncing hereditary rights over and sending her old parchment Diet. And why not ? Does not Bismarck cause search to be made Crown lawyers for titles three centuries If the right divine is once under way, I do not see why Germany put in a claim for Alsace and Lorraine the Emperor Napoleon might the pretensions to the whole of the over which his uncle reigned.

QUESTIONS RELATING TO RELIGION

Let us speak of other things. It is understood that, imbued with such principles, our Governments will where in conflict with popular liberty presented in parliamentary assemblies will be understood, in particular religious liberty, without which no religion can exist, everywhere encounters insurmountable obstacles. At bottom, this is incompatible with State Church discussion which recently took place in the Chamber of Deputies at Berlin has been for the hundredth time. Your religious practices, and so unadvisedly gave importance by the appearances of tyranny. Under the rule of the late King they were prudently tolerated, as concerned their temporal affairs, but without a recognised right to existence. They have addressed petitions to the Chamber of Deputies, asking for these rights, in accordance with the Constitution, which makes no difference between citizens on account of their creed. The Chamber declined upon referring these petitions to the Minister for Religion—that is to say, that it refused of them in principle. On this occasion, Herr von Mühler, the Minister, one of the most venerable of men for Christian character and uprightness of intentions, decided that the Government refused the requests of the petitioners. From what motives? relying upon this principle, that the State rests upon the Christian religion, as stated in the books of the Old and New Testaments, and that the free communities are of that religion. This is, as all can see, an application of the old system of the Christian State, a system which has no longer truth, since political rights have been conceded to all citizens, without distinction of creed; a system which, in contradiction to these rights, hands over to the Government the task which cannot be performed—adhering as to a creed. There are, in fact, in Prussia Christian Dissenting Churches; there are, in particular, numerous Separatist German congregations. Will the Government grant to one what it refuses to the many? In order to do this, it will be necessary that on each occasion the Ministers of State should constitute themselves a council, and discuss theological questions, so they either concede rights or refuse them. Where, then, is justice? What becomes of the principle of modern constitutions?

Nevertheless, we must praise the Prussian Government for at least allowing to the free communities the practice of their religion. This measure of liberty is far from existing everywhere in Germany. In Bavaria, for example, it is quite out of the question. In the Rhenish province of that kingdom, a member of one of those communities, belonging to another country, has been refused authority to deliver public lectures on astrology! I even know a pious missionary who has returned from the Indies, who has for a long time been appealing to the authorities in order to obtain permission to preach, although a foreigner, at missionary meetings. He hopes at last for the concession of this liberty, but it is requisite for it to come from Munich, where this great business is elaborated in the councils of the King!

It must be hoped that religious liberty will at last spring out of the great ecclesiastical movements with which I have often occupied your readers, and which consists in the transfer of the government of the Church from the hands of the State to those of the people, by means of elections and synods. As in other German countries, the great and influential city of Hamburg has just succeeded in effecting, in its turn, this ecclesiastical change. I have often pointed out what there is false and dangerous in the ecclesiastical system which surrenders the destinies of the Church, and all its religious interests, to the will of the masses, the immense majority of whom have scarcely anything Christian save the name, without any guarantee for the conservation of Evangelical principles. But I am equally convinced that this régime, as a transition to something better, is preferable to that which has preceded it, and of which the least defect was systematically to stifle in the people all interest in the Church, by excluding them from all participation in its government and life. The late King of Prussia had so realised the falsehood of this system of governing the Church, that he separated the Church of his kingdom from his political government by the creation of an ecclesiastical council (Oberkirchenrath), depending on himself personally, and in the hands of which he placed all ecclesiastical affairs. It was no doubt a half measure. But the council, for the most part composed of men who are eminent for character and piety, has not by any means rendered great services to the Church of Prussia. It will, however, be serviceable hereafter to the cause of religious liberty and to the definitive establishment of the synodal régime; for for some months it has had at its head, as president, a man whose lofty character, liberal views, and enlightened piety, are generally recognised. I refer to Mr. Mathis, who has occupied with distinction sundry important posts under Government. We cannot help congratulating the Protestant Church of Prussia upon seeing its interests confided to such worthy hands.

THE THEOLOGICAL CONFLICT BETWEEN THE PARTIES IN THE CHURCH.

The hot conflict excited in the Grand Duchy of Baden between the orthodox clergy and the ecclesiastical authorities on account of the book of Dr. Schenkel, assumes continuallymissionary, with his native preachers, were among the mountains north-east of Toungoo, trying to carry the Gospel to the benighted tribes of the long-neglected Shan Country. At the beginning of the new year, during the Week of Prayer, we were in the heart of a hostile tribe, who had been exasperated by unnecessary interferences, by some nations who bear the Christian name. They had also been once attacked by the Karen militia of Toungoo, with the sanction of Government, for alleged kidnapping, which resulted in the destruction of property and life. It has since been ascertained that the village which was thus severely dealt with was innocent of the charge, and therefore the Government made reparation, as far as it was possible to do, with money and kind treatment.

This, however, was one of the happy results of that painful week of suffering among the Geckhos. Several times we were surrounded by hordes of savage men, armed with spears, sword-dabs, matchlock muskets, and poisoned arrows, infuriated by a sense of deep wrong, which they seemed to think might justly be laid upon us, and it was a matter of some doubt whether we could get through their territory unharmed. Indeed, at times, it seemed as if they were quite ready to avenge their wrongs on us, and we were entirely in their power. Then it was sweet to think, "This is the Week of Prayer." Most earnestly did we plead that God would mercifully hear His people, and remember us, and not only deliver us from the hand of the destroyer, but in some way make this season of trial eventuate in opening to the Gospel this wild race of people.

It was on the second day of the Week of Prayer, that we saw our greatest apparent danger, and gained our greatest triumph over human malice and rage.

While thus surrounded by the mob, and after looking up to God with an earnestness which necessity creates, it occurred to me that I might escape their rage, and make them my friends, by becoming their advocate with the Government of British Burmah, which I was confident had been misled in sending an armed native force, without a European head, against an innocent people—i.e., innocent of the charge for which they were attacked. I suggested to them that, while I was not an officer of the Government, I could bear testimony to the truth, which would be regarded, and that, being satisfied of their innocence in this matter, I would lay their wrongs before the officers of Government, whom I knew to be most just and humane men, and that, probably, reparation would be made.

This quieted them, and probably saved our lives. But we were still looked upon with suspicion, until we had passed out of their territory into Shandaland, and also more or less on our return. Still we were able to make friends of ten chiefs, and "drink truth" with them—i.e., make a league of friendship. My report to the Government led to a careful investigation by Captain M. Lloyd, Deputy-Commissioner of Toungoo, with instructions from the Chief Commissioner, and, as I have above indicated, with the happiest results. After reparation had been made, and all their difficulties with themselves, as well as with the Government, had been settled by the wisdom and kindness of Captain Lloyd, they sent for me. I visited them the second time, and was everywhere received with favour and confidence. Their prejudices were gone; they looked upon me as a true friend, and were prepared to listen to the message of mercy, from my lips, from the King of kings. I preached extensively among them. They began at once to build chapels, and call for teachers; and I had satisfactory evidence that some of them received the truth to the saving of the soul. In their immediate vicinity are the Broaë, Sankoo, Bree, Harshwe, and Padoung tribes. The Gospel had made considerable progress among the Broaës, and a few of the Geckhos, who live in the Broaë country, near Toungoo, had embraced Christianity. Beyond this, all were in deep spiritual darkness, without God, and without hope in the world.

On my third visit, last dry season, I baptized fifty-five Broaës and Geckhos, and planted two churches. Soon after, in June last, the principal chief of the Geckhos, Neeghgan, with five inferior chiefs, and about forty followers, paid their first visit to Toungoo, and spent a week with me. They assembled with our little church in Toungoo every night for worship, and on Sunday, and listened to the truth as it is in Jesus with deep interest. Just before leaving, the chief declared his faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and informed me that he had selected as a teacher, to go home with him, Moumy Shwa Ong, a young preacher, supported by a few kind friends in Ealing, near London. God gave him strength and grace to go home with him, and the next day, his quarto Burmese Bible was slung on the back of a wild Geckho, and "the Book" and the teacher went to the mountains to be a light unto the Gentiles. This was the first settled preacher and Bible in Geckho proper. Who can tell what will be the result of this one Book—this one mission? But others have since gone, and the work of teaching, preaching, and chapel building, still goes on. The most encouraging news reaches me of the spread of the knowledge of Jesus among the Geckhos.

During a long rainy season I have been engaged training teachers and preachers, mainly for the Geckhos and Padoungs. Now the time for jungle travels has come, and I leave immediately with a strong native preaching force, if the Lord vouchsafe His presence, to spend two or three months among these mountain tribes. The people have no written language, but usually speak Burmese, therefore it is an important work to teach them to read the Burmese Bible, which was translated by Dr. Judson. I have a few pupils who learned to read in one month's time. If I had means to give to each scholar eight shillings per month for board and clothing, while in school at Toungoo, number of pupils could be thus taught to read; and nearly all who have learned the Bible in our schools have become believers in Jesus. It is to them we look for teachers and preachers to do the great work that is to be done in this dark Shanland. I can think these mountain tribes, who have been preserved for unknown ages from the evil curse of idolatry, are destined to become a mighty evangelising agency in Burmah, Shanland, and Western China.

Very sincerely yours,

M. H. BRADBURY,
Missionary of A. B. M. Mission to the Shans.

AMERICA.

New York, March 10, 1865.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE CHRISTIAN COMMISSION.

The late anniversary of the United States Christian Commission, held in the Hall of the House of Representatives, January 29th, was in no respect less interesting than that of which I wrote you a year ago. Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, presided. The President, with almost the entire Cabinet, Chief Justice Chase, Admiral Farragut, Major-General Hancock, and many members of the Senate and House of Representatives, were present. In addition to the clerical speakers, Generals Fisk and Patrick, the latter being Provost-Marshal of the Army of the Potomac, bore distinct and thrilling testimony to the value of the Commission's work. The interest and confidence which the whole nation feels in this Evangelical charity is matter of profound satisfaction and gratitude to all Christian observers of the great transition through which our nation is passing. How rapidly and to what proportions that interest has grown, will appear from the following brief statement: In 1862 the income of the Commission was less than a quarter of a million of dollars. In 1863 it was not quite a million. In 1864 it amounted to nearly three millions. Among the sums that have recently gone into its treasury, was one of 5,500 dollars sent from the Sandwich Islands by the "Ladies' Hawaiian Christian Commission." At the date of the anniversary the Commission had 276 delegates in the field.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER AND REVIVALS.

Our religious papers contain many notices of revivals of religion. In not a few instances, these have either begun during the Week of Prayer, or been greatly stimulated by it. They seem to be restricted to a small part of the country. They are prevalent in Maine, Massachusetts, New York, New Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Wisconsin. Of course they do not cover over the whole of this immense territory; but so wide a diffusion of religious feeling is the occasion of great joy and thankfulness. Of late there has been a decided increase of religious interest in the Army. At Sandy Hook, near Harper's Ferry, a meeting, sustained for about four weeks, seemed to have been the means of the conversion of a hundred and fifty men. Similar statements are continually received from the delegates of the Christian Commission in the different armies of the North. And what is true of the North, is true of the South; that very many men in the Southern Army have been brought under the same saving influence. This is one of the best prospects for the future, and of the results which are to follow.

An interesting spectacle is witnessed at the Hampton Military Hospital, Virginia, where a Hospital Church has been organized. It is intended not to withdraw its members from their own churches at home, but to use them in a temporary relation, and to administer the sacrament to new converts. The result of this composite Church is not very long drawn, and the result is that Methodists, Episcopalians, close-communication Presbyterians, and, in some cases, Catholics, unite in fraternal worship. A singular society embraced a hundred members at the beginning of the year. The service of the Week of Prayer dethe existing feeling, and seventy soldiers have lately applied to be received into its communion.

But one of the most touching statements concerning the work of grace in the hearts of soldiers concerns the Confederate prison camp at Andersonville, Georgia. If I should spread before your readers the sworn and consistent statements of numerous witnesses concerning the horrors of that camp, they would pronounce them incredible. I have no motive to make the experiment. It is quite safe, however, to believe that more elements of human suffering have seldom come together on earth. But among the horrors of that confinement, credible observers represent that more than a thousand men found peace in believing. In the absence of all books and papers, pious prisoners, whom Sabbath-schools and former revivals had fitted for their work, instructed the rest. As some grew too weak to walk to the daily prayer-meeting, others who were stronger assisted or even carried them. And thus in many a case the words of Paul found singular and most vivid illustration. While the outward man was slowly perishing, the inward man found daily renewal and preparation for its final departure. The narrative of this remarkable revival sheds the only ray of comfort into many a family, whose information concerning the fate of a beloved father or brother is all summed up in the statement, "He died at Andersonville."

As the result of a recent revival in the Mariners' Church, in this city, two brigades lately sailed from this port, whose crews and officers, with the exception of a single individual, were all Christian men.

The Presbyterian re-union statement contained in the February number of Christendom, concerning the union of Presbyterians in New South Wales, adds interest to that similar movement in this country, to which I have several times alluded. Your readers may be interested to know the proportions of the two bodies which seem to be drawing toward each other. Leaving out of view the Southern Churches which have seceded from the Old School Assembly, the comparative strength of the two denominations will appear in the following compact table:—

	O. S.	N. S.
Synods reported	25	22
Presbyteries	126	105
Ministers	2,265	1,644
Churches	2,626	1,442
Communicants	231,960	138,074

The benevolent contributions of the two bodies do not admit of comparison except on the four objects following—the minutes of the New School being silent on the other objects for which the churches have contributed:—

	O. S.	N. S.
Domestic Missions	$ 86,414	$174,177
Foreign Missions	126,615	98,529
Education	135,344	88,353
Publication	28,184	76,443
Total	$376,557	$437,502

The first number of The Re-union Presbyterian has been issued, a monthly magazine to be published at Cincinnati by able editors from the two bodies, whose object it is to prepare the Churches for the earliest practicable restoration of their former relations.

CHRISTIAN UNION.

A very remarkable meeting was recently held in this city, to discuss and further the important object of union among all Evangelical Christians. The meeting was held in the large and beautiful edifice of the Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church. The speakers were well-known pastors of the Congregational, Reformed Dutch, Baptist, and Episcopal denominations. The characteristic and most interesting feature of the meeting was the perfect frankness with which each man spoke his mind. But the advance made toward the proposed end was not considerable. The representative of the Dutch Church, Rev. Dr. Vermilye, claimed that there was already actual unity of doctrine and feeling, which would be very apparent and impressive, but for the exclusive claims set up by some churches in behalf of their modes and order. But Dr. Weston, of the Baptist Church, argued in reply, that as the Evangelical world had already acknowledged the "one Lord" and the "one faith," they must by and by be brought to "one baptism;" and meanwhile, he insisted, the Baptists could not go back from their conscientious convictions. And Bishop Cox, who was present as delegate from an Episcopal Christian Unity Society, argued just as strenuously in behalf of an organization of the whole body of Evangelical believers upon the platform of the Church of "the first three centuries." Dr. Bacon, of the Congregational Church, attempted to prove that "parochial unity" was the indispensable condition of all catholic unity. The discussion was as piquant and good tempered as possible, and could do no harm; but it was evident that except by the forcible announcement and illustration of Dr. Vermilye's important proposition, the great cause was not materially set forward. A single straw in the par Church in this country, here in 1871 appointed a large committee to inquire into the expediency of opening intercourse between the Russo-Greek Church and their own. Two members of this committee have since visited Russia, for the purpose of fully possessing themselves of information upon which to base their report to the next Triennial Convention. It was by the earnest co-operation of one of these gentlemen, since returned, that the recent celebration was secured. The music had been brought by him from Russia, and the singing made possible, by the substitution of English spelling for the Slavonian characters. The service was held in Trinity Chapel, the bishop of the diocese "cordially sanctioning" its use, as "a token of international as well as religious sympathy." The music was rendered by the choir of the chapel, who had carefully rehearsed for the occasion. Most of the singing was in Slavonic, but the Nicene Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Gloria in Excelsis were sung in English. The officiating clergyman is a Russian by birth, who came to this country, in response to an intimation sent to Athens about a year ago, that there were here many members of the Orthodox Church who needed a pastor. The Rev. Agapius Honcharenko accordingly volunteered his services, and recently arrived in this city, accredited by the Metropolitan of Athens and the Holy Synod of the Kingdom of Greece. He was dressed for the service in a white robe, embroidered with gold, beneath which was a scarlet stole, which was exposed at the throat and breast. The accounts, which have evidently come from a mind in thorough in the course of the long and ritual came what is described as or solemn part of the sacrifice, in priest having "recited the words stitute in secret," and "the consecrated," "the priest received, his communion is sung the Cheru At length is added a prayer for the Family of Russia, with fifteen respited by the choir, and after which and the "Gloria," the congregation choir singing a Slavonic hymn withdraw.

In all this, say some of the sect there is a new cementing of sympathy between the great R American nations. But some of the papers find in it an unbecoming with mischievous superstition and the filioque was omitted from the Episcopal choir, and the "sac received" by the priest is claimed to the enormities of transubstantiation. To those who long to see Church of Christ united upon the Evangelical truth and feeling, such a tional act of courtesy, in so a direction, has given but little encouragement. Those advances towards Church offer to the Greek Church an offer to the Presbyterian or Congregational the ecclesiastical organization of three centuries," will need to be before they can become effectual.

THE APPROACHING UNITARIAN

parishes in a deliberative assembly, propose of considering the best means of our denominational life; of consolidating work, and agreeing upon common Christian usefulness.

mittee, of which Rev. Dr. Bellows is, has reported a "symbol of unity," g its office by this statement:—

e corner-stone of the Unitarian body, rished from other ecclesiastical bodies, tinue to be liberty of thought; and denomination could unite only on a broad enough to sustain the whole od who claimed the name and faith. oubtedly it was indispensable to our a visible and organised body, to agree symbol, or expression of Christian be-), without being forced on anybody, or nition of fellowship and communion, niah a rallying-cry, and articulate the he largest possible number of existing , as well as crystallise the ideas now in millions of American minds, on the the Christian faith.

oposed creed is as follows:—

e in God, the Father Almighty, Maker and earth; and in Jesus Christ His n the Holy Spirit, proceeding from the d the Son; in the Holy Catholic t the forgiveness of sins, in the resur- om the dead, and the life everlasting.

is summary creed is expanded and by an accompanying "gloss":—

; Liberal Christians believe in the d dependent position of Jesus Christ; acknowledging the eternity and deity 'ord," which is God in essence, deny : deity of Jesus Christ, "the Word" or incarnate, and necessarily losing oming into sight and within bounda- ile Jesus Christ, therefore, is God : in the flesh," He is not God in the e Creator, who is essentially invisible. : believe the reconciling and atoning esus Christ to be in bringing human he true knowledge and friendship of igh His life and death, but not in any equired to reconcile God to man, or ore placable and loving than he is nature and character.

: believe in the Bible as the record of idental history out of which their faith has flowed; in its inestimable and worth. But they recognise the ment, as well as the divine element, ble; and accordingly reject, as not y the Scriptures themselves, the pre- a verbal or plenary inspiration set up s and theologians. Believing in the the distinction, they doubt whether there is, or ever will be, any wisdom in the world that can accurately define just what revelation or inspiration is, distinguishing the first precisely from the teachings of science, experience, and nature, and the second from moral intuition and spiritual genius. And this is the ground of their mutual toleration of all theoretical opinions which do not deny the essential truth and authority of the Christian religion.

Meanwhile a striking, if not an amusing, illustration of the kind of safeguard which the above principles can furnish, appears in the rebuke which a Universalist newspaper administers to Rev. Mr. Frothingham, a leading and eloquent Unitarian minister of this city, who has recently been defending the life of Jesus against such attacks as that of M. Renan, by endeavouring to show that there is no supernatural life of Jesus to defend. Says the Universalist critic:—

To deny the supernatural origin of the Christian religion is to deny the religion itself, for if it is not what it claims to be, it is obviously nothing. It is, as a religion, false, length and breadth. We only hope the Unitarians are not about to plunge into this abyss of infidelity. Let Mr. Frothingham take his course. He may live to see his own folly; or if not, others will no doubt be left to feel its sad effects in unsettling their faith and leaving them with what the apostle would call a "vain philosophy," as proud as it is vain.

MISSIONARY INCIDENT.

A recent striking illustration of the missionary work will interest your readers. A gentleman lately read in a religious meeting in Chicago a letter which he had received from a native missionary whom he had known in India. The reading was no sooner concluded than a man rose in the meeting, and while thanking God for the good news which the letter contained, declared that that native missionary had been the means of his own conversion, when as a sailor he had strayed into the chapel where the missionary was preaching an English sermon from the text, "Be sure your sins will find you out." Chicago is a city on Lake Michigan. Fifty years ago, there were not fifty inhabitants there; now there are a hundred and fifty thousand. Could there be a more compact and comprehensive illustration of our age, than this meeting of the convert and the letter of this East Indian preacher in the city of Chicago?

THE JUDGMENT IN BISHOP COLENZO'S CASE.

The Judicial Committee of Privy Council have given their judgment in the appeal that was made by Dr. Colenso from the sentence of deposition pronounced against him by Dr. Gray, as his Metropolitan, and the Synod of the South African Church. The judgment of the Synod is reversed, and the deposition is cancelled, as most persons expected; but the grounds on which the Court proceeded were unexpected, and will not fully satisfy either party. It is laid down clearly enough, that Dr. Gray had no power to depose Dr. Colenso from his see, but the principles on which that decision is based go to show that Dr. Colenso had no see to be deposed from; that both he and his judges are bishops only in name, and that the Crown, which appointed them to their respective dioceses, had, in doing so, usurped a power which, in a constitutional country, it does not possess, and which was, therefore, from the beginning null and void. Of this important judgment we proceed to give the principal points.

The judgment commences by laying down in the broadest extent, and with an iteration which savoured of personal liking, the Erastian principles on which the Church Establishment rests in England:—

The Bishop of Natal and the Bishop of Capetown, who are the parties to this proceeding, are ecclesiastical persons, who have been created bishops by the Queen in the exercise of her authority as Sovereign of this realm, and head of the Established Church. These bishops were consecrated under mandate from the Queen by the Archbishop of Canterbury, in the manner

Bishop of the Metropolitan town at a time when neither Metropolitan See was in existence. Dr. Gray had then surrendered to the Government of South Africa, and was not re-vested, till fifteen days after his deposition. The various steps that led to the present decision were also detailed; and the questions before the Court for decision were the following terms:—

First, Were the letters patent of the 12th December, 1853, by which Dr. Colenso was appointed metropolitan, and a metropolitan province was expressed to be created, good in law?

Secondly, Supposing the ecclesiastical province of metropolitan and suffragan created, was the grant of power and jurisdiction expressed by the letters patent to be thereby made to the metropolis, and good in law?

Thirdly, Can the oath of canonical obedience taken by the appellant to the Bishop of Capetown, and his consent to accept his jurisdiction over the metropolitan province of Capetown by which this sentence of the Bishopric of Natal can be maintained?

The first, which is really the question, is argued at considerable length. It is shown historically that in England, since the Reformation, has the Crown assumed the right to create new bishops, without the consent of Parliament. Even the bishops of the Colonies were created by an act of the British Parliament, reserving the rights of the Crown. The Crown colonies are called the Crown colonies, because they are created by the Crown, and not by the people.

The third question—that of submission by contract—is rather hastily dismissed. The following is all that the Court condescends to notice on this branch of the argument:—

Thirdly—If, then, the Bishop of Capetown had no jurisdiction by law, did he obtain any by contract or submission on the part of the Bishop of Natal? There is nothing on which such an argument can be attempted to be put, unless it be the oath of canonical obedience taken by the Bishop of Natal to Dr. Gray as metropolitan. The argument must be that, both parties being aware that the Bishop of Capetown had no jurisdiction or legal authority as metropolitan, the appellant agreed to give it to him by voluntary submission. But, even if the parties intended to enter into any such agreement (of which, however, we find no trace), it was not equally competent to the Bishop of Natal to give, or to the Bishop of Capetown to accept or exercise, any such jurisdiction.

It would thus appear that, though the judgment in one point of view reposes Dr. Colenso in the place he held at Natal, in another, it effectually denudes him of all power. He is as much a bishop as ever—that is to say, he never was a bishop at all. Those who choose to submit to him are at liberty to do so; but he has no power to constrain those who refuse.

BISHOP GRAY'S VISITATION CHARGE.

The recent Cape mail brings the visitation charge of the Bishop of Capetown to the third annual Synod of the diocese. It is an elaborate pleading against the constitution of the Court of Final Appeal, and for the independence of the Colonial Church as a voluntary association. The Bishop earnestly declares his determination, no matter at what cost, to carry out the principles which he has already laid down, and to guard the Church from the intrusion of heretical teaching. Towards the close of his charge, however, his High Church principles lead him to the assertion of statements which will be regarded as containing the essence of the very heresy of which he accuses Bishop Colenso.

Are not (he says) these assaults upon long and universally received revealed truth leading men everywhere to consider the grounds upon which the faith rests, and to see that the true principles of the Church of England will alone preserve for us, and for our children, the Bible as the Word of God—and the faith once for all delivered, without addition or corruption. How do I know, for certain, that the Bible is the Word of God—what the true Canon is—in what light I am to regard the Sacred Scriptures—except through the voice of the Church, to whom the Lord promised that He would guide into all truth? How do I know that the Creeds contain all essential fundamental truth, except through the same voice, which assures me that they are in strictest accordance with Holy Writ?

He looks forward with hope to the issue of all these troubles, as likely to draw the different sections of the Church into closer bonds of union; and in enforcing his views he is not above drawing his illustrations and his arguments from the Evangelical Alliance and from our own pages.

THE CONVENTUAL SYSTEM.

The recent discussion concerning the abduction of the girl M'Dermot, and the forcible removal to the Continent of the nun Mary Ryan, has roused a considerable feeling through the country on the existence and rapid increase of these un-English institutions. Mr. Newdegate brought the subject forward in the House of Commons; and though, as a matter of course, his motion for a committee of inquiry was unsuccessful—for neither of the great parties can afford to affront the Roman Catholics on the eve of a general election—yet he was respectably supported, and the question is far from being set at rest. In view of his motion, a crowded meeting was held at St. James's Hall, Mr. Colquhoun of Killermont in the chair, at which much valuable information with respect to conventual life was given. Since his motion, Mr. Newdegate has been attacked by various Roman Catholic correspondents—by Bishop Ullathorne inviting him to come and inspect the convents for himself, and by Mr. Langdale, who challenges him to raise the question of the truth of his allegations in a court of law. To each of these Mr. Newdegate has—very properly, as we think—given one and the same answer: "I proposed an inquiry by a committee of the House of Commons; the only course that I can have confidence in for receiving a full, fair, searching, and satisfactory investigation. Your co-religionists were among the most active in refusing me that mode of inquiry; and I decline to be a party to any other."

RESTORATION OF ST. PATRICK'S CATHEDRAL.

There is no structure in Ireland, whether municipal or ecclesiastical, that is more thoroughly identified with the history of that country than St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin. This fine monument of mediæval skill and piety was, of late, fast crumbling to decay. For 600 years no restoring hand had been put to it. All that was done was to alter, weaken, or disfigure, and there was but too many reasons to fear that a few years more would see this stately pile collapse and fall to the ground, a mass of unsightly ruins. The cathedral possessed no funds for its renovation. Successive Governments appeared to be indifferent to its fate, and the worshippers who were wont to assemble there could only look on, and with melancholy forebodings speculate on its approaching fate, when the course of decay was arrested, and the cathedral was restored, in even more than its pristine splendour, by the large-hearted munificence of one man. Mr. Guinness, the eminent brewer in Dublin, undertook the task, and at his own proper cost, and under his personal superintendence, has completed probably the grandest achievement which was ever undertaken by a private citizen. In the words of the Times correspondent, who was present at the opening ceremony—

The work which was too great for the Knights of St. Patrick, or for the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, or the Bench of Bishops, which the Irish Parliament refused to undertake, and which the British Parliament never entertained the thought of executing, has been accomplished within four years by a single merchant, at a cost of 150,000*l.* Mr. Guinness has given back the cathedral to the Dean and Chapter with all its internal appointments complete, and perfect in their kind, even to the upholstering of the pews, stalls, and thrones, the gas fixtures, and the heating of the building. They had only to walk in and perform their services as ministers, and nothing is expected from the Protestants of Dublin but to enter this grand and beautiful cathedral, take their comfortable seats, and worship God with grateful hearts. Mr. Guinness has done everything for them, and paid for everything, and yet he took his seat among them as quietly and modestly as if he had done nothing.

The opening took place on the 24th of February, and was attended by all the dignitaries of Church and State, besides being crowded from nave to chancel with thousands of the citizens. The service was performed with extraordinary pomp, after which the Archbishop of Dublin ascended the pulpit and preached the opening sermon, taking for his text Psalm xvi. 8, 9.—

Ascribe unto the Lord the honour due unto his name: bring presents, and come into his courts. Worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness: let the whole earth stand in awe of him.

Towards the conclusion of the sermon, the preacher made the following allusion to the munificence of Mr. Guinness:—

To few men indeed are entrusted the means, and to fewer still has been given the heart, to equal and emulate that deed of munificence which has given us the opportunity of the glorious service and celebration of to-day. Seldom indeed has the whole house of the Church been filled with the sweet odour of an ointment so lavishly poured out as this has been. When I look around me, and, instead of waste places, which in a few years more might have become ruinous heaps, behold the fair proportions of this house renewed in all its parts, amply fitted and furnished for the service of Almighty God, I find no words which express my feelings or yours, my brethren, so well as those of the sacred historian, who, recording another free gift made to the same service, and the spirit in which it was made, uses memorable words which I claim as having their special fitness to-day: "All these things did Achanah, as a king, gave unto the king." But of this no more. We may praise and exalt men; it often becomes us well that we do so behind their back. Would that this were the manner of speaking behind the back most frequent among us; but how, without offence to their face and in their presence? How, above all, shall we do this in His house and in His presence before whom and whose majesty all human merit sinks abashed and ashamed—yes, feels almost like a guilty thing in the awful light of His presence?

In the evening the cathedral was again opened for Divine service, brilliantly lighted up with gas, the effect of which is described as having an extraordinarily fine effect. The sermon on this occasion was preached by the Rev. W. Conyngham Plunkett, treasurer of the cathedral, and son-in-law of Mr. Guinness, who preached an excellent sermon from the appropriate text (St. Luke xi. 14), "Come, for all things are now ready."

LONDON DIOCESAN HOME MISSION.

The eighth annual meeting of this society was held on the 22nd ult., at Willis's Rooms, and was very numerously attended. The chair was occupied by the President, the Bishop of London. The report of the council stated that the society has been enabled greatly to extend its operations, by the large grant which it has received from the Bishop of London's Fund:—

These grants are made on the express understanding that no portion of them be applied for the support of agency which previously existed. Every grant made by the Bishop's Fund rather increases than diminishes the liabilities of the Home Mission, as various incidental expenses must be incurred in order to render effectual the labours of these missionaries. Under these circumstances, the council earnestly appeal for increased support to enable the society efficiently to carry on its work in the extended field of its operations.

After enumerating the various stations occupied by the missions of the society, the council say: "In the last report a brief account was given of the labours of their missionaries at Deptford, South Hackney, and Newington Butts. At that time churches were being erected at Deptford and South Hackney, and a large chapel, with schools, had just been purchased, and was about to be repaired, for the purposes of the mission at Newington undertakings were brought to a culmination." This new church at accommodates a congregation of and worshippers, which originated with the preaching of one of the missionaries, about five years ago, in . The church of South Hackney of similar origin, and is filled by station of about the same number. At Newington, now converted into church, accommodates eight hundred.

other mission districts now occupied of which were given, may be seen Somers-town, Charlton-street, and Limehouse. In evidence of the poverty of the poorest to contribute to their means for religious purposes in this last district mentioned of 17. 17s. 9d. contributed 2nd January and 16th February, was in pence, and chiefly in farthings and halfpennies. There are also mission stations for railway labourers and navvies at Walthamstow, Highgate, and Finchley. At Walthamstow a temporary church has been built for affording free accommodation for the poor. There and in other districts of the missionary clergy give evidence of success.

London drew attention to it when first the society began its missionary work; but the society had made a deep impression on the public and he believed they had twenty-nine stations now at work, who certainly represented a population of not less than 100,000. His lordship stated that—

Missionaries who have been appointed last year are paid by the Bishop of London, in connexion with the society, and of them had a district containing 10, 6,000, or 7,000 persons assigned to do not, as in the former instance, for so large an area as we were obliged to have each separate missionary whilst we have missionaries to meet the wants of a vast population. [The Bishop pointed to the missionary operations of the society merged into the parochial system, and on to say:] I do not think that a temple can be found anywhere of the kind existing up a parish than in the account of missionary stations in which churches exist, and are approaching parochial status—Deptford and Hackney. The Rev. Mr. Courtenay, beginning his work with two or three men under a railway arch preaching in the open air, then went on to say that he had seen together in a temporary building the people coming forward in numbers and contributing out of their pockets towards the erection of a permanent church, and the erection of a church, then the consecration of the church, and all the other necessary arrangements consequent thereon; all these things show how we secure our permanent results by beginning with very slight missionary efforts, which, when once they lay hold of the people's hearts, produce better results than if we began with a fully-organised parish, without having secured the hearts and affections of those for whose benefit the work is carried on.

It was not to be forgotten, however, that they had a distinct missionary work to perform:—

We are to find out the poor wherever they are to be found, and this part of our work we shall never be justified in neglecting, however we may be able to turn our temporary into permanent efforts. Then again it must not be forgotten that there is at all times a large exceptional population in London. In the north of London there are railway labourers working night and day, amongst whom our missionary holds a service at twelve o'clock at night or one o'clock in the morning, and who cannot be reached at any other time. The ordinary arrangements of a parish never can deal with men whose residence is so exceptional. I think that this exceptional state of society is rather on the increase. Why, what is the condition of the city of London? At this moment a vast number of the population is employed in preparations for the construction of new railways. If the present company had to drive through London as often as I have, they would know that almost the whole of the houses of London are at this moment on the move, and that there is a great probability of this state of things continuing for many years to come; so that unless we can organise some system whereby we can be on the move also, we shall find that our stationary and permanent arrangements are perfectly unsuited to the fleeting character of the population with whom we have to deal. I do not think it will be possible to dispense with these distinct missionary efforts to meet the wants of a population of such an exceptional character during the lifetime of the youngest person present. (Hear, hear.)

The missionaries are nominated not by the incumbents of the parishes in which they work, but by the society and the Bishop, who are careful to make personal fitness the sole rule in appointing men to particular posts:—

It is possible to choose men for these posts, simply because they are fitted for them, and for no other reason whatever; whereas had the matter to be submitted to persons on the spot, it would be very difficult not to allow other considerations besides fitness to take effect. There is another peculiarity with regard to the nomination of these missionaries which should be mentioned—namely, that these posts are by no means permanent until they become incorporated into the parochial system; and if any mission station in London is languishing, and a man is posted there who is not fitted for it, without the slightest injury to his feelings, and without any ground of complaint, a change can be made, and he can pass into another sphere, for which he is better suited.

The Duke of Marlborough moved, and played in the manner he had mentioned, there was not one of them whose face was not turned towards the minister or whose heart was not listening to his words. There was something exceedingly striking in the way in which all the voices responded to the Litany, and when a hymn was given out they sung it heartily and lustily, and with a good courage, and he thanked God that one of the missionaries of the society had made it his business to meet that congregation.

The Earl of Harrowby, the Bishop of Ely, and the Hon. A. Kinnaird also took part in the proceedings.

CHURCH EXTENSION IN THE SOUTH OF LONDON.

Church extension is spreading. We have noticed above and on former occasions its progress in London, and the efforts of the Archbishop of York to multiply churches in the populous towns in the North. The Archbishop of Canterbury has followed in the same good work, and more recently the venerable Bishop of Winchester has come into the field, determined to do for the South of London what the Bishop of London is doing for the North. A meeting was lately held for the purpose at Lambeth Palace, and several munificent contributions were obtained: the Bishop heading the list, in true episcopal spirit, by a donation of 2,000*l.*, which makes 15,000*l.* he has contributed for church extension within the last three years, besides an annual subscription of 3,000*l.* for the term of his life. The Bishop himself addressed the meeting, and set forth the work of the district, and the good work that was doing among the poor, in a very graphic manner:—

He would take the case of St. Stephen's, Southwark (including the station, Kent St. St.

THE LATE REV. W. L. TE

We regret to record the decease morning, the 5th ult., of the Lockwood Thornton, M.A., Pr Wesleyan Methodist Conference days previously he preached t pool-road Chapel. He was from indisposition, but it was there was a special excellence in and that they were accompani liarily gracious and heavenly in text was, "Mine eyes have s the Lord of Hosts." (Isaiah vi not appear, however, to have fatal termination to his illness relaxed his attention to business morning, March 5, when he a he felt better, and that it was of a good day. To a friend inquire he sent a kind and ch closing with the words, "My m These were perhaps his last wo immediately seized by the hand before he could reply, except motion of the head, to the anxi Mrs. Thornton, whether he did he breathed his last. The Watc

We have lost a friend whose e difficult to sum up. He was a m cheerful believer. His religion w happy. His public ministry was pressive. And his hold on the Methodist Connexion, both minist has rarely been exceeded. A m excellences can be ill spared. It not been our lot to know a m faithful and persevering servant of Connexion in the several offices sustained as minister, tutor, edit time and President.

sented by Dr. Schmettau. According to the the last President, fulfils the official duties rule of Conference, providing for a melan- of the deceased until the expiration of his choly event like the present, Dr. Osborn, term of office.

Monthly Survey of Missions.

SYRIA.

At a recent meeting of the Moslem Mission, it was stated that there are four agents of the society labouring among the Mohammedans in Syria and Egypt, under direct European superintendence. One of these agents is himself a convert from Islamism; another is a native clergyman, of superior birth, education, and ability, who was formerly a dignitary among the Syro-Romanists. The secretary reported the baptism of three converts, in addition to the baptisms recorded in last year's report.

TURKEY.

The Rev. H. Jessop writes from Beyrout :—

Two Mohammedans have become Christians in Damascus, and one of them has been brought to Beyrout in chains, and is now confined in the barracks here, exposed to insult and suffering. Chains are on his neck, and he will probably be speedily put out of the way. No one is allowed to see him. It reminds one of the old days of Pagan Rome in her persecution and hatred of Christians. These cases of converted Moslems are multiplying all over the East. There are forty in one part of this empire inquiring in secret.

INDIA.

The bazaar-preaching in Benares by the missionaries of the London Society is exerting great influence. One of them writes :—

Only a few days ago, to my great surprise, two of the chief priests of a renowned place of pilgrimage near the mission, to which it is said some 40,000 pilgrims annually resort, attended by seven or eight disciples, visited the mission—for what reason, do you suppose? To abandon idolatry, and to embrace Christianity! They were not baptized at the time, however, on account of some trivial difficulty which they raised among themselves, not against the rite of baptism, but in regard to the order of precedence in which they were to be baptized, some wishing that all should be baptized at once, while others wished that some should be baptized at one time, and some at another. I have still hope that some of these men will avow their faith in Christ. But what struck me with intense astonishment was, that priests deriving considerable revenues from the offerings of idolators, one of whom, of seventy or eighty years of age, was a man well known, I should say, all the way from the Punjab to Calcutta, should voluntarily come to us to express their faith in Christ as their Saviour.

From Cuddapah, the Rev. E. Porter, of the London Mission, reports the baptism of fifty Teloo-goo villagers (including adults and children), on his last visit to the out-stations of that district. Most of them had been three years under Christian instruction, and had given satisfactory proof of their entire renunciation of idolatry, and the sincerity of their Christian profession. The interesting sight was presented of forty being baptized on one occasion. These, who belong to the village of Velvelly, near Dhur, have not only cast off their heathen habits, but now unite in daily evening prayer, conducted by a Christian schoolmaster.

The missionaries of the London Society, though availing themselves of the services of several hundred native agents (including evangelists), have not hitherto felt at liberty to ordain to the pastoral office more than a limited number of these brethren. Two such ordinations, however, have just taken place—the one at Cuddapah, the other at Benares—with reference to the last of which a missionary writes: "The moral weight of this step I already feel to be very considerable among the native community. An impetus has been imparted to our work of a novel character. The native Christians have begun to be conscious of a spiritual power residing among themselves of which they were previously unaware."

The Rev. W. Shoolbred and Dr. Valentine, of the United Presbyterian Mission, have been engaged, for the fourth year, in making a two months' preaching tour through the hills of Mairwara. It was somewhat more extended on the present than on former occasions. Mr. Shoolbred writes :—

Our wider wanderings into Meywar have given us opportunities of cultivating the acquaintance of the native rulers of adjacent states, of preaching to them, as well as to their subjects, the truth that maketh wise unto salvation. By all these magnates we have been received with courtesy; by the most powerful among them with distinguished hospitality. The Thakoor of Bednor, for instance, pressed us to accompany him on a boar-hunt, invited us twice to his palace, and, on the second occasion, insisted that we should dine there. Nor did he disappoint us, and mock his own to produce an eclipse at will, they were ready to receive the message we had to deliver to them stamped with a divine impress, and listened with a fixed attention which could lodge the truth deeply in their minds.

The missionaries were accompanied by Rama, a fine specimen of a Mugra whom Mr. Shoolbred thus graphically portrays :—

I wish I could photograph him as, morning and evening, he appears on village platform with his back to a hoary bur-tree, and face meeting face, and eye glancing back scores of swarthy brethren, gathered in a circle, and hanging on his lips. With body forward, he supports his left hand on the top of a staff, while the right is stretched for earnest entreaty, or brought down with a ringing slap on the back of the other, to emphasise or close a period. And then his round, open face is a picture; flashing now gleams of as he sends a home truth straight as an arrow to his hearers' hearts; drawn up now with a swarthy horror as he paints the fruits of sin ripening into the remorse of hell; glowing now with a glow of love as he dwells on the love of God in Christ, and addresses the vile the Saviour's tender invitation, "Come unto me all ye that labour, are laden, and I will give you rest." Never has the Mugra patois, lisping and uncouth as it is of its forms and sounds, seemed to me so sweet and gracious in its accents, as when the truths of the Gospel are conveyed by it, as on the tide of a mighty river, flowing from the source of the grace and Spirit of God. How powerfully, too, falls the appeal on Mugra hearts when Rama, after exposing the lying deceits of those Jogies on whom they place their faith, can say, "Yes, brothers! I too pinned my faith on the Jogies. I too became their disciples as you. For years I sought satisfaction and peace of mind in their secret charms and rites, but all in vain. I resolved to forsake sin, only to plunge more deeply in its mire. I heard the blessed Gospel from the padres' mouths, all was changed. Then I as [Teacher] worthy of my utmost faith and love—a Saviour, not sinful, like the Jogies, I pure, able to save to the very uttermost. Come, brothers, to that Saviour. Believe in Jesus Christ, and ye shall not perish, but have everlasting life!" Words like these longer can they turn off the offer of salvation by saying, "Oh, your religion is good for log, but our religion, handed down from our fathers, is good for us. Leave us alone and their rites." Here is one of themselves, who declares before them the insufficiency of most cherished institutions to bring peace to the mind, or cleanse the soul from sin, as his whole life a living proof that what Jogies and Munters cannot do, the faith of the can.

Looking back on his four annual itineraries, and summing up the result, Mr. notices a great change in the spirit of the people, and the way in which they receive the truth. He observes :—

Our audiences have been more numerous than ever, and in general they have a greater intelligence and appreciation than before. There is an evident loosening of old superstitions. None are readier to laugh at the absurdity of worshipping the stone idols than they were. They even relish the exposure of the deceit and hypocrisy of the Jogies and other Goorooes, and frankly admit that such avaricious, lustful men cannot save far less those that trust to them. The cry, "What must I do to be saved?" rises more frequently; and the name of the Lord Jesus is beginning to usurp that of Rama as the object of devout invocation.

So vast has been the growth of purely vernacular education by Gov at Kih-boey. Of these last, the missionary, the Rev. W. S. Swanson, writes that not only have they given evidence of their sincerity by a long course of consistent conduct, but what is more convincing still, almost every one has suffered, either in person or estate, for the name of Christ. Two of them were not long ago shamefully beaten because they refused to contribute the smallest sum for idolatrous purposes.

There are at Ningpo two Baptist missionaries—the one English, the other American—whose labours, to a great degree in concert, have been largely blessed. We read of the baptism, upon one occasion, of sixteen persons. One of the members of the English missionary's flock, a literary man, recently went into a Buddhist nunnery, and preached the Gospel with such fervour, that the abbess, one of the nuns, and a neophyte about to take the veil, were converted, and added to the Church. Another brother, a simple countryman, has so fully reached the Gospel in his own neighbourhood, that in going through it some twelve miles, he missionary scarcely met with an individual who had not heard more or less of Jesus from his lips.

It is proposed to form a Refuge for Opium Smokers in connexion with the Ningpo mission of the Church of England Society. The sum of 3,000*l.* has been placed at the disposal of Bishop Smith (late of Hong Kong) for that purpose, and the committee have the subject under consideration.

MADAGASCAR.

In the most northern part of Madagascar is the province of Vohemare, described as being mountainous and thinly populated. Amboanio is the chief town, and here have arrived the Rev. Messrs. Campbell and Maundrell, of the Church Missionary Society, having spent some time in the Mauritius in the study of the native tongue, they were able at once, on their arrival in Madagascar, to commence, in some sort, their labours. They are yet, however, as they describe it, "only babes in the Hova language," and they have not only to become perfect in that dialect, but to acquire others spoken by the people of the province, who are a mixture of the Hovas, Betsimisarakas, Sakalavas, and Antakaras. Mr. Maundrell writes:—

The Hovas hold a position with respect to the missionary, and to the other tribes of Madagascar, similar to that which the Jewish converts did in the time of the Apostle Paul. Many of them having received the Christian faith at Antananarivo, may be found professing that faith in the remotest parts of their country. For instance, the Governor of Vohemare, we have heard, is a Christian, and has built a small house of prayer and praise for himself, his wife, and a few others, at Amboanio. It is, therefore, by this people—the Hovas—that the missionary must work upon the other tribes.

The reception of the missionaries was most cordial. One of them describing, in his diary, his first day on shore, writes: "The people are 'ravoravo' (delighted) to see us, and apparently have great love for us. The aide-de-camp of the Governor greeted me in a manner I was never greeted before. Another man pressed me to himself too closely for my comfort."

The Governor of Vohemare and his wife, with two or three more, are apparently the only baptized Christians in the province. In conversing with the missionaries, he said, alluding to their work, that, as the sun dispels the darkness, and sheds light and comfort upon the earth, so the light of Christianity was beginning to shine amidst the darkness of his own country. He referred also to the times of persecution, and showed a Bible which he had buried beneath the sand in those times, and repeated the passage of Scripture that gave him and his fellow-Christians comfort when forsaken by all his friends—viz., Matt. xii. 49, 50, "Behold my mother and my brethren! For whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother." On the first Lord's-day subsequent to their arrival, the missionaries, immediately after breakfast, received a message to this effect:—

"The Governor says, the Lord's-day has now come, and he wishes you two white men to come and join with him in singing and prayer." We at once accompanied the messenger to the Governor's residence. He was reading the Bible when we arrived, and his wife seated at his side. After a little casual conversation, he alluded to the meetings for prayer, &c., which he used to enjoy in Mr. Coleman's time, and expressed a wish that all of us should now join in like manner in singing the praises of the Lord. Many hymns were sung, some to English and some to Malagasy tunes. (I believe this singing lasted quite two hours—I was completely fatigued.) Then I read the first chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, Mr. Campbell the Litany, and Charles le Bon concluded with extempore prayer. Afterwards we had some more singing, and an explanation given of the singing, evening, and other services of the Prayer-book.

forty miles from the coast, under the direction of the Bishop of Mauritius, acquired the native language and received ordination. They landed at the end of September last, and before the close of November had baptized ten young people and have a native helper, David Johns, referring to whom they say :—

We have directed him to labour chiefly amongst the Betsimisarakas, who have at the time of our arrival utterly neglected. I expect we shall only make our way amongst the Betsimisarakas, for they are a timid race, and retain lively remembrances of the persecutions of Ranavalona. Another reason also keeps them away from us—fear and hatred of the reason offered to me by a Betsimisaraka for not coming to our services was that they like it. I do not think this to be true, but I believe the Betsimisarakas have this idea has a real effect upon their mind.

Upon two occasions the Propagation Society's missionaries were suspected of being Romanists. Thus, one of them writes : "So far as I have yet been able to ascertain, the Roman Catholics do not possess much real influence here. There seems to be an antipathy to them in the Malagash mind. There was some little doubt in the Malagash when we first arrived, whether we were Roman Catholics, but we are now convinced that we are not, and so give us their full confidence."

So, too, at Fénarivo :—

We had not been there long before I had an opportunity of announcing myself as a Protestant. The person whom I met was the captain of the custom-house. I told him I was a Protestant. He offered his hand to me. "Are you Catholic?" he asked, and the energy with which he seized and shook my hand sufficiently showed his pleasure at the distinction. I was able to assemble the Christians, so that I could see them. He left us in order to prepare soon found myself in the little room in which they met together, and which was, in fact, the shop of their leader, who was what would be called in England a goldsmith. The captain, prayed with them, and addressed them on the passage, "One Lord, one baptism." They seemed to be deeply impressed. I was the first Protestant missionary to have been there.

At Mahambo the missionaries noticed four different trees growing as or which the Malagash formerly worshipped. The tree seemed flourishing, but they believed the worship was decaying, if not already dead.

The mission-field of Tamatave and the adjacent districts alone are, we are now receiving four more missionaries at once.

The new treaty with Madagascar now only waits the final sanction of the Government, which there is every probability will be given, to render it an article respecting Christianity is described by the Rev. R. Toy, of the London Mission, as being, upon the whole, all that he and his colleagues can desire; however, that in addition to Ambohimanga, mentioned before as being close to the foreigners, the native ministry "now wish to include Ambohimananambola : faravato, all being in the same district. With these exceptions, the whole country is open to us ; but the Government will undertake to insure full protection only in s undoubtedly, very desirous of concluding the treaty with England; but they are most suspicious lest they should commit themselves in any way, and concede anything which might eventually be construed into a right to interfere with the internal affairs of the country.

Mr. Toy thinks, however, that this provision is as favourable as the missionaries can expect, and "certainly as much as they [the Malagash people] will willingly grant."

As regards the general state of the country, he says that great improvement has taken place since the removal of the late Prime Minister; and the prospects of Christianity have brightened considerably. "I never miss a month," he writes, "without baptizing several. Last Sunday eighteen were baptized; seven more have already given in their names for the following month, and upwards of thirty are waiting to be admitted."

The Rev. Wm. Ellis mentions that one of the churches in the capital has undertaken the support of its two native pastors, and that other churches will doubtless follow its example. "Glad tidings," he adds, "of the extension of the Gospel in distant parts multiply upon us, and the congregations and churches, both in the immediate and more remote villages, manifest tokens of steadfastness and prosperity. New chapels have been erected in several, and others are in progress."

SOUTH AFRICA.

To the Hottentots under instruction at Enon (Moravian settlement) have now been added a number of Kaffirs, who sought permission to reside there, on account of the spiritual advantages to be obtained by themselves, and the education offered to their children. The missionaries only granted that permission upon being convinced that the motives assigned were the true ones. The brethren say—

They were plainly told that we expect of those who live at this place that they renounce idolatry, witchcraft, heathen practices of every sort, and submit to the regulations of the place, and they agreed to all. Eighteen persons then came to take up their abode here. They all understand Dutch, having resided for a time on farms in the neighbourhood; had this not been the case, we should probably have directed them to another congregation, as we do not wish to introduce the use of two languages here, if we can possibly avoid it. They have erected three Kaffir huts for their temporary dwelling-places, and have shown great readiness for work, in the energy with which they have set about clearing the ground allotted to them, and preparing it for cultivation. Our people, who have suffered a good deal in the several Kaffir wars, and have naturally no good feeling towards persons belonging to that nation, were at first not pleased with the new arrival, but we hope that the conduct of the families in question will soon reconcile them to their reception in our midst, and that the Hottentots may learn diligence from the example of these Kaffirs.

From Natal, a Wesleyan missionary stationed at Verulam, writes that there had been a spiritual awakening among the white population, which afterwards reached to the native. "Many have been converted," we are told, "and it is almost a daily occurrence to have one or more come to the mission-house to tell that God has forgiven them. At midnight the bush rings with the wail of the distressed; and frequently, after I have closed the chapel, some have gone back to pray. The influence seems to be reaching the heathen kraals; for many more attend our services than formerly."

We cannot wonder that a missionary labouring among rude barbarians is sometimes almost oppressed by the difficulties of his task. Such an one writes from Henderson Station, British Kaffraria:—

Often after my work is done, and I sit alone in this hut, I am well-nigh heart-broken at the apparent unfruitfulness of my labours. For example, no later than yesterday, as I went to the morning service, I was astonished to see a great many heathen Kaffirs coming to church—a most unusual occurrence, as they will not come to the first service. On inquiry, I found that they had been at a drinking party about a couple of miles from this. The whole night had been spent at that kraal drinking native beer, and they had adjourned to come to church. During the preliminary services they were very unruly—talking, laughing, and insisting in having out their pipes to smoke. At last I singled out one or two of them, and gave them a severe rebuke. . . . One day, just as I was reading the first hymn, one old hardened being walked into church, and, in an audible tone, said to his wives, about five or six in number, "My wives, walk you right up, and seat yourselves beside the minister in the first seat, and I will sit here and admire you." I was nearly tempted to smile when they came marching up, and sat with their backs to me, looking towards the door. I had therefore at once to order them to turn round.

WESTERN AFRICA.

Five converts have been baptized by the United Presbyterian missionaries at Creek Town, Old Calabar. Though none of them were natives of that place, having, for the most part, reached it after tasting the bitterness of slavery, they had been under direct Christian instruction for several years. There are at least nine tribes represented in the small mission church at Creek Town.

In connexion with the Pongas mission of the Propagation Society, baptism was adminis-

NORTHERN AFRICA.

A correspondent who addressed us last year respecting the labours of P. Algiers, now informs us that he has obtained some small pecuniary aid for the communication, which is dated "Algiers, March 12," also states that—

This season the Continental Society has sent no clergyman to minister to the visitors, in consequence of the missionary to the Jews at Constantine having removed and assumed the functions of chaplain to the English, with the consent of Her Britannic Consul-General; but being by birth a Russian Jew, and speaking the English language imperfectly, his delivery is difficult to be understood. Divine service is performed day morning in one of the arches under the Boulevard l'Impératrice, and is pretty. Here in Algiers there is but little spiritual life; nevertheless, there was an attempt in the Week of Prayer, and all the Protestant pastors and missionaries united in it, exceptions. The Pastors Coyne, Dürr, Ruett, and Jowitz, with myself, united in a Divine blessing upon the churches during this year, and we felt happy in the thousands upon thousands, scattered throughout the earth, were doing the same much need of the prayers of the Lord's people—there is but little spiritual life but wanted here less of religious formality and clerical assumption, and more of Christian spiritual power.

NORTH-WEST AMERICA.

The accounts from the more distant stations of the Church Missionary the North-West, are deemed on the whole more favourable than any yet received. "The work on the Youcon," we are told, "is advancing nobly. Mr. T. succeeded in gaining the confidence and affection of the natives. The best the Roman Catholic priest has retired from the spot, not having been able to convert." The missionary at another station remarks that, though some of the unstable, there is no turning back to heathenism. Even among the unbaptized is fast dying away. The Metawin is more the laughing-stock than the real Indians; and many of the unbaptized might be considered nominal Christians, no objection to send their children to school, to be taught Christian truths, frequently attend Divine worship themselves. The work, too, has expanded.

Frequent entries in the missionaries' journals show the hardships they endure in these remote districts, from the severity of the climate. Sett journey, one of the brethren writes: "And now the whole distance was but poverty of man and beast. Dreary distances along rivers, over lakes, or woods, day by day, with scarcely any signs of animal life to greet us. Alas country!" From another journey the missionary returns "quite spent, weak with hunger." A native agent records his intense disappointment when his had been to obtain food, returned without one ounce, adding: "I trembled to

AUSTRALIA.

We continue to receive, from most remote places, intimations of the observance of the Week of Prayer. The last which has reached us is dated January 21, and comes from the capital of New South Wales. The writer says :—

The Christian people of Sydney were not estranged from that blessed union. And from the extreme south-east of the Eastern Hemisphere prayer and praise ascended to heaven, in unison with those offered in Britain and America, in India and Greenland. On Monday, 2nd January, a united meeting was held in the Wesleyan Centenary Church, York-street, the Rev. B. Chapman, pastor of the church, presiding, and the Rev. Adam Thomson (U. P. minister) giving an address on thanksgiving and confession. At this and all the subsequent meetings ministers and laymen of various denominations successively conducted the devotions. On Tuesday, the 3rd, meetings were held in the Free Church, Macquaire-street, and in the Congregational Church, Redfern; at the former the Rev. Dr. Steel presided, and the Rev. John Graham (Congregationalist) gave the address; at the latter the Rev. W. Slatyer presided, and the Rev. James Voller gave an address. The subject of prayer and exhortation in both was, "Pastors, Teachers, Evangelists, Missionaries, and all Engaged in Christian Work." On the 4th meetings were held in the Wesleyan Church, Surrey Hills, and the Baptist Church, Bathurst-street; at the former the Rev. G. Hurst presided, and the Rev. John McGibbon (Presbyterian) gave the address; at the latter the Rev. James Voller presided, and the Rev. Dr. Steel gave the address; subject, "Children of Christian Parents, Congregations, and Scholars." On the 5th meetings were held in St. Barnabas (Church of England) school-house, and in the Prebyterian Church, Woolloomooloo; at the former the Rev. Thomas Smith presided, the Rev. W. Slatyer addressed the meeting; at the latter the Rev. J. McGibbon presided, and the Rev. T. Johnson gave an address; subject, "The Abolition of Slavery and the Cessation of War." On the 6th a united communion of about 600 members of various churches was held in Pitt-street Congregational Church; the Rev. John Graham presided; the Rev. Dr. Steel preached a sermon on Revelations xix. 9, and the Rev. G. Hurst gave an address. All the meetings were numerously attended, and the services were impressive.

The Moravian Brethren, as is well known, undertook a work which to others seemed hopeless—the evangelization of the native population of Australia. The beneficial effects of their labours are already becoming apparent :—

So deeply debased were the aboriginal inhabitants of Victoria, that the apprehension that all endeavours to benefit them would prove vain, was scarcely inexcusable. And yet, what hath God wrought? Ebenezer is rapidly assuming the aspect of a neat, well-ordered Christian village; one after another, young pairs of the natives are solemnly united in holy matrimony, and exhibit to their wondering fellow-countrymen the strange spectacle of domestic happiness. Those who are baptized lead a quiet and peaceable life, and walk as becometh the Gospel; and lastly—and the fact is by no means the least striking—those who have embraced the truth are animated by an earnest desire to convey it to their fellow-countrymen. Nor are these pleasing features confined to the older station: similar indications appear also at Ramahyuck. There we find a native, himself a very beginner in divine things, preaching Christ with such power to a poor dying man, that the latter, with but comparatively little instruction from the missionary, loses all fear of death, and passes hence, trusting in the Lamb of God. The Christian people of Victoria are better able to appreciate facts like these correctly than we. Hence it is no wonder that there are calls for [Moravian] missionaries in various directions. It is well known that four dear brethren sailed for Melbourne some months ago, and have probably reached that port by this time. Their ultimate destination is the interior of the colony.

POLYNESIA.

Later intelligence confirms that already given by us as to the unwarrantable proceedings of the authorities of New Caledonia, in the Loyalty Islands. We have given details of what occurred in Lifu. We now learn that at Maré, where there are six stations, among heathen tribes, whose chiefs have nominally embraced the Gospel, the French Governor told the missionaries that—

They were interlopers—were living on French territory without French authority—that all their schools were established without permission, and must be closed—that they are only tolerated—that they might continue to act as pastors of the native converts who profess Protestantism, but that they must not make proselytes from the heathen, and even authority for them to act as Protestant pastors must be first sanctioned by the Home Government—that the teachers, who have been the means of doing so much good on the islands, and one of whom has been more than twenty-three years, must be silenced, and not interfere in any way whatever with the people; and that they must leave the islands by the first opportunity.

A new "John Williams" missionary ship is now being built, and will be ready for sea towards the end of the year. A missionary in the Hervey Islands suggests that with the new ship there should be a new route, in order that the missions may be extended. It may be remembered that a portion of work which fell to the "John Williams" is now performed by the "Day Spring."

Literature.

The Jewish Temple and the Christian Church: a Series of Discourses on the Epistle to the Hebrews. By R. W. DALE, M.A. Jackson, Walford, and Hodder.

To give anything like an outline of the course of thought pursued in this volume, would require a considerable amount of space. The general scheme involves a series of expository discourses covering the whole of the field occupied by the Epistle to the Hebrews; and to say this, is to suggest the great variety and importance of the topics which pass under review. In ordinary cases a volume of sermons is not looked upon with much interest; but in regard to sermons, as to everything, much depends upon the themes selected, and in our days not a little upon the reputation of the preacher. Mr. Dale is a man of some consideration in the community to which he belongs, and he has selected one of the most important and interesting subjects within his reach. He commences with an introductory discourse, which presents in a popular form some of the literary questions which have been raised about the Epistle to the Hebrews. He does not think the evidence for the Pauline authorship conclusive, but he is not prepared to adopt any of the other names which have been proposed. In this we so far differ from him, that we think the preponderance of proof decidedly in favour of St. Paul. He regards the Epistle as addressed specially to Jewish converts in Palestine; and there is very much to favour that opinion; at the same time, we are not prepared to say that it was not written for the benefit of Jewish converts generally. We quite agree with him that it was originally written in Greek, and has an undoubted right to a place in the canon. The subsequent lectures involve much that is of surpassing interest; and those portions of them which relate to questions agitated at the present day, are characterised by equal candour and discretion, but on the whole the tendency is liberal, or rather liberal conservative. On all great doctrinal points the teaching seems to be sound; and the spirit of the book is one of earnest and intelligent piety. As might be expected in sermons delivered before a large congregation, the practical element is conspicuous; and we are happy to recognise everywhere a distinct enforcement of the claims of Evangelical truth and Christian duty. Altogether, we believe these discourses will be read with interest by such as have any appreciation of dignified and enlightened pulpit oratory. Some of the sermons might be referred to as specimens of a treatment of difficult questions which is at once free and decided. Such is the sixth, on "Christ Perfected through Sufferings;" and such also is the one which follows it, on "The Humanity of Christ." We could point to one and another of the discourses as having special recommendations, but let it suffice to mention that entitled "Ignorance and Apostasy," which deals with one of the most difficult passages in the epistle. In the discourse to which we refer, we detect a very firm and deliberate handling of topics which have caused misgivings in many sincere minds. Questions bearing upon the relation of the old law to the Gospel dispensation are on the whole satisfactorily treated; and it is well known how constantly they come up in the Epistle to the Hebrews. The later discourses upon the more practical portions of the Epistle are those which will, perhaps, after all, be most generally appreciated by ordinary readers. They contain passages of particular force and beauty; and we have no hesitation in saying that they far exceed some more pretentious productions which have come under our notice. Without accepting every detail in the volume, we welcome it as a valuable addition to our aids for understanding this most important Epistle.

Quietness and Assurance for Ever: being Holy Memorials of Jane Auchinleck Luke. By ILLUS. HUSBAND. Nisbet and Co.

THE author of this book very properly characterises its pages, which he says "contain the record of another instance of rich, free, sovereign grace; and furnish another testimony to the unchanging love and unfailing faithfulness of a covenant God, and to the all-sufficiency of the precious atoning blood of Christ, when applied by the Holy Spirit, to sustain and comfort the soul, and to give deep calm, solid peace, even amidst the swellings of Jordan." The volume is an interesting addition to that useful class of works which perpetuate the memory of female piety and the earnest pursuit and practice of all that is good.

Sure Words of Promise. By the Author of "Doing and Suffering," &c. F. Shaw and Co.

WE have in this tasteful little volume "Sure Words of Promise" commented upon and illustrated by the experience of various disciples. The contents are arranged under the several heads of promises of shepherding—of chastening—of blessing—of deliverance—of deliverance in the hour of death and in fiery trial. It is chiefly extracted from a larger work by the same author, who believes that her opportunities for usefulness will be multiplied by this adaptation. It is in the interesting and thoroughly experimental style of other well-known books from the same pen, and will, we doubt not, come as a welcome visitor to many.

Monthly Retrospect.

FOREIGN.

THE relations of the Churches on the Continent to the State, as well as their own internal condition, become every month more critical. Everywhere we see the symptoms of an immense ferment going on, the issue of which promises to be the breaking up of all existing organizations, Protestant as well as Roman Catholic, and the remoulding of the fused material into other, and let us trust into higher and nobler forms. Pre-eminently is this the case in France, whence radiate the influences that finally permeate and revolutionise all its Continental neighbours. In that volatile land, it is hard to say whether the Romish or the Protestant Churches are passing through the more searching ordeal. To begin with the former, we see how the Convention of last September, answered by the Encyclical, has introduced questions of strife and schism into the relations between Church and State, which might else have long lain dormant. Moderate Romanists are troubled to reconcile this state of society, in which they enjoy so many benefits, with the denunciations against it of the priest whom they have been taught to regard as the infallible head of the Church; and, while Ultramontanes fiercely defend every act and utterance of the Pope, statesmen are led to consider the daily increasing aggressions of the Church on the domain of the secular power. It is strange to read in the debates in the French Senate the reproduction of questions that we had been led to regard as peculiar to Protestant countries. Complaints about the increase of conventual institutions, about the haunting of death-beds, or the inordinate accumulation of wealth wrung from superstitious terrors, which many persons in this country regard as the mere effusion of ultra-Protestant bigotry, are there taken up and repeated by men in responsible stations—by Senators and Ministers of State. These discussions are not without their moral to us. Perhaps Englishmen may for the future pay more regard to warnings against Romish insidiousness uttered in this country, when they hear the echoes of these same warnings reverberated from France, where there can be no pretext for imputing the charges to the insinuations of a rival religion.

In the Protestant Church matters are not better. Probably in no other communion and at no other crisis of opinion, even in the French Reformed communion, would it have been possible for a man like M. Guizot, who will go down to future ages as the great ornament of their body in the present generation, to be treated as he has been in the recent elections to the Paris Consistory. After making every allowance for the obnoxiousness of this Christian statesman and philosopher to the men now in Imperial power, there remains an amount of purely ecclesiastical hostility and spite sufficient to show that his opponents can have nothing in common with him or his supporters; and though they may be united together by the ligature of State pay, that bond will not endure the continual strain and chafing that is put upon it, and must snap at no distant day.

We have spoken of the ecclesiastical affairs of France. But the civil events of that country are not without their full share of interest. The death of the Duke de Morny, the most intimate of the private friends of the Emperor, and one of the ablest of that little knot of men by whose aid he overturned the Republican Government, is said to have profoundly affected his Majesty. One by one that little circle is diminishing; few of them now survive; and to fill the place of those who depart, the Emperor has Ministers, but not friends. The time of the Duke's death, too, was remarkable. The Emperor had just, after long delay, put forth his first volume of the "Life of Cæsar," and was about to taste the intoxicating draught of literary success, when he was made to read, in the death of his most trusted comrade, a new lesson on the old homily, "Vanitas vanitatum." The work itself, we may say, has been favourably received—how could a book published by an Emperor fail to make a sensation?—but the Imperial author has shown himself as susceptible to literary as to political criticism. A scurrilous wit, who, under cover of classical names, made a savage attack on the book, the author, and his policy, has been prosecuted and sentenced to five years' imprisonment—a sentence which he had anticipated and evaded by flight.

The kingdom of Italy continues quiet, but in that unsettled and nervous state which expects and often precipitates disturbance. The political difficulty arises out of the enormous expenditure of the country, far beyond the produce of the taxes, and giving rise to a rapidly-tion of September before it was published. He maintains that his information sent occasion will be found as correct as on either of the others. While these go on, the course of religious truth makes progress, though it too has its contend with. The people, everywhere but in the country districts, appear to be free from the priests; but they are not thereby drawn to the Gospel. How when the Gospel is unknown to them; when they, and their fathers, for centuries, have been taught that there is no middle course between Popery and infidelity; and when the teachers of a purer doctrine are engaged in quarrelling among themselves? Our correspondent informs us that lately, an advocate of the Plymouth brotherhood, has taken to slander the Italian teachers of religion as intruders. With such elements of discord must be owned that an Italian convert must be sadly perplexed in his choice. The English church built at Naples, on ground presented by Garibaldi, and opened by Dr. Trower, Bishop of Gibraltar. On the clergyman appointed there will rest much responsibility, as from his teaching the Neapolitans will form their opinion of English Protestantism.

The condition of Germany is full of interest to the Christian and the statesman. The disposal of the Duchies wrested from Denmark remains as much a bone of contention as ever between Austria and Prussia, but all the consequences of the delay in the matter turn to the solid advantage of Prussia, who is daily confirming and consolidating her power there, and familiarising the inhabitants with the annexation she wishes to make. Austria is on the side of the minor states and of the inhabitants of the Duchies who have all along expressed their desire that these provinces should be free and separate and independent, though small states, under the rule of the Duke of Schleswig; but hampered by difficulties on her southern and eastern border, Austria cannot make a strong protest, while the other Powers of Europe, who would to prevent the Duchies being wrested from Denmark, show no disposition to trouble themselves about their future lot. Prussia herself continues to be divided by internal dissensions; the Ministry and the Chamber are as far as ever from settling the proper regulation of the army, though, to induce a compliance, the Minister of War, on the other day, made an extraordinary speech, to the effect that France is only awaiting a convenient opportunity to commence war. What is the ground of the quarrel, he did not descend to explain; and the bare statement of such an event has excited a great excitement through Germany. In ecclesiastical matters there is little change; the orthodox and heterodox parties are in conflict, as everywhere else; and the latter have in the main the open support of the secular authorities.

The news from America is important. The military situation, indeed, is un-

HOME.

In the midst of our flourishing material prosperity, England has been stricken with a great moral calamity, and now presents the afflicting and humiliating spectacle of a war of classes. The iron trade, a staple of the country hardly second in importance to the cotton trade itself, is now smitten with the paralysis from which cotton has not yet quite recovered; and this arising not, as in the former case, from the wars of peoples thousands of miles away, but from the clashing of interests in our midst—an internal war between capital and labour. It is easier to trace the various steps of the dispute than to say decidedly who is in the right and who in the wrong. The fall in the price of iron led the masters to make a reduction in the wages of their men; and the men, after some demur, consented to the reduction—all but the workmen in North Staffordshire, who, from some speciality in their mode of labour, believed they could command the higher rate, and struck work in order to attain it. The other branches of the union agreed, as a matter of course, to furnish funds for the support of the men on strike. On this the masters in North Staffordshire appealed to those in South Staffordshire and in other parts of the country for help; and it was agreed that, in order to cut off supplies from North Staffordshire, they would lay an embargo on the trade all over the country; and they gave notice of that intention. The men became alarmed at this unexpected combination; they met in consultation, and required the men in North Staffordshire to abandon the strike and return to their work, and as this command being disobeyed, they passed a resolution to the effect that they would send no funds to the support of the mutinous iron-workers of North Staffordshire. It was supposed that this would satisfy the masters, who would then continue their works; but as this they were deceived. The masters declared they had no faith in the men's sincerity, and they adhered to their first resolution—work in North Staffordshire, or work nowhere. The men, on their part, then cast about for help, and at a meeting of trades' delegates, held in London, they were promised the support of all the trades in the country. Elated with these promises, the delegates returned to Staffordshire, refused to attend a meeting at York, which promised to yield some terms of compromise, and have finally resolved to do what they declared they would not do—send supplies to the recalcitrant members of North Staffordshire. Disinterested parties are endeavouring to effect a reconciliation, and it is to be hoped their efforts will be crowned with success.

The judgment of the Committee of Privy Council in the Colenso case, the substance of which will be found in another page, is likely to exercise a powerful influence on the position of the Church of England in the colonies. It deals with no doctrine, but it strikes at the root of Episcopal authority in every place out of the realm, which has not been settled or defined with the sanction either of the Parliament at home or of the Colonial Legislature. It is rather remarkable that the judgment was delivered on the same day that the Cape Parliament brought the charge of Bishop Gray (also adverted to in another column), in which he estimates that, if the judgment be against him, he will pay no regard to it, but will act as if it had never been delivered. It is, no doubt, quite competent in him to do so, just as it is competent for the clergy in South Africa to pay no regard to the decisions either of him or of Bishop Colenso, as neither of them can claim any authority beyond what is yielded to them by the spontaneous goodwill of their flocks. Whatever other consequences may flow from this important judgment, the whole fabric of Colonial Episcopacy, so elaborately built up of late years by the Bishop of Oxford and his friends, is now hurled ruthlessly to the ground.

The subject of conventual establishments has undergone much discussion during the month. It has been debated in Parliament, canvassed in newspaper correspondence, and commented upon in various ways in almost every circle of society. The immediately exciting causes were the abduction of the girl M'Dermott from her mother, a few months ago, by two priests of the Brompton Oratory, and the removal of the insane nun, Mary Ryan, to the Continent. These circumstances induced Mr. Newdegate to take up the question in the House of Commons, and to move for a select committee to inquire into the whole subject of convents, their increase in the country, and their internal relations. He was opposed, of course, vehemently by the Roman Catholic members; more moderately, but not less decidedly, by Sir George Grey; while the leaders of the Opposition kept studiously aloof; neither party could afford to offend the Roman Catholic electors, so near to the crisis of a general election. But there are signs, neither slight nor few, that this question is the man who had received the priestly sanction. We now learn that the feeling this display of independence is no mere transient emotion, but has taken root of the people, and is likely to be permanent. A meeting has since been held farmers, at which it was resolved to form a National Club for the "defence of and action," against the attempts of the priesthood to "control the one, and und the other, in matters purely temporal." It is intended, as its name implies, to all over Ireland, and it has caused quite a stir in the priestly class, especially that the great object of the association is to put a check upon priestly dom course of the ensuing general election. At the same time, it must not be forg movement springs from motives that Englishmen will hardly sympathise with. agitation might, in certain aspects, be more harmful to the country than an alje to the priesthood. But we have no fear of the spread of the Fenian princip can easily see that the spirit of independence once stirred within the breasts may soon be exercised on worthier objects.

A project is on foot, and we believe has advanced some way towards a turn to practical account the facilities now afforded for the admission of Diss Universities. Hitherto the great difficulty has been the residence of a young whose regulations and discipline were all framed on the basis of the Church so that the Dissenter, however firm might be his own attachment to Noncom ciples, was compelled to breathe, as it were, a Church of England atmosphere, the effect of which upon his Dissent, it has been practically found, is so powerful, stronger natures can resist it. We do not profess to be very well acquaint details of the new scheme—we believe, indeed, they have not been finally sett understand that, in substance, the plan is to found a new college or hall, with regulations which, while they are based on strong religious principles, shall elastic a nature as to allow Dissenters to become obedient to them without doin their own conscientious convictions. It is not desired to found a college ex Dissenters; the Nonconformists who are most actively engaged in the scheme earnest in deprecating the establishment of any new centre of sectarian feelin thought that some common ground may be occupied, on which Liberal Ch Liberal Dissenters might meet in harmony. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, a has been consulted;—we are not sure, indeed, if he did not take the initiative; he has given his hearty assent to the scheme, and takes an active and co working out the details. The greatest difficulty that is apprehended is, of the hall, which would tend to injure it in popular estimation, as inferior honoured colleges that already exist; but to meet, and in some degree to ov prejudice, it is proposed to select for the first principal some gentleman the mos scholarship and for general attainments that can be induced to accept th with the example of Durham before them, where the same end was attained.

May 1, 1865.]

Evangelical Christendom.

FENIANISM VERSUS POPERY.

THERE was a good deal said in the House last session about the Fenians. Sir R. Peel volunteered an explanation of the origin of the name and of the sort of people whom it denotes ; but he did not succeed in making the matter very clear to those who heard or to those who read him. He treated the whole matter very lightly, as nothing but the vapouring folly of a few weak young men. Subsequent disclosures have proved that unhappily a considerable amount of disaffection towards the Government does exist just now in Ireland. It is of a kind which demands the attention of our statesmen ; for in the event of a war with other countries, ill-feeling and traitorous machinery at home would vastly increase our troubles. Fenianism is not a thing to be got rid of by denying its existence and treating the whole affair as a joke. Neither, on the other hand, do we think it gives any serious cause for apprehension. With the existing desire to live peaceably with all our neighbours, we trust and believe that the chances of foreign war are very remote ; and we are sure that those who have the guidance of affairs are doing their best to keep Ireland quiet, and are anxious to allay the misery—chronic, alas ! in some districts—which causes Irish discontent. What we wish to point to is the bright side of all this agitation, and the striking testimony which it bears to the truth that God makes the foolishness of man to serve His wise purposes, “ the fierceness of man He turns to His praise.” The blow which Fenianism is aiming at the influence of the Popish priesthood in Ireland may well reconcile us to the temporary existence of a set of wild opinions which can do the Queen's Government no harm, except under circumstances which are very unlikely to happen. The decay of priestly power must necessarily follow from the steady opposition of the priests to a so-called patriotic movement which has carried with it a large number of the young of both sexes. The Fenian agitation is an absurdity so far as it claims to have any chance of endangering our supremacy or bringing on a separation between the two countries ; but it is very real and effectual, and is doing a good work (God's work in His own way), in lowering the prestige of the priest, and destroying, at least as far as a large, and that the most important, section is concerned, that good understanding between the flock and their spiritual guide which has lasted so long, and has kept the land in such a pitiable state of religious bondage. The famine did something towards opening the eyes of the Irish peasant ; but (alas for human gratitude !) it was soon forgotten in many quarters that the hand which had fed the poor starving wretches—which had laboured from morning to night on their behalf—was that of the Protestant clergyman. You may pour the balm of comfort into a man's sorrowing heart, you may minister to his sorest needs, and when the pressure is gone by (such is the disruption of the natural mind), he will disown all obligation. But mortify his pride, cross his whim, let him think you are trying to lord it over him, and he is up in arms at once, nor will it be easy for you ever to regain your lost position with him—nor restore the broken confidence. This is the case with the Fenians and the large body who sympathise with them. When the fervour of their wild, independent fit gone off, they will settle down again into more or less useful citizens ; but in one thing they will be different—they will never again feel towards the priests as they felt before ; the old habit of reverence and unquestioning obedience will have been laid aside, never to be resumed. We have before us some numbers of the Irish People, a paper in which the freedom of the press is pushed to extremes—a paper which to the influence of the priesthood. Is "daring" and trampling on the people then respect the priests? We trust the clergymen who fancy they can browbeat see their error in time. . . . Can it be that the bishops and priests are blind to what has taken place in the popular mind? The people of to-day are not the people of a few years ago; and the sooner the clergy look this fact steadily in the face the better. . . . for a man to be denounced from the altar, and his private failings, of which perhaps he has never heard a word before, blazoned abroad, because he supports a certain candidate! priests weakening their influence with the people in matters of graver moment. . . . The Tipperary election has taught the clergy a lesson which they ought to heed. An attempt is being made to soothe popular irritation. But it is too late. A spirit has been roused which it will be unwise to face again. The moral of the non-vote of the nine thousand electors is that the people are no longer the dupes and slaves of the clergy.

FOL. XIX.—VI. NEW SERIES.—MAY.

This is decorous, though firm, for it is from one of the leaders; but the correspondence is far more violent. Great is the wrath against the priest at Cork who is said to have been the chief instrument in getting one Keane to administer illegal oaths. So strong indeed was the feeling against him that he was burnt in effigy in Skibbereen market-place. The burners were prosecuted, and they were committed for trial at the next Cork Assizes. In January 1848 a Committee was formed to gather money to help these men with counsel. A large amount has been subscribed; a considerable portion of it by women. A significant fact the Irish People calls attention to in another leader. We quote:

The meaning of this fund is, "Down with the felon-settlers." . . . It is rare among the very few informers whom arrests of late years have brought to light, not to swear that he was prompted to the base act by priests. Even the original Goulah swore in a sermon; and we believe Father Collins went even further than the preaching to encourage men to inform. Now, horror of the informer is the strongest of all motives in all true Irish men and women.

So much for the leaders. In one of the letters, after a complaint that the Irish People, because of the blasphemy it contains, forbids the sale of the paper, the writer goes about convincing people to the contrary, by showing them the paper he everywhere receives assurances that they will no longer be divided by political matters by either priest or layman. Another correspondent, who has been searched for Fenian papers, thanks his Protestant neighbours for their aid and adds (in language which we can heartily re-echo): "It is cheering to see the barriers of religious rancour are being trodden under foot, and that we are every church for men who love their country." Other writers ask whether sibly shaken, and their hold on the people weakened. In O'Connell's day, language such as we have quoted would have been looked on as perfectly impious. The priests have got into this disfavour by taking the side of Government; but they deserve small thanks for that. Look at Popery everywhere; it always supports the existing order of things, so long as that order permits it to go on with its work of enthralling men's souls unhindered. What do the French Liberals, Victor Hugo and Louis Blanc, say of it? "You may be the vilest tyrant on earth—cruel, pitiless, filling out the soul of a nation; we will stand by you, we will sing you Te Deums, and anoint you with holy oil, so long as you let us keep men in the dark—that is all we ask for."

Maynooth grants and systematic concessions have taught the Popish priests in Ireland who are their best friends. They find they can manage us: we have long let them do as they like, on the understanding that they keep Ireland quiet for us. Naturally enough, they prefer the existing order to a struggle in which they have much to lose, and by the success of which they would probably gain nothing. But while they go on denouncing from the altar, acting after their kind, giving continually fresh proofs that "the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God," it is for us to rejoice that at last a gleam of light seems breaking through the darkness which has so long enwrapped the Irish mind. Yea, we will rejoice, even though it is the wild hand of Fenianism which is parting the clouds asunder.

OBSERVER.

THE DEFECTS OF BROAD CHURCH THEOLOGY.

Our article of last month on Dean Stanley's eloquent defence and panegyric of what, if we are to believe him, is distinctively and pre-eminently the theology of the nineteenth century, consisted mainly, as our readers are aware, of an exhibition of circumstances favourable to the new school of theologians. Our concessions were liberal, and we tried rather to bring into the light, than to cast into the shade, the merits and advantages of Broad Church theology. So fully indeed and cordially did we perform this, the most pleasant and congenial part of our task, that our space was almost entirely occupied with it, and we could do no more than "hint a fault and hesitate dislike" before it became necessary for us to drop the pen. We cannot, however, content ourselves in this instance with showing only the sunny side of the medal. The frankness and amplitude with which we stated the case in favour of the new theology render it the more incumbent on us to be clear and firm in pointing out wherein it seems to us to be defective.

We said something, but must say something more, of that indefiniteness which is perhaps the most commonly urged, and, we certainly think, one of the most important objections to the school. There is a marvellous vagueness in everything relating to it. Who these new theologians are, what they teach, what they would alter in the old, what they bring forward that is new, what they reject, what they revive—all these are questions to which no two men could be found to return the same response. The whole movement appears to resemble reality as mist resembles sin. How, for example, shall we determine who these modern theologians specially are? Dr. Stanley devotes about a page to what is intended for an answer to this question, but we cannot say that it affords us an available clue to the labyrinth. A great number of men are named through whose diversities and contrasts there, we are informed, this thread of unity—that they are, more or less, partakers in the theological movement of the nineteenth century. There is a "savour" of the new theology in the works of Goethe and Walter Scott—nay, they are "full" of this theological seasoning. That is a most puzzling statement. We have read a good deal

Colenso. On these grounds, and a few others which might be adduced, Westminster may make out something like a claim to Goethe as a nineteenth century ; though it admits of doubt whether the proposed theological points with Goethe would be attractive to any conscientious religionists in England. But what are we to make of Scott? Since neither in theology nor in philosophy. His poems were pictures, and are ; his novels were the raciest stories told since Homer wrote in neither can we detect the faintest aroma of Broad Church theology. He believed, had a real and intense faith in the great truths of Christianity, alien to the instinct of his robust and modest nature to parade his views, never dreamed that he was capable of teaching theology. In point of the most remarkable characteristics of Scott that his literary style, according to its own conditions, almost entirely uninfluenced by sentimentalisms or intellectualisms of his day. Had Byron, Shelley, quoted as belonging to that school of theology peculiar to the nineteenth century we could have understood, and, in some sense, assented to the classification, not what it means in relation to Scott. Having named Scott a Unitarian, Stanley proceeds to give us a list of names which it is a new problem to compare either with those which went before or with each other. Dr. Pusey, Edward Irving, Tennyson, Coleridge, Keble, Milman, Robertson, Lacordaire, the writers of "Essays and Reviews," many of the contributors to the Roman Catholic Review, "the most eminent divines of the Established Church," sundry ministers, "not excluding Dr. Candlish himself," of the Free Church, all been "incontestably influenced" by the new theology. To the best of our standing, one of the "Essays and Reviews" teaches materialistic atheism as part of the new theology? Arnold, so far as we comprehend his character, contrasted well enough as strongly as it was possible for man to do. It does not explain the enigma to say that all these men entertained different views on the subject of scriptural inspiration differing widely from those of the old theory of verbal inspiration. This is not the case. Edward Irving are both men of ability, but it would be difficult to name two men of equal powers, of any time whatever, whose language is so perplexingly and tantalisingly vague. No school, either theological or philosophical, has wholly escaped the disease of affectation, but leave a new light theologian alone for skill to Utter with a solemn gesture

Oracular sentences of deep no-meaning.

The peculiar gift of these men is to lead us on and on, like children pursuing a rainbow; to keep us always in eager expectation; to impress us with the conviction that, when one other page is turned, the mysterious and invaluable secret will break upon us. The curtain, we always think, will be lifted, and a galaxy of splendours will beam from the picture it hides. Alas! when we reach the end of the sermon, essay, volume, we find that, as in the old classical story, the curtain is the picture, and that it will never be uplifted in this world.

Another felicitous knack they have, is that of using words capable of conveying different meanings to different readers, according as they are initiated or uninitiated, and of being interpreted into fascinating heterodoxy, or commonplace orthodoxy, or innocent platitude, as may suit the occasion. Ice, water, and vapour, consist, one and all, of the same element, and it is exceedingly clever in Broad Church theologians to imitate this natural analogy in their literary compositions. We do not, however, mean that there is even a small admixture of conscious dishonesty in the producing causes of this indefiniteness of style. It is in our view an accompaniment and consequence of that indefiniteness of opinion which is universally characteristic of the school. It is the symptom of a defect lying far deeper than mere modes of expression.

To come, however, to close quarters with Dr. Stanley on the merits and achievements of the theologians among whom he is proud to hold a place, let us consider his position as to what they have done for the elucidation of Scripture. This is his strong point. The theology of the nineteenth century, he insists, has thrown a flood of light upon the Bible, making us acquainted with the circumstances under which its several books were written, enabling us to put ourselves into the exact point of view held by the writers, and, on the whole, rendering "far more evident to us, by this nearer, closer investigation, the paramount glory and power of the Bible." We have already acknowledged the service done by modern critics and topographers in connexion with the text of the Old and New Testament, and with the localities, natural productions, customs, and climate which are mentioned or alluded to in Scripture. But the question, after all, recurs, whether, with so many aids to a comprehension of the externals of Revelation, we have been assisted by these modern theologians to a more precise and thorough intelligence of what the Bible means than that attained by the Reformers. Do Broad Church theologians really enable us to see farther than heretofore into the heart and substance of Holy Writ? It is by no means clear to us that an affirmative answer can be returned to his question. A man of exceedingly keen and powerful vision may, with the naked eye, see farther than a man of weaker eyesight, though aided by all manner of optical appliances, and we cannot help thinking that the Reformers, consummate a natural genius, and burning with an earnestness of faith which in these days we can hardly conceive, penetrated so deeply into the soul and essence of Scripture, that no secret of vital importance remained for modern theologians to discover. Our Broad Church friends talk at times as if they could lay claim to some such discovery; but in point of fact they seriously profess no more than to qualify, modify, set in new points of view, and variously illustrate, truths which the Reformers made familiar to Europe. Luther rescued from obscurity and proclaimed and certainty with which we apprehend its statements or doctrine seem rather to countenance this conception of it—that it is a book in which all parties may read their own views; and that, so long as they are guided by sentiment and sentimentality, and accord it respect as a supreme literary production, it will be equally in the right. The Bible would thus be a musical instrument which might play, according to their fancy—a grand old cathedral organ discoursing eloquent music, but taking its tune from each new performer.

Our second remark is, that we are not sure whether, in discarding the old theologians and adopting one of their own, the moderns have proceeded in a wiser, or more resultful and rewarding manner than the ancients. The method of the ancients was to consider and collate every Scripture on a particular point, and to arrange all its statements so as to cohere in logical consistency. No doubt this effort to attain logical consistency might be pushed too far, and the difference might be forgotten between the living Word of God, in all the glory of its varied features—its pastures by the still waters, its rich plains of golden corn, its spiritual granaries of the human race, its mountain summits of holy truth, its heaven-pointing peaks of adoring extacy—and, on the other, a text put together by the skill of man. Nevertheless, if so be that a book, however imaginative, if it contains information and instruction, the most important thing to do with it is not to derive from it so much intellectual or emotional enjoyment as to learn from it what it has to tell and what it has to teach. How, we ask, do we deal with books of history? An intelligent critic will appreciate and enjoy the simplicity of Herodotus, but the value he sets on the works of the ancients will be in proportion, not to their raciness of style, but to their truthfulness and records of fact. How, again, do men deal with the books of the great philosophers of the world—of Plato, Aristotle, and other philosophers? Do they, of all, to ascertain what those men hold and teach; and, in ascertaining, do they not collect and compare their statements on particular points, endeavour to trace the thread of logical accordance by which they are knit together in unity? We maintain that the method of such theologians as Calvin, who took the Bible, was substantially the same as that pursued by historical critics.

ments regarding it. What these statements contain he sets forth to the best of his ability; and this is just his theology on the subject. He shows that those statements are not inconsistent with each other, and he sums up their result. But he has really no theory which can be called his own; and it is not correct to say that he puts his own speculation in the place of revealed truth. When we turn to Dean Stanley's type theologian of the modern period, to Mr. Robertson, we find, to begin with, that he presents no synopsis or summary of scriptural statements on the Atonement. He passes lightly and allusively over that. When we have his own view, we discover it to be essentially of the nature of an original philosophical theory, based mainly on a consideration of certain facts or analogies in the physical world, and unsupported by one clear and unmistakable utterance of Scripture. It appears to us that the Bible is more honoured, and that its meaning is more likely to be correctly ascertained, by the method of Owen than by the method of Robertson.

We shall permit Dean Stanley to choose yet another illustrative example in his attempt to make out the superiority of the new to the old theology. "May I take," he says, "as an illustration, the very corner-stone of Christianity—the Divine subject of the Gospel history. A common mode of dealing with this sacred topic has been to take certain words—Christ—Messiah—Son of God—Son of Man—Two Natures—One Person—Two Wills—One Substance; and without defining the meaning of these words—without describing what moral or spiritual truths were intended to be conveyed by them—to arrange them in the most logical way that could be found, and to justify that arrangement by separate Scripture texts. This is what is done to perfection in Dean Swift's sermon on the 'Doctrine of the Trinity,' and in Bishop Pearson's learned exposition of the second part of the Creed. . . . It is because modern theology proceeds in an exactly opposite track that its results promise to be more fruitful and satisfying. I take two instances from preachers and theologians, one of them entirely penetrated with the modern spirit, and the other to a considerable extent, although by circumstances placed in apparent opposition to it. I allude to the lamented Robertson, of Brighton, and to Mr. Liddon, of Oxford. The former has, on this great subject, preached many sermons—the most purely theological of our age—which all England has read with admiration; the other has preached a single sermon on the same topic, which was heard by numbers with admiration last year in St. Paul's Cathedral. These preachers had this in common with each other, and with the feeling of this age, that their object from first to last was to place before their hearers what the real mind and nature was of Him of whom they spoke—to delineate His character and the character of His acts down to minute detail. They have done this not merely to set forth what is called an example, as has been powerfully done by Jeremy Taylor and Barrow. They have gone further than this, because they felt that unless they told their hearers who and what manner of person He was, in all the moral and spiritual graces by which alone God can be made known to man, and man can be brought nearer to God, they were beating the air; that it is from a faithful and just representation of His actual appearance in the world that we have the best proof, the best representation of His Divinity."

We observe that, in this passage, Dean Stanley offers no proof whatever that such words as "Christ," "Messiah," "Son of God," "Son of Man," and so on, used by Swift and Pearson, either were to themselves or need be to their readers mere meaningless sounds. We deny that this is a correct description of them. On the contrary, we affirm that they have reference, sufficiently intelligible for practical purposes, to those momentous facts on which the intent and efficacy of the Saviour's work compared with those of other books, they invariably state the essential question of the whole controversy—namely, whether the Bible has or has not a claim to speak with Divine authority. There is a difference not in degree, but in kind, between literary admiration, ardent though it may be to the utmost, and the conception, and acknowledgment of a Divine right to command and to punish. In the feudal ages it constantly happened that one sovereign was bound to do homage to another sovereign. This homage might be a stiff ceremony, implying no personal regard or affection on the part of the vassal to his lord paramount, and requiring no particular exhibition of civility. Persons on the other hand, might be felt, and language might be exhausted in polite and complimentary expressions, while the sovereign making us homage could not, even by the threat of war, be induced to do homage to him to whom we were addressed. So it is with the Bible. Its claim is not for personal and literary admiration, but for recognition of an authoritative superiority. From its beginning to its last there is not a sentence requiring or inviting us to observe the beauties of its diction, the aptness of its metaphors, the eloquence of its descriptions, or the melodiousness of its poetry. These are left to the æsthetic likes and dislikes of the reader. To talk of them would manifestly be as foreign to the spirit of the writers as it would be unbecoming in the heralds of a great potentate delivering a message of life and death importance, to descant on the splendour of their uniforms, or the rich effect of their gold lace and embroidery. From Genesis to Revelation, the Bible speaks with authority. Its tone is that of an Imperial decree as from the Almighty, the terms on which man is offered salvation; it bids him to accept them or to perish. Broad Churchmen do not tell us that the authority is invalid, and until they satisfy us on this point, we must pronounce the eulogies of the Bible irrelevant and tantalising.

On the whole, therefore, while retracting not one word of what we said of the new theology, we conclude that its defects go far to counterbalance its merits, and that, considering the limited nature of even its professed conclusions, to our theological knowledge, the language of its representatives might more fully display a larger element of modesty.

COMPARISONS OF THE KINGDOM: HEAVEN; OR, THE CIVILISATION INFLUENCE OF CHRISTIANITY

very animal, it is an organism; unlike a stone, unlike a heap of sand, unlike a handful of meal, it has life and limbs, vitality and growth.

So the Church of Christ is a living and organised whole, of which a tree, with its roots and branches, its fruit and its shadow, is an excellent emblem. This organism springs from that germ called the Gospel. This little seed is sown in God's garden, and, quickened by the Holy Spirit, it springs up and grows. In Iona the preaching of Columba springs up the Church of the Culdees. In Germany, the preaching of Luther springs up the Evangelical or Protestant community. In the world itself, the preaching of Apostles, the grain of mustard-seed deposited by the fishermen of Galilee, springs up the truest, oldest, widest of all fellowships—the Church of the first-born, whose names are written in heaven—that grandest of all societies, of which dimly or distinctly we think when we say, “I believe in the communion of saints.”

But leaven is no organism, and for that matter neither is meal. Leaven is the little mass of sour and fermenting paste which in other days, and before the employment of yeast, the baker used to put into his dough, till it spread through the entire batch, and changed the whole into the likeness of itself. And although in the Bible leaven is frequently used to denote hypocrisy or malice, there is no reason why it should not be used to denote any principle which spreads and penetrates, whether good or bad. And here there can be little doubt that it is intended to say, Christianity is a principle designed and fitted to influence the entire community. Although in the outset there may not be much of it, yet it has prodigious potency, and as it keeps on working it will more and more assimilate to its own nature all that is called society. It is not only the Christian who will bring to Christ the Pagan or the profligate, but it is Christian truth, Christian feeling, Christian conduct, which will tell on the world's way of thinking and acting, and at last leave nothing in the whole lump of humanity which is not sensibly affected by this heaven-descended principle.

If so, the purport of the two parables is sufficiently distinct. The one describes the Church of Christ in its own separate identity and organic completeness, starting up from the soil of this world, yet not of it—every leaf and twig partaking the same nature, and in its surprising growth destined to overtop all competitors. The other describes Christianity as a power or principle—a little yeast or ferment to which God has given such potency, that it will go on permeating and assimilating the entire mass of humanity, till the whole is leavened. The one metaphor completes the other. The tree grows, the leaven works. The tree is a distinct living organism, the leaven is a power or influence. The Church of Christ is the mustard-tree—the leaven is Christianity. Or, put it another way—If both the grain of seed and the leaven represent the Gospel, in the one case we have the seed germinating and springing up in that separate, self-contained unity which we call the church of the saved—in the other, we have the potent and mysterious principle going out beyond itself into society, and materially affecting the world which surrounds the Church.

Put into modern language, we have here the assertion, Christianity is the great civiliser. This is a truth to which more justice has been done by historians than by divines; still it is truth. No doubt there have been civilizations which were not Christian—the Greek and Roman, for example, and the Chinese and Indian, if we may give so grand a name to a grotesque and puerile culture. And in our modern civilization there may be elements which are not purely or pre-eminently Christian—which are not essentially Christian at all. There is a classical element, for example—and an artistic element, and a very powerful commercial element—which the gradual emancipation is going forward, and a groaning, but self-sold raised and restored to the liberty of sons of God.

There are certain facts which will not be disputed: There is a world, and there is also a Church; but although all men do not accede out and out, nor do all belong to the household of faith, yet through that Church Christ is the Benefactor of multitudes who never to have "this Man to reign over them."

Take, for instance, equity, shading off, as it does, into its kindred humanity. Says the Apostle James, "Go to, ye rich men, weep and howl in your miseries that are come upon you. Behold the hire of the labourer reaped down your fields, which is of you kept back by fraud, crieth, and them who have reaped are entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth throughout our Lord's discourses we find denunciations of those who devour widows' houses, and throughout the Old Testament prophets—those great righteous denunciations of those who grind the faces of the poor. And although there may be still sufficient fraud and rapacity, no one can conceive what Christianity has done for the poor and unprotected, who cannot throw himself back to the times before the advent, or who is not familiar with the condition of the dependent classes under Eastern despotisms. And it would have been the same in Europe, but Christianity stepped in. It said to the landed proprietor and the tenant, "If you promise to pay, you must perform. If you take that man to labour—if you take his ox or his ass—you must give him fair value for it. True, you are strong, and you call him your serf or vassal; but he is as free as you, and as free as you, who is stronger than either, and before whom you both must stand." And thus, even in its most degenerate days, Christianity threw its shield over the poor and needy, and taking up the cause of the oppressed, no helper, its heaven has so penetrated legislation, or rather we should say permeated that opinion which is the source of all effective and enduring laws, that now not only is there no serfdom in Europe, but the day-labourer receives for his wages as the Crown is secure of its revenues.

"Do unto others as ye would that they should do unto you." This Gospel maxim has so infiltrated the mind of Europe, that it is current even among those who imperfectly practise it, and by its implied recognition of univerinbeciles? Let them die off, and the sooner the better, says Political Economy; they are not in our plan, they spoil our calculations, they are very much in the way, and are best let alone. But if we let them alone, our religion won't let us alone. The poor and the outcast were taken up by Christ himself, and—"The poor ye always have with you"—were by Him transferred to the Church, when they should enjoy His bodily presence no longer. And not only has He made the care for their case a necessity of the Christian life—it is not over a solitary or selfish meal that you pray His prayer, "Give us this day our daily bread;" and when you try to shut out from your compassion the brother who has need, you so far shut out the love of God, but He has made it an inevitable prompting of the Christian spirit; and whether it be Pastor Fliedner, with the Deaconesses of Kaiserswerth, or the founders and supporters of our asylums for the orphan, for the idiot, for the incurable, or those who give their time to visit the sick, to instruct the ignorant, to raise up and restore the fallen, they are obeying an instinct as unknown to the polished Greek and sturdy Roman as it was to the phlegmatic Chinaman or effeminate Hindoo, but an instinct familiar to those whose own spirits have been melted by the matchless manifestation of the Divine benevolence, and who have learned to pray,

As we to others mercy show,
We mercy beg from heaven.

This Christian tenderness tells on the outside world. As a result of these two things in the midst of men—that great magazine of God's mercies, the Gospel, and that fund of actual loving-kindness which the Spirit of God maintains in the minds of His people—as a result of these things, the world is far less harsh and cruel than it used to be. A little leaven has pervaded the whole lump, and many men who are not devout are kind, generous, humane. Living in an atmosphere filled more or less with Christian feeling, and impelled by the contagious example of Christian friends or kindred—constrained by love to the men whom the love of Christ constrains—they are led on to do such noble deeds and give such noble gifts as would be no disgrace to Christian charity.

Equity or fairness is a Christian grace—that considerateness which puts a man in his neighbour's place, and does as he would be done by: and so is tenderness, compassion, self-sacrifice in saving the lost and relieving the wretched: and as a third excellence, thoroughly Christian, we might have instanced Truth. Unfortunately, the Church of Rome has found it needful to "lie for God," and its frightful doctrine of "pious frauds" has occasionally received countenance in the controversial tricks and prophetic quackeries of Protestant divines: but it is not for nothing that the awful apparition of Ananias and Sapphira meets us so early in the Christian history; and partly as a result of that solemn warning, and still more as the reflection of the whole spirit of the Gospel, wherever there has been genuine piety there has always been a notable measure of truth and God-fearing uprightness; co-existent with this stricter veracity within the Church there may be discerned a keener sense of honour in the world. There is more than enough of fraud and falsehood still; but surely the number grows of those whose "word" is better than a bad man's "oath," and who, when they have sworn to their own hurt, stand by it. Even controversy is conducted with greater candour; men are getting more courage to confess their errors or their ignorance; and not only have statesmen been found bold enough to avow as their policy "a policy of peace," but wise enough to adopt a policy of openness and honesty.

Not only are they the Christian ethics which have got diffused through the morals of society, but the other ingredients of the Gospel have also told. If you were asking a company of believing men, "What is the greatest benefit which Christianity has conferred on you?" one might answer, "New light. Whereas I once was blind, now I see. I see myself, lost and ruined, with a depraved nature and a soul destroyed by sin. And I see God. I see Him holy, yet more helpful: I see Him 'the just God and the Saviour,' infinitely pure, yet unspeakably compassionate, devising my salvation, and doing all things in the way of pardoning assistance which are needful to secure it. New light." A second might say, 'new life that I owe to the Gospel. It has given me a new Friend in Jesus Christ, a new motive in the love of God, a new prospect in the hope full of immortality. And a third, in reply to the question, "What has Christianity done for you?" answer as truly, "It has given me a new nature. Things for which I once loathed heart are now my element, and in that law of God I do delight which was once terror and my task." Corresponding to such types of piety are the influences which Christianity exerts on those who have not yet come within its pale. The far-reaching and lofty aims of one high-hearted Christian, if they do not lift his neighbours to him, may at least raise them for a moment from the dust; and the courage of one who has faith in God and no fears for the future will sometimes animate feeble spirits at the hour of danger: just as God's presence with the believer helps to make his life real and present to the worldling. Like the drop of essence which flavours the pitcher—like the flask of attar which scents the whole chamber—like the breath of heaven which gives to the three measures a new attribute; though it is still a little flock and the followers of Christ a mournful minority, the faith of this little Church keeps the world from atheism, its blessed hope keeps the world from many experiments, as well as from the demoralising blackness of despair, and its influence, however limited, is a cheering, elevating influence, which, in the face of all sensual and utilitarian tendencies, maintains that sentiment which gives to society meaning and its charm, and which, in the midst of materialistic influences, rears its head ever and anon of that higher sphere whence the sweet exotic comes.

You see your calling, Christian brother. You are here to serve Christ and to extend His kingdom. Ye are the salt of the land, ye are the lights of the world, and ye are the leaven which is to pervade and new-mould society. This end is answered when any man carries on his common work, his daily calling, on Christian principles. It is perhaps still more decidedly subserved when a man has a calling capable of being consecrated—as when the artist wields his pencil to exhibit the dangers and deformity of vice, the charms of domestic virtue, the majesty of Christian heroism—as when the man of letters employs his pen for the rebuke of popular evils, for the praise and protection of scriptural faith and piety. But it will also be subserved by those who, in the interests of heaven's kingdom, and in order to promote God's ascendancy, are steadily and unostentatiously employing the influence which God has given. It was not only gold, but frankincense and myrrh, which the Eastern sages presented to the new-come Saviour. You may have little gold to give, but myrrh in the bundle, incense in the censer, a good man's influence when living, a good memory when gone, will go far in the way of fostering worth and restraining sin. You have such influence; use it. You are not a cypress, strict and straight with arms appressed and pointing all to heaven—like a hermit of the Theban desert—like some of the old English Puritans: your branches spread; let those who are under your shadow—your friends, your children—let them there find pleasant shade and leaves of healing. And the Gospel, which makes you so rich and strong, is not a mere amulet or charm which you carry about for your own protection, but a blessing with which you are entrusted for the world's welfare. So do not hoard it. Do not conceal your convictions, and on right occasions enforce your belief and your principles; and even though you may not in every instance succeed in saving a soul from death, it is something to dispel a single prejudice or prevent a single Foreign Intelligence.

FRANCE.

—, France, April, 1865.

MAN QUESTION IN THE LEGISLATIVE CHAMBER.

oke, in my last letter, of the discussion in the Senate on religious affairs. The questions have been agitated in the Chamber of Deputies, and these latter present some features which deserve to be noted.

The principal part, on this occasion, was taken by M. Thiers. Your readers are certainly acquainted with the name and leading traits of this eminent personage. During the reign of Louis Philippe, M. Thiers held, more than once, the post of Prime Minister, and exerted a powerful influence on the destinies of France. He is a skilful orator, a lively and eloquent orator, a politician, and a historian of considerable talents.

Europe has read especially with keen interest his "History of the Consulate and the Empire." Nowhere has the complex mystery of the first Napoleon been revealed in a more vivid and complete manner.

Nevertheless, M. Thiers, as a statesman, is far from being on a level with M. Guizot, Palmerston, or the lamented Count de Montalembert. He lacks that lofty, broad, and far-reaching intellect which gives the mastery over all circumstances. His ideas are often superficial, his views narrow, and he strangely mixes up political wisdom and experience with the whims of an easily-excited imagination. He has lately had fresh evidence of these faults in the speech delivered by M. Thiers on the occasion of the Italian convention and the affairs of Rome.

His arguments were weak—his conclusions not logically established; and the effect of which was showered upon the orator, prevented public opinion from turning against him.

Thiers has never been a devotee or an enthusiast; he even demanded, in 1846, that the Jesuits should be expelled from France.

But now the same M. Thiers pleads for the maintenance of Pius IX.'s temporal power by help of French bayonets. He asks that the inhabitants of the Roman States be left in the right which belongs to every other nation, of changing their form of government, and contends that the temporal sovereignty of the Pope is absolutely necessary to the existence of the Roman Catholic religion. In a word, M. Thiers has reproduced all the old and worn-out arguments of the clerical party.

I must add, that the political press of Paris, with the exception of some Jesuitical journals, have been unanimous in their opposition to the sentiments of M. Thiers. It is more and more evident that the prolongation of the French occupation of Rome shocks the national mind, and that the great majority of our people are tired of sacrificing so much money and so many soldiers to maintain the throne of a Pontiff who persists in professing maxims the most contrary to modern laws.

The Legislative Chamber clearly showed by its vote that it disapproved of the politico-religious theory of M. Thiers; for 169 deputies rejected the amendment which that statesman took under his protection, and 84 only voted for its adoption. This result proves that the great majority of the representatives elected by universal suffrage are favourable to the treaty of September 15.

EQUIVOCAL POSITION OF THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT.

But here arises another question, which is by no means solved; for Napoleon III. seems like Jupiter in the mythology, to make a point of enveloping himself in thick clouds, by which his actions are concealed from the eyes of vulgar mortals. What course will be adopted by the Emperor when the two years fixed for the departure of the French troops shall have expired? No clear reply, no precise declaration, can be obtained upon this formidable problem.

The Government orator, M. Rouher, said in vague terms that Napoleon III. would protect the independence of the Holy See. But in what does that independence precisely consist? Does it imply the preservation of the temporal sovereignty? The defender of the Imperial policy promised nothing upon the subject. M. Rouher declared, moreover, that the inhabitants of the Papal States have no right to annex their country to the kingdom of Italy, without the consent of Europe; but he concedes to them the right of changing their political institutions. Very good his hope that the Pope would become reconciled to King Victor Emmanuel. He alleged that Pius IX. might easily raise an army by recruiting in all the Roman Catholic countries of Europe, and that with this military force the Papal throne might be maintained against the aggressions of revolutionists at home and abroad.

What is all this? Words, words, words, as your Shakespeare said, and nothing more. Everybody is well aware that the Pope is incapable of forming a regular army, that he has not the money to support a large body of soldiers, that the republicans and liberals of the Roman States would not fear to struggle against such battalions as his, and so forth.

What will be the final result of the long deliberations in the Legislative Chamber? Nothing, nothing positive. As to the affairs of Rome, all is left to the chapter of accidents and to the uncertain resolves of Napoleon III. Assuredly the Emperor desires above all to effect a reconciliation, to secure an arrangement between the Papacy and Italy. But if he should not succeed in that object, what will he do? Probably, at this moment, he himself does not know. What a strange situation!

ATTACKS BY THE OPPOSITION ON THE POPISH CLERGY.

Other discussions in which religion was involved have occupied the sittings of the Legislative Chamber. M. Guerault, a member of the Opposition, delivered a long speech against the Jesuits and the various monastic measures, formerly belonging to the Simonian school. Despotism, force are, in his eyes, the best surmounting our religious and difficulties; he is in haste to cut the knot by the sword.

Discreet and serious men pursue a totally different course. Jesuitism, Monachism, all the enemies of our liberties and our civilization appear before the threats of a persecution; on the contrary, they gain thence more prestige. The true and efficacious means of destroying Popery is by multiplying France schools, Bibles, good means of edification and instruction. Unhappily, the greater number of our men, themselves strangers to the sciences, are utterly incapable of leading their fellow-citizens to a better Popery. What, then, will they do? declamations against the clergy. Very little.

On the other hand, the clergy cannot understand how much the good sense and shock the cultivated minds by their perpetrating puerile and absurd prodigies.

A SINGULAR MIRACLE OF THE

You are doubtless aware of the law adopted in France for military conscription. All young men of the age of twenty annually called to bear arms are drawn from an urn which the five young men so devoted to the worship of Mary drew the five best numbers, so that they were exempted from military service! The Virgin miraculously protected and delivered them!

Narratives like these are printed, in Paris, by the principal organ of Popery, in 1865. How can Rationalism and impiety but grow, in the face of such stupid fabrications? A Freethinker inquires sneeringly of the Monde in what way the French army is to obtain recruits, if all the young men take the precaution to furnish themselves with images of the Virgin? "We cannot suppose," he remarks, "that Mary would establish distinctions between those who have her image in their pockets. They would therefore all draw good numbers, and we should have no more soldiers!" This railery, again, shows that the Jesuits are propagating scepticism by their extravagant tales of miracles.

M. MICHELET AND HIS PRETENDED BIBLE OF HUMANITY.

As I have spoken of sceptics, I may say a few words respecting a strange book which has appeared within the last few weeks: it is entitled "The Bible of Humanity," and bears the name of M. Michelet.

M. Michelet has gained a certain reputation in the literary world by his oratorical powers and his historical works. For a long series of years he was one of the professors who was most applauded by the students of Paris. His "History of France" and other compositions of the same kind, are not deficient in solid learning, and often present much that is interesting. But M. Michelet has compromised his reputation, lowered his character, and even marred his talents, by adopting a system of Pantheism, without rule or limits.

What is his pretended "Bible of Humanity?" The author lays down, at the commencement of his book—1. That the Bible of the Jews and Christians is the production of a particular race, the utterance of a single people; consequently that it is narrow, incomplete, and insufficient for every generation of the entire human race. 2. That there exists in the world another Bible, more elevated, more comprehensive, responding to all the religious and moral wants of all ages. Where is this most excellent Bible? Everywhere; in the sacred books of India and Persia, with the Greek and Roman poets, in the traditions of the Druids, among the priests of the savage tribes of Africa, &c. And M. Michelet miraculously collects all these fables, these imaginary incarnations, these nebulous theories, and then calls this "The Bible of Humanity!" It is, in truth, the most confused medley, the most undigested chaos, that can be imagined! The book seems as if it had been written in a lunatic asylum; and it is to this depth that men fall who were capable of doing honour to the literature of our country by their works! Infidelity is a source of death to the intellect as well as to the soul.

THE RADICALS OF FRENCH PROTESTANTISM.

In proportion as the position of French Protestantism is the object of more attentive examination, its difficulties and perils assume a more menacing aspect. I have already written something with respect to this in my last letter (p. 177); but it is necessary to return to it.

1. The men—pastors and laymen—opposed to the Evangelical cause do not deserve to receive the name of Liberals; their true and accurate name is that of Radicals. If they had liberal views and tendencies, they would respect the liberties of the congregations, and would not labour to obtain for the pastors completely despotic power. No, the title which they take is usurped, and is wrongly used. Their spirit, their character, their end, is Radicalism, which seeks to pull down everything, while promising that everything shall be reconstructed, and which only succeeds in accumulating ruins upon ruins. In religious matters, as in politics, the Radicals have enough capacity and strength to attack that which exists; but when they attempt to construct anew something that shall be permanent, all their powers are paralysed.

2. These Radicals in our Protestant Churches have been challenged very often, and in a solemn manner, to declare what they do and what they do not believe. The question was very simple, and deserved a distinct reply, expressed in unmistakable terms; for it is the right and the duty of every religious society to profess common doctrines, inasmuch as it possesses the same liturgies, celebrates the same worship, &c. Well, what have the Radicals replied to this most reasonable request? They say, that they do not agree with one another, and that they have not such simplicity as to publish a profession of faith which would be disavowed by several of their own friends!

3. Thus the Radicals themselves proclaim their state of internal disunion and anarchy. Their creed is an incoherent medley of the most diverse opinions; some of them hold the supernatural element, as revealed in the Bible and Christianity; others reject it, and refuse to believe in any miracle whatever. Some are openly Deists, and look upon Christ as a Socrates or a Confucius of the Hebrew race; others, again, do not even admit the existence of a personal and living God; they are Pantheists; and others sink down to materialism and atheism. What an incredible array of heterogeneous opinions! But all these Radicals shake hands and constitute a compact phalanx when the moment comes to vote against men of Evangelical principles. Their only doctrine is to oppose all doctrines, and their only law is to overthrow all the time-honoured laws of our communion. This state of anarchy must come to an end; but with the union of Church and State, and under the restrictions imposed upon us, how can order and unity be re-established? May the Lord come to our help!

DISPUTES AMONG THE LUTHERANS.

There are in France, as your readers are aware, members of the Lutheran Church. Most of them are Germans, or rather Alsacians by birth, and the Organic Articles of the 18th Germinal, An X., gave them particular laws.

These Lutherans had not been so greatly divided as the disciples of the Calvinian Reformation in this country—at least, until of late years; but open war has broken out among them also. I have before me a pamphlet, just issued, entitled, “The Lutheran Church in Paris and Protestant Radical Strasbourg,” by A. Mettetal, pastor, of P

The struggle is really between the principal centres of French Protestant Strasbourg and Paris. In the former of cities Rationalism is gaining greater and greater supremacy. Of this the appointment of Colani as professor of theology is too evident a sign. In Paris, on the contrary, both the Consistory and among the people, Orthodoxy preponderates. Each of these two centres of Lutheranism is accused by the other of exercising an undue sway; Paris reproaches Strasbourg with its encroachments, and Strasbourg makes precisely the same complaint at Paris. Are we, then, to live in a state of perpetual collision?

DEATH OF PASTOR BORREL.

I cannot conclude this letter without paying at least a brief tribute of respect and regret to one of the firmest champions of Orthodoxy—M. Borrel, Pastor and President of the Consistory of Nîmes.

M. Borrel's principles were sound, based upon his firm convictions as a Christian; his zeal was indefatigable; his character was upright and benevolent. He was frequently making researches among our old Protestant annals, and he published some remarkable writings upon the history of the Reformed Church in Nîmes and the South of France. We hoped to have retained him still; but he was but 69 years of age. But God's ways are not our ways. M. Borrel has been removed from this world, leaving a vacant place, which it will be difficult to fill. X. X.

ITALY.

Florence, April 17, 1865.

CIRCULATION OF THE SCRIPTURES.

Several very interesting statistics were recently given at a Bible Society meeting here by Mr. Thomas Bruce, the Italian agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society, in regard to the circulation of the Word of God in this country during 1864. As these have not yet been published, I shall gratify your readers with a resumé.

The London Bible Society, which has done so much for Italy, sold last year, through the agency of thirty-two colporteurs, 17,668 volumes of the Scriptures. When to this is added the sales effected at the various depôts, the total sale for 1864 rises to above 27,000 copies, a considerable advance upon the circulation of the previous year. In addition, a grant of 500 copies was made to Miss Burton, for distribution among the soldiers, and smaller grants were given to Sabbath schools &c., so that the total issues for last year exceeded 28,000 copies.

One thousand copies were sold in Tuscany to the soldiers, and a large number in Genoa to the sailors of the Italian Navy. Miss Burton has been lately induced to extend her colportage and missionary operations to the sea as well as to the land forces of the country, because of the large deputation of sailors which waited on her every other day at Ancona, and urgently begged her to care for their spiritual interests. The greatest facilities have been given by the military authorities generally, and the agents, while residing in the barracks at Ancona, North, and I trust the same privileges extended to her at Genoa, Naples, and the other naval depôts of Italy, when the vessels are in port. Four thousand Scripture is sold at the Florence depôt, and 5,000 in the same place, during 1864, which latter fact is all the more interesting from the circumstance that these Bibles have been scattered over a large part of the country where as yet there are no evangelists. Taking a survey of wide extent; it is worthy of notice that, in proportion to the number of colporteurs, the largest sales have been effected in Piedmont, where the Bible has been selling for the last fifteen years. In general, I believe the colporteurs find much more difficulty in selling the Bible, first, because a large number of the inhabitants are already supplied with a copy in their house; and, secondly, because mere curiosity has now ceased, the purchasers being well aware of what they are buying, buying because they want the Bible. It renders the sale of 27,000 or 28,000 in a last year the more valuable and significant.

THE BIBLE IN THE PROVINCES.

The details connected with the work in various provinces of Italy are also worth mentioning.

VENETIA.—It seems that colportage is strictly prohibited in the Austrian states on the sides of the Adriatic. In ignorance of this fact, a colporteur was sent last spring, and laboured on undisturbed for six months. He was arrested, and the work put a stop to, but not before 500 Bibles and Testaments had been disposed of to the inhabitants of the Venetian district.

SARDINIA.—In this semi-barbarous island, the chief town of which, Cagliari, a most ardent Evangelical Church has been established by Signor Pompeo Rossi, 1,000 Bibles were sold by two colporteurs, one of whom wrought for nine months, and the other during the whole of 1864. A venerable old gentleman, who has laboured much for the spread of the Gospel in Sardinia, was asked, on his recent return from the island, to find the men on board the steamer who were perusing the Bibles which he had sold several months previously.

SICILY.—The people of this island, as well as the other islands in the Bay of Naples, are usually bigoted, so that colportage is not sold on amongst them with the greatest facility. Here is the report of Henry Jones, who visited these parts in September.

On this island, which contains 28,000 souls, the bishop, with his retinue of canons and lower clergy, who together have so much power over the people, that there is not a single person who is not a Roman Catholic. To prove this, I may mention that when the bishop goes out (accompanied by his secretary, who is a priest) to take his usual walk along the road, where, literally, every one passes before sunset, he is saluted by all. Those who are seated in the coffee-houses rise as he passes, and do him homage. The women run to kiss his hand. The priests first touch his hand and then kiss their own, lifting their hats at the same time. As our Saviour said of the Scribes, they "love greetings in the market places." Of the middle classes, numbers have either a priest in the house or a child in the seminary. Of the humbler orders, men and women alike are devoted Romanists. Almost daily the churches are to be seen well frequented by those who go to confess, to hear mass, or to some other ceremony. I could not openly offer my Bibles for sale, and some of those which I was enabled to sell secretly were taken to the priests, who so frightened the purchasers, that they either left them to be destroyed, or came back to me with them, staring wildly, and uttering severe threats. On all sides I was warned to leave the island. Even the Custom-house officers, some of whom were Evangelicals, advised me to go. I went to the Delegato to tell him how I was situated. He himself is favourable to the Gospel, and said he would protect me as far as he could, but that the police were few in number, and the people were all Bourbonists, and so he, too, advised me to go where I should receive a better welcome.

I now left the city, and went to visit the villages among the mountains. I went to Testaccio, and stayed in the house of a shoemaker, Nicola di Costanza, a Neapolitan, who is there on account of his health, and who received me kindly. With him I left my stock of Bibles, and, carrying a few with me, went to other places. The priest was angry with the shoemaker, but the latter stood firm. To conclude, despite the bitter aversion of the people, the seed of the Word of the Lord has been cast into the ground, and we may be sure that He will cause it to take root and grow, and soon we shall see the fruit of it.

There is the ring of the true metal in the writing and action of this intrepid colporteur.

NAPLES.—A little to the north of Naples, at a place called Cervaro, near the Roman frontier, a very curious incident befell a colporteur and a little boy, whom he employed to help him to carry his goods:—

They fell among brigands, and great was their trepidation, when led into the thickest part of the wood, where the leader of the band was, and when all their Bibles and Testaments and their little stock of money were taken from them. The ruffianism of these outlaws has filled the minds of villagers and townsfolk with terror. The little boy tried to make his escape, but was brought back, and suffered with the colporteur all the horrors of an hour's suspense, previous, as they supposed, to being murdered in cold blood, while the chieftain and his men examined the load of Bibles. After a little, however, they were set free; their money, consisting of 26 francs and a few coppers, being restored to them, as well as the stock of Bibles, with the exception of seventeen copies, four of which were many quarters, I may mention, from among many similar instances, these three facts :—

There is a school in the town of Pes—, which has been visited by one or two friends. The teacher is a liberal priest and a reader of the Bible, which he would willingly introduce as a text-book, were it not that all the scholars would be immediately withdrawn. The "Peep of Day," "Line upon Line," and other scriptural works in Italian, are, however, in the hands of the pupils. A Jewish missionary at Tunis lately admitted an Italian as a member of his Church, who attributes his conversion to the purchase of a Bible several years ago at Genoa. Again, a colporteur of the Jewish missionary in Algiers, Mr. Ginsburg, reports having met a Neapolitan sailor one day, who expressed his delight at hearing of the Evangelical work going on in Algiers, and showed the colporteur the Bible which he carried about in his pocket and diligently perused.

I am happy to say that, with such strong encouragement as the above, the British and Foreign Bible Society has increased its staff this year to the number of forty colporteurs. I hope occasionally to acquaint you with some details of the blessed work which is being carried on through their agency in Italy.

DON AMBROGIO IN FLORENCE.

The eccentric priest, Don Ambrogio, of whom I wrote in your March number, is at present in Florence. No one knew that he was in Tuscany till he got into trouble, as he has such a facility of doing, and now all the newspapers of the town are talking of the matter pro and con. He went to hear the most talented and furious of the Lent preachers, in the Church of Santa Maria Novella, last week. On leaving the church amid the crowd of excited Romanists, he must have let fall some observations of dis-union in the world, remarking that for good would be thereby de- moves about, exercising the fit preacher and colporteur at one time to groups of people in vari- and evidently he makes a large writings, by the number of the citizens reading as they walk thoroughfares. I have before me a complete set of these halfpenny fly- drawing of himself or of the Church," represented by a few Bible in one hand, and the cross at the top of the page. One set "Plagues of Italy," the first be King; the second, the monks a third, the celibacy of the priest the retrograde upper clergy. . . consists of handbill dialogue priest of the Italian Church of the Papal Church. The first "principles and rules of the Catholic Italian Church—the true Jesus Christ our Saviour;" the order, the headings of "160,000 Many," "The Brigand Priests," "Confession," &c., &c. They are Turin, and each one closes with private prayer. I wish your admit of extracts. I can assure you that Rome is dealt one hand, in no mincing style the other, it is most gratifying thorough Evangelical soundness captandum documents touching the alone rule of faith, and the Christ as the alone Head of the His atoning sacrifice as the alone hope for sinners in opposition

The disunion existing among the Christians of Italy, coupled, as it has so often been, with much bitterness and evil-speaking, has been frequently the subject of regret on the part of foreigners. Among themselves, if it has not been so much mourned over, it has at least been felt to be a source of weakness, and a great obstacle to the progress of the Gospel, both among the masses and the intelligent portion of the community, who have been driven away by these internecine quarrels. Curiously enough, no fewer than three efforts at a better state of things are now on the tapis. Signor Gavazzi has a long letter, addressed to Dr. de Sanctis, on the subject of a union of Churches, in this week's echo of the Truth.

The Coscienza of Naples contains to-day an invitation and explanation, on the part of the church of Signor De Michelis in Pisa, of the kind of the Free Italian Church, convened on May 16th in Bologna, where, I am sorry to say, that Minetti, the evangelist, has adopted Spiritualist views, to the great detriment of a large congregation. The Nice Committee have been obliged to withdraw salary, and the schoolmistress having been married to Signor Grande, now evangelist at Sienna, the flourishing school, supported by Count Guicciardini, has been closed. A third movement in the same direction has been commenced in Milan, where a so-called first Italian Committee for the Evangelization of Italy," and for the commencement of a theological college, &c., has been constituted, under the patronage of the Rev. Mr. Clark, American missionary, composed of Signors Oddo (who has left the Wesleyan Society), Tacchella, Peccennini, &c. It seems as if these varied independent efforts would only complicate matters still further; but, without prejudging, or entering into details, I thought it well, in a chronicle of passing events, to note the existence of these plans, and shall watch in the future whereunto they grow.

ROMISH PERSECUTION OF THE DYING.

A sensation has been produced in Nice in connexion with the circumstances of the death of a well-known practising physician there, Dr. Francesco Maroncelli. The Waldensian pastor, Signor Pilatte, with whom he was on terms of great intimacy, attended him on his death-bed, and by request of the dying man, presided at the funeral. Sisters of Charity and priests tried to interfere discourteously at the last moments of life, and have, since the death of this eminent Italian patriot, clamoured and railed against the Protestants, whom the deceased had never formally joined. Signor Pilatte has, therefore, published an admirable statement of the case, together with the eloquent address which he uttered at the grave. The matter has, however, caused a great stir and chagrin in the Romanist circles of Nice.

PROPOSED ASSEMBLY OF THE FREE ITALIAN CHURCH.

We are requested by Colonel Cartan to print the following:—

The Free Italian Church which is in Pisa has addressed a circular letter to the sister churches, submitting to them for their acceptance the following articles—viz:—

ART. I.—All the churches which shall assemble in the city of Bologna on the 16th of May, 1865, will have one and the same object—namely, to manifest that brotherhood and unity which already prevail among them, and thus claim, without further doubt or equivocation, the existence of the Free Italian Christian Church.

ART. II.—To that assembly these churches do not be admitted which, though independent, shall not agree to the whole of the following doctrines:—

1. Man is born in sin, incapable of doing good according to the will of God, the child of wrath, under the curse.

2. Salvation comes from the eternal and free will of the Father; it is obtained by the expiation and intercession of the Son; is communicated by the Holy Spirit, who regenerates the sinner, uniting him to Jesus Christ with; and who, coming to dwell in him, produces peace in his heart by the assurance of the full remission of his sins, makes him free, guides and comforts him by the Word which He himself has given, seals him and keeps him for the day of the glorious appearing of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ.

3. The sinner, ransomed at a great price, ought to glorify God in his body and in his spirit, which belong to God, walking in "holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord," and he finds strength to do so in communion with Him who says, "My grace is sufficient for thee."

4. The Christian is liable to commit sin, without, however, falling from grace; and it is contrary to the Holy Scripture to maintain that anyone can be perfect in this world.

5. In conformity to the Word of God, the only rule of faith, it is necessary to admit the universal priesthood of believers, and to recognise the special ministries established by God, according as they are manifested by means of the Holy Spirit.

6. Each church is bound, in obedience to the Holy Gospel, to exercise due discipline, both with respect to the admission of new members, and for the reprehension of sinners who may be found in it.

Accordingly, the representatives of the different churches must, in the first place, declare their adhesion to the foregoing article; not as an exclusive and full confession of faith, but in order to comply with that which is written, "Be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason for the hope that is in you." (1 Peter iii. 15, 16.)

ART. III.—The churches in sending those brethren whom they shall select to give the right hand of fellowship to the sister churches, must take care to furnish them with the requisite documents to prove their identity, and to authenticate their mission. Those cannot comply with this article and the ceiling one will be absolutely excluded.

By order of the Church, signed by The Deacons.

L. Nocchi.	R. Citti.
G. Gherrarducci.	G. Rossi.
The College of Elders.
A. Zaccagnini.	L. Pieri.
L. Bianchi.	P. de Michelis.
G. Cervelli.	Evangelist & Condi

Pisa, 25th March, A. D. 1865.

GERMANY.

Frankfort, April 14, 1865.

A VOTE OF THE GERMANIC DIET.

Since my last letter, the endless question of the Duchies of Schleswig-Holstein has entered into a phase altogether new, which changes the political situation of all Germany. In effect, it is no longer between Prussia and Austria alone that the future destinies of the Duchies are discussed, but between Prussia and the Germanic Diet, to which Austria has avowedly attached itself. At the sitting of the Germanic Diet on the 27th of March, the three Governments of Bavaria, Saxony, and the Grand Duchy of Hesse made this proposition in common: "That the Federal Assembly would express the hope that it will please the Governments of Austria and Prussia to hand over the Duchy of Holstein to the Duke of Augustenburg, to be administered under his own authority." Notwithstanding the opposition of the Prussian envoy, who asked the Assembly to refer the proposition to the Commission for the Duchies—that is to say, to bury it in their portfolios—the Diet decided that a vote upon this proposition should be taken on the 6th of April following. All Germany looked forward to this day with the most lively interest. The decision of the Diet, in fact, must needs have so much the more importance, that Prussia had protested beforehand against what is called the "precipitation" of the Assembly in this matter, and expressed, for the first time officially, its pretensions to the Duchies.

On the 6th of April the majority of the Diet really adopted the proposition of the three Governments. Austria voted with the majority, and declared that it was ready to cede all its rights over the Duchies to the Duke of Augustenburg, provided that the Prussian Government was willing to make the same concession; that in the contrary case, it would retain its rights until the solution of the question in conformity with the interests of Germany. Prussia, which had naturally voted against the proposition, then declared that it would not enter into transaction which had not been preceded by an examination of the titles of all the duchies, including its own titles. It added, in the meanwhile it refuses to consent to "hope" expressed by the Diet.

What, then, after this vote, is the position of Germany? There results from it that the Governments of Vienna and Berlin are in complete disagreement, in the long conferences of their diplomats in order to arrive at an understanding of the question of the Duchies. 2. That Prussia is in open revolt against a decision of the Germanic Confederation, of which it is a part. 3. That it affirms aloud its pretensions to the possession of the Duchies, and against the Diet, against Austria, and against the Duchies themselves. This last consequence has lately received a new and strong confirmation by a declaration of Herr Roon, the Prussian Minister of War, before the Chamber of Deputies, that his Government definitively appropriated to its port of Kiel (Holstein) for its military use. What will the Diet now do, support Austria? It has reserved to itself the right of ulterior decisions. Germany awaits with serious interest.

VON BISMARCK AND LIBERTY.

If Herr von Bismark has thus completely isolated his country from the rest of Germany, he is not at all more happy in the relations of his Government with the Chamber of Prussian Deputies. The discussion of the budget is being carried by a series of votes, which render the situation continually more irreconcilable. The last of these votes was the retrenchment of 31,000,000 of thalers (4,428,571 l.), appropriated to the support of the German press. Everything, therefore, leads us to expect a new rupture, after which the administration of the kingdom will be carried on without a budget regularly voted. This is the twofold situation effected for for Germany by the proud pretensions of a single individual, whose principal end in this is to tread under feet the public liberties of Prussia and of Germany. The means for combating these projects is, on part of the secondary Governments, to restore these liberties. This has been undertaken by Würtemberg, Saxony, and the Grand Duchy of Baden, which have recently removed divers restraints heretofore imposed on the liberty of the press by a decision of Diet, dating from 1854. This is certain, states of the second rank will never rise in presence of the two great powers, but by liberty.

RESTRICTION AND DESPOTISM IN THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.

In the religious world I shall to-day only state some isolated facts, fitted, nevertheless, to characterise the course of the thought activity of parties. Let us begin with a Roman Catholic demonstration. It is announced that the general meetings of societies belonging to this Church will place this year, in the month of September, at Treves. The position of this city, a province of the Rhine causes an expectation of considerable multitudes of priests and laymen, who will flock together from every part of Belgium, and France. To furnish an additional attraction to these meetings, who attend are promised a great exhibition of all the relics contained in the churches of this city. It is known, particularly, that the seamless coat of the Saviour is preserved in the cathedral. When, in 1444, the Archbishop Arnoldi (who is now deceased) made the exhibition of it for the first time to his people, there were found 100,000 superstitious enough to go to their credulity with this imposture. The number may even be exceeded on the next occasion.

The Church of Rome always unites despotism to superstition. A new victim of this system is at this time found in that University of Catholic Theology at Munich. Of late years has occasioned serious indignation to the Roman Curia by its moderate liberal scientific views. This time the author is of a young professor, Dr. Pichler, author of a very remarkable book, entitled "East and West," which is nothing else but a learned history of the schism between the Greek and Roman Churches. There is in it a writer enough truth and justice not to be all the wrong to the Eastern Church. It is, moreover, to that Catholic school which frankly denies the absolute and infallible personal authority of the Pope, contending that his decisions have no force, except they are confirmed by the bishops. He even carries his boldness to the utterance of judgments like this: "In the annals of the Russian [Greek] Church there is nothing like the disgrace of the Saint Bartholemew [massacre]." There was no need at all of so much to make this writer and his book condemned at Rome, where the work was very soon placed in the Index librorum prohibitorum. Some of the journals pretend that Dr. Pichler has submitted himself to the Papal sentence; but the fact is not certain, and in any case, it will not change in the least the personal and generous views of this learned man. Several of his colleagues at the University of Munich are very much suspected at Rome; some have already been the object of repressive measures, as I told you before, with reference to Dr. Froschammer. If the reconciliation of science and faith has always been one of the greatest difficulties of human thought, there is certainly no reconciliation between science and Papal infallibility.

WANT OF SPIRITUAL PROVISION AT BERLIN.

In the Protestant churches it is ever the conflict between Orthodoxy and the diverse tendencies of Rationalism, which comes into broad daylight, even in works altogether practical, and which have for their object the interests of the Church. Thus, I spoke to you in one of my letters of a society which has been formed at Berlin, to remedy the enormous disproportion which exists between the population and the Church's means of edification. A city in which there are parishes of 40,000 and 50,000 souls, having a single church and one sole pastor, it would seem, ought to have listened to the appeals of such a society, and to have furnished it abundantly with the means for accomplishing its object. Instead of this, the society has hitherto been able to collect only 16,000 thalers (2,285*l.*) — that is to say, less than a fourth of what it would require to build a single church. See how the system of National churches kills interest and devotion in the cause of religion. Perceiving this, another association, pertaining to Rationalistic tendencies, has taken the same cause in hand; but despairing of the voluntary principle, it has addressed the municipality, and asked it to build churches, and to create places for pastors, by means of the public funds of the city. Will it better attain the end? We may be allowed to doubt it; for the religious indifference which has been able to hear the preaching of the pure Gospel of Jesus Christ, under the ministry of the pious and eloquent Dr. Schulze. This church has taken a position independent of the State and of the National Establishment, and this will certainly be for it a new cause of prosperity. It bears the name of "Christ Church," and it is to be hoped that it will always justify this beautiful designation.

THE INNER MISSION, AND PUBLIC LECTURES IN DEFENCE OF THE TRUTH.

One of the most cheering aspects of religious life in Germany is the operations of the Inner Mission, which seeks to convey the charitable relief and the consolations of the Gospel to the industrial, poor, and miserable populations of our great cities. But while this spirit of beneficence and of devotedness exerts its activity even among the most degraded classes, it could not forget the superior classes, who often live in ignorance or indifference no less great in regard to Christian truth. In order to respond to these necessities of the most cultivated portion of our population, learned and pious pastors, or professors of our universities, make use abundantly of public lectures, which are generally very well attended. Thus, last winter, three theological professors of the University of Leipsic, Drs. Luthardt, Hahnis, and Brückner, have joined to deliver in that great city, lectures, which this year have been occupied with the great subject which of the day—the Life of Jesus. I mention again the apologetic delivered this winter, at Frankfort by the eloquent Dr. von Zezschwitz. I have already spoken in these Basle, where he has just finished the large hall of the Casino has insufficient, these great assemblies to be transferred to a church, with difficulty contain the crowd. Dr. von Zezschwitz has been appointed professor at the University of Gießen, Grand Duke of Hesse. Besides the good which is done by the discourses, of which a numerous audience receives the impression from the fact that they do it in a manner more laudable than for the most part they are thus put in circulation a multitude of serious ideas, an excellent cultivated minds. You perceive that Germany abounds in learned men who take pleasure in negations of Christianity are to be found others, not less at their side to affirm that times attacks against Christianity to its glory, by raising up for its defenders. And you know to whom they will belong.

AUSTRIA.

PROSECUTION OF "TRUE BELIEVERS."

Under this title, some of the Continental reference to a religious sect which formed under the name of "True Believers."

the court were filled, and the proceedings were followed with deep interest. The President's interrogatories and the answers of the accused were as follows:—

President: What religion are you of?—The accused Scager: I was a Catholic, and did not believe in anything; now I am a true believer.

What do you understand by a true believer?—One who believes in the principles of Jesus Christ, as He taught them, and in accordance with the Old and New Testaments.

Were you aware that the formation and maintenance of new religious sects were not allowed by the State?—I know not why the principles of Jesus Christ himself taught should be forbidden.

You have held meetings?—Yes, Sir.

Where were the members of the sect in the habit of meeting?—Sometimes at my home, sometimes at the home of another member, sometimes in the open air.

What was done at these meetings?—A brother read the Word of God in the Old and New Testaments, and explained it.

How many persons were present at these meetings?—We never counted how many.

Tell us something approaching the number.—From thirty to forty persons.

Have you converted anybody?—Yes, I have converted men who were in sin, and who came to seek me.

What are the ceremonies of your religion?—We have no ceremonies. There is reading of the Word of God, prayer, and singing.

Is it open to anybody to join this association?—No, not while they are living in sin; but men who desire to join are prepared for it; they are examined to ascertain if their heart is true.

Do you believe that a man can perceive if the spirit of another man is pure and without stain?—He should if it not be possible? The magistrate examines me, and yet he is but a man.

Have you the sacrament of baptism?—We perform nothing of baptism as practised in the first day; but we believe in fluvial ablutions, as they were established by God and ratified by John the Baptist.

At what age do you baptize?—When a man is able to think; when he can understand religion, he is able to exercise his will.

Have you the sacrament of the Eucharist?—We have no sacrament. We believe that Jesus Christ did not establish any; but we have a charist.

In what does your Eucharist consist?—We eat bread and wine.

Who administers the Eucharist?—A brother.

You ought to know that the State does not tolerate a sect which is not authorised?—The Emperor has proclaimed liberty of conscience and belief.

True. But in that liberty are included only the religions recognised by the State.—Our religion is the pure doctrine of Jesus Christ.

How many members are there in your association?—I shall not tell you, for if I did, I should be a traitor, and should sin against God.

To submit to the authorities is not to be a traitor. Do you not suppose that the authorities are established by God and the State?—Oh! yes.

Why, then, are you unwilling to give them information?—Because we are aware what is the object sought, and we do not wish to expose our brethren to persecution.

Do you not believe in the justice of your judges?—The apostles have written, No man can be just.

Does that rule apply to the members of your association?—They ought to be just, for they ought to be without sin.

The utterance of these simple and energetic replies very much impressed the judges as well as the audience.

The accused Strill replied very much in the same spirit.

The President: Where do you hold your meetings?—Strill: There is no fixed place for that purpose.

Why do you not have a fixed place?—In order to withdraw ourselves from persecution.

You are aware, then, that you are doing wrong, and that you ought not to do so?—It is written, "If they persecute you in one city, flee to another."

Have you never been in trouble with the authorities?—Yes; I did not think proper to baptize my child; but, by order of the authorities, the Piarists (a religious order) took it, and I believe that they baptized it; I was not present.

Why should you refuse to have your child baptized?—Because a child can neither think nor will.

Your conduct brings you under legal penalties.—Our Lord Jesus Christ never sinned, and yet He was crucified. Following His sublime example, I shall persevere, and I shall have patience. The Word and the pure doctrine of Jesus Christ must triumph in the end.

Scager was sentenced to three weeks' imprisonment, with a scanty allowance of food, and Strill to the same punishment for a fortnight.

HOLLAND.

CONFLICT BETWEEN EVANGELISM AND RATIONALISM IN THE WALLOON CHURCH.

The address or petition which we this month bring before our readers as having recently been presented to the reverend Consistory or Presbyteral Court of the Walloon or French Protestant Church at Amsterdam, may surely be regarded as one of the "signs of the times" in reference to doctrinal differences and ecclesiastical struggles in the Low Countries. The answer has not been as yet printed, but sent privately to each one of the seventy-six petitioners. It is said to be at once full and faithful, and our correspondent promises, if it is not entirely fenced as a privileged and private communication, to put us in possession of it as speedily as possible. He remarks, in a 2507., in one of the most expensive capitals of Europe. The hearts of all the faithful ministers and members of the French Reformed Church of Holland are, just at this moment, gladdened by a striking proof of the power of conscience in the case of one who was a kind of Coryphæus among the liberal party. The Rev. Dr. Pierson, of Rotterdam (the name indicates British descent; and oh! let the fact of his resignation suggest sincere supplications, even in Britain, at the throne of grace in his behalf), has followed the example of Mr. Busken Huet, of Haarlem, and resigned his pastorate, feeling that the retention of his office was incompatible with his present views; in one word, that his position was untenable. He was a child of many prayers, and a youth of fairest promise—he was taught the principles of the Christian religion from a catechism drawn up by the present venerable Dean of Newry, Daniel Bagot—and we know that he who taught him hopes yet to hear of him as brought, through the power of God's grace, to preach the faith he has recently been seeking to destroy; and to know, for his own soul's comfort, that 'Christ crucified,' while to the Jew a stumbling block, and to the Greek foolishness, is to them that are saved 'Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God':—

TO THE REVEREND CONSISTORY OF MINISTERS, ELDERS, AND DEACONS OF THE WALLOON CHURCH AT AMSTERDAM.

We, the undersigned, members of the Walloon congregation at Amsterdam, constrained by a lively feeling of interest in the prosperity of that Church, which is a memorial of the piety of our ancestors and of the hospitality of the any longer disregarded, deem of great weight, and deserving consideration of your reverend much as this growing disregard of our Church, and to accelerate the amalgamation of its members with the Church. Espousing from a full and clear principles, be it far from us to moment the right of those who choose we do, to the choice of pastors a heart; yea, rather would we help any ordinary difficulty arise in the ministers' minds—to get the applied; and this with all possible for their spiritual necessities; but hand, do we claim, and with a full we have a right to press the claim respect be paid to our convictions and ardour evidenced, in matters of religion and service, to meet our wishes.

The happy application of that position which marks the choice of the Dutch Church seems to us in worthy of your imitation, and desire that this very same toleration in the filling up of the present Walloon congregation. The spirit and the claim in any degree to lose science, in the exposition of a creed us to be decidedly contradictory spirit and first principles of Protestantism.

We are of opinion that such feelings congenial to the system of that Christendom which holds the inner mother church, and that we should such the lamentable benefits which rogative seeks to secure. More has long gone by, since, in this narrow interpretation of the synod the sense of the old formularies of Churches, which have no longer has been enforced. And arbitrary in this respect, would be nothing a calling back of the disastrous differences at the commencement of the last century, when a lamentable period of the Reformed Church in ed them with the full utterance of their voice. And now, in the present day, very same church, very second-rate, but maintainers of the favoured held by the Consistory, are permitted to the pulpit; while excellent men, how meritorious they may be, are denied this primarily because they hold liberal opinions. Before give utterance to our wish that this bearable state of things may exist no

And, in the last place, the undersigned, of the necessity that the present condition of the Church, in the matter at least, of the pastors, should give way to a state not so fundamentally faulty, ask the our reverend Consistory to hasten on the when Article 23 of the Synodal Rules acted upon. We are convinced that this way can the services of the sanctuary be duly and honourably regulated; and we that, by this means, a great step will be taken to allay any well-founded apprehensions.

We hope that the present committee, the disposition of which towards the congregation whose representative it is not) has so long been described by one of its most devoted members, will continue its efforts to obtain from the Synod a favourable adjustment of this matter, already too long procrastinated.

The undersigned would combine their several wishes, requesting from the reverend Council of the double Consistory—1st. That, at the approaching election of a minister, the wants and wishes of the liberal party, for edification, be not overlooked. 2nd. That the same consideration for their feelings be shown in the choice of those ministers who may be invited, from time to time, to take an occasional service in the pulpit. 3rd. That all possible exertions be made to remove out of the way every difficulty in carrying out the requirements of the Article 23 of the Synodal Rules.

Penetrated with a sense of the righteousness of our cause, we appeal finally to the equity of our brethren. We gladly cherish the hope that the decision of the reverend Council will be characterised by impartiality and true Christian forbearance; and whatever may be the issue of our exertions, we shall, as regards ourselves, have the satisfaction of knowing that we have made an effort to stay the gradual decay of a Church to which, by bonds of filial and fond attachment, our hearts closely cling.

Signed by seventy-six members in full communion with the Church.

TURKEY.

Constantinople, April 13, 1865.

CRISIS IN THE AFFAIRS OF THE PROTESTANT CIVIL COMMUNITY.

It is well known that the Constitution of the Turkish Empire requires every non-Christian subject to be a member of some of the regularly-constituted rayah communities. A rayah may now be a Catholic, Armenian, or Protestant, as he may choose; but he must be something. In the Turkish Empire, and other old communities, the secular and ecclesiastical organizations are

The Greek Patriarch is at once the head of the Greek Church and the civil head of the Greek nation, in Turkey. Nearly apart from religion is an idea which is just beginning to dawn upon the minds of the people in Turkey; so every Greek is, in things spiritual and things temporal, under the Greek Patriarch in Constantinople.

This gives the Patriarch almost unlimited power to persecute his people.

To avoid such a crushing persecution, the aid of Lord Cowley, the Protestant Consul, was obtained, and the Protestants were formed into a separate community in 1840. In this community, however, a principle was inaugurated. The head of the community was a layman, and had no ecclesiastical authority. If religious liberty had been obtained within the old communities, it would have been better for them to remain there; but as it was, the formation of a new community was the alternative to absolute annihilation.

There seems to be the same necessity for maintaining this organization. It is perhaps even more imperative, for its fall would be regarded, not unfairly, as the final fall of Protestantism in Turkey. But the real value of the community must, of course, depend, to a great extent, upon the character of the Vakeel, or head of community, who is appointed by the Porte.

The present incumbent is Stepan Effendi, who has held the office since the formation of the community. He was formerly regarded as a very trustworthy, although not a very strong-minded man. But of late years his mind seems to have become weaker, and he has fallen almost entirely under the influence of his son, who is not a Protestant, but a nominal Catholic, and a very bad man. During these years, the civil organization has been an obstacle to the progress of Protestantism, and the people, finding their business neglected, have refused to pay their taxes to Stepan Effendi, hoping thus to compel his resignation. But in vain; under the influence of his son and others, who use him for their own purposes, he has clung to his office, until his arrears of salary have reached the sum of, say, 7000*l.* sterling. The people can never raise this sum at once, and he can never be removed until provision is made for its payment. Trusting to the liberality of friends in England and America, the American Mission advanced this sum two months ago, to secure the voluntary resignation of Stepan, known to the missionary body, please address him a reply.—Yours, &c.,

(Signed)

JOHN P. BROWN.

[Translation of Aali Pasha's Note enclosed.]

TO MONSIEUR MORRIS, MINISTER RESIDENT, U.S.A., ETC.

Sublime Porte, Ministry of Foreign Affairs,

April 2, 1865.

Monsieur the Minister Resident.—The Sublime Porte is informed that certain foreign missionaries are seeking to assemble the members of Protestant communities, with the design of making a demonstration to compel a change in the civil head of that community.

I need not observe to you, Monsieur Minister Resident, that the interference of foreign priests in the affairs of a community composed exclusively of subjects of his Majesty the Sultan can never be allowed by the Sublime Porte, and the purely civil or temporal object in respect to which they are acting can only be accomplished by the intervention of the authorities of the country. Consequently, I beg you, Monsieur Minister Resident, to recommend to these American Protestant missionaries to abstain from meddling in this affair.—Receive, &c.,

(Signed)

AALI.

A similar letter was addressed to Mr. Stuart, with the change of a single word, English being inserted in place of American missionaries. Mr. Stuart also received and communicated to Mr. Washburn a still sharper warning, much more specific in its character.

The following reply was made to Mr. Stuart and to Mr. Morris :—

TO THE HONOURABLE E. JOY MORRIS, MINISTER RESIDENT, U.S.A.

Constantinople, April 5, 1865.

Sir,—I beg to acknowledge, with thanks, the receipt of yours of this morning's date, with a presented to be responsible for one year the money and paid the expenses, disclaimed any desire to control the Vakeel. From that day to this we laboured to persuade the people to pay taxes regularly for the support of the head. For some ten years we aid year with funds collected from five years ago we gave them notice that we could furnish the money, as we wished to have with their civil affairs.

Stepan Effendi, however, failing the necessity for such action on mandated that his salary should be the missionaries; if it were not, he to perform the duties of his office. refused to do this, and continue the people the necessity of supporting themselves.

During these five years the community has been almost destitute of attempts of Stepan Effendi to co-operate with the missionaries to become responsible for the community. Much of the time the business of the community has been neglected, and the people, wrong on this account, have refused to pay taxes. Three years ago, however, we adopted a certain plan, proposed by the nation for arranging the affairs of the community, on condition of his receiving a salary. At the request of the Prot the sum necessary was raised and by the English and American missionaries no sooner had he received the apparently under the influence of an adviser, he violated his word as to the whole arrangement. Much since that date his office has been

But about three months ago I came, unasked, of his own accord individuals, saying: "I wish to resign. I am old. I need my rest. I wish to leave my post honourably."

and wrote a note to the "notables" of the community, of which the following is a translation:—

'Beloved Brethren,—You are already well acquainted with the present condition of the Protestant Chancery. I cannot endure that condition any longer. My debts are daily increasing, and in my present advanced stage of life I am in great distress. I therefore appeal to your friendly kindness that you would kindly undertake to deliver me from this condition. I inform you that I am ready to resign my office, and in old age to retire to private life, if my claims on the treasury are paid to me.—With love,

(Signed) "STEPAN SEROPIAN,
"Vakeel of Protestant Community.

"February 6, 1865."

It was agreed by these "notables" that he should ask the appointment of Boghos Effendi, Adrianople, in his place, as temporary makam, until the people could nominate one to the Porte as permanent Vakeel.

Under these circumstances, we were willing to advance the money necessary to secure this effect, provided these changes could be actually accomplished before the money was paid. This was necessary, not from any desire on our part to control the Protestant community; but because Stepan Effendi had before violated his duty under similar circumstances; and because of the distinct declaration of the friends in England and America, who had formerly aided the community, that they would not advance their aid to the Protestant community until its affairs had been finally and satisfactorily settled.

Stepan Effendi had proposed this condition as the first place. He still agreed to it, but he insisted that a promise to this effect should be given him in writing by a rayah. He suggested Mr. Harootun Minasian as satisfactory to him. Although this person had no connection with or interest in this money, he consented to act as a mutual friend in an arrangement which was certainly not less desirable for Stepan Effendi than for the Protestant community.

The following papers were exchanged between them:—

PAPER GIVEN BY STEPAN EFFENDI TO MR. HAROOTUN.

"I have summed up the claims of myself and my secretary Mooses to February 28, 1865. The amount is 77,125 piastres. Of this I shall receive 55,000 piastres, when, after having resigned my office, I shall have established Boghos Effendi, as temporary Kaimakan, in my place, under the Porte. For 18,125 piastres I am to receive two bonds from Minasian Harootun, printer. I am to receive, also, a certificate for 4,000 piastres more, by which I shall obtain money from the nation and pay it to Mooses—as borrowed of him by me.

(Signed) "STEPAN SEROPIAN,
"Vakeel of Protestant Community.

"February 15, 1865."

PAPER GIVEN BY HAROOTUN TO STEPAN EFFENDI.

The object of this paper is to state that on the 30th of Ramazan, 1281, 55,000 piastres in gold and two bonds, one for 9,237½ piastres, the other for 8,887½ piastres (in a bag with Stepan Effendi's seal), were deposited with me, in behalf of the nation, and are in my possession as a pledge for the claims of Stepan Effendi, Vakeel, and his secretary, Mooses, for balance of salaries due them, subject to this agreement, that whenever, within six months, reckoning from to-day, Stepan Effendi shall have resigned his office, and shall have caused Boghos Effendi, of Adrianople, to be appointed in his place, the 55,000 piastres and the two bonds in my possession shall, without fail, be delivered to him by me. If this agreement be not carried out, and the six months shall pass, this money shall be restored to the individuals who have given it to me, and this paper will be void.

(Signed) "HAROOTUN MINASIAN.

"Feb. 15, 1865."

As Stepan Effendi expressed a wish to see and count this money, and put his seal on the bag, he came to my office and did so, knowing that, if this arrangement were completed, this money was to be furnished by friends in England and America, as a free gift, to relieve the Protestant community from its embarrassments and from all need of farther foreign aid.

That the money might be perfectly safe until Stepan Effendi should have fulfilled the above conditions, I returned it to my safe, whence it came, and gave to Mr. Harootun the following paper as security to him:—

"Constantinople, Feb. 16, 1865.

"Received from Harootun Minasian, printer, a deposit of 625 Napoleons (sealed by Stepan Agha), to be delivered to him whenever Stepan Effendi shall have resigned and secured the appointment of Boghos Effendi, of Adrianople, in his place as head of the Protestant community, provided that this be accomplished within six months of the above date. After that date this paper will have no value.

(Signed) "GEORGE WASHBURN."

Up to this time it was supposed that Stepan was acting in perfect good faith, as the arrangement had been originally proposed by him, and he had all along expressed his satisfaction with it. But it would appear that in his old age he had become a tool in the hands of bad men, for, having secured the above bond from Mr. Harootun, he suddenly changed his tone, and declared that he had no intention of fulfilling these conditions, although of his own making, but would take the money in spite of us, without resigning at all.

He declared in our book-store that his Highness Aali Pasha had united with him to destroy the Protestant community and drive the missionaries from the country. Of course this was as false as possible, and he appears to have told his Highness equally false stories in reference to us.

Stepan Effendi has since instituted the most oppressive and vexatious proceedings against Mr. Harootun, who is thus suffering, as a perfectly innocent man, for an act of friendship. If any wrong has been done in reference to this money, he has not done it. It rests either upon Stepan Effendi or upon me. I leave it to your judgment to decide between us.

His Highness Aali Pasha, in his note, refers especially to a supposed purpose of ours to make a public demonstration against Stepan Effendi. I am very happy to be able to assure you that his Highness has been deceived in this matter. We have never so much as dreamed of such a thing.

and we consequently deny his charge as totally unfounded. The particular meeting to which he may have had reference—the only one I have heard of—was not planned by any missionary, nor was any foreigner present at it, or in any way connected with it.

It was not organised by our advice, nor did we know anything about it until after it had been decided by an assembly of the Protestant "notables" that such a meeting should be held.

I am sure that if these facts are made known to his Highness, he will rejoice in the opportunity of withdrawing the charge which he has been led by incorrect information to make against us. It is our purpose so to conduct ourselves in this country, where we live under the august protection of his Imperial Majesty the Sultan, that the Turkish authorities can have no occasion for complaint against us. We should regard any unfriendly controversy with the Porte as a positive calamity.

With your permission, I shall send a copy of this letter to the Honourable William Stuart, Her Britannic Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at the Porte, with whom, also, his Highness Aali communicated in reference to this question.

I remain, &c., on behalf of the American missionaries,

(Signed)

(GEORGE WASHBURN.)

It should be added here that Aali Pasha, deceived by the representations of Stepan Effendi, attempted to seize this money and pay it over to Stepan Effendi, on the absurd ground that the conditions of the bond were such as Mr. Harootun had no right to make, and, consequently, that Stepan Effendi could take the money without reference to any conditions. Finding that the money was beyond his reach, in the hands of an American citizen, he turned Mr. Harootun over to the Criminal Court, which, on the same ground, was proceeding to condemn him in a summary manner, when Mr. Stuart interposed, and represented the case in its true light to Aali Pasha. Mr. Harootun was released, and the whole affair now seems likely to have a most favourable result.

It has been my unpleasant duty in months past to criticise the course of the British Embassy in reference to religious liberty and Protestantism in Turkey. It therefore gives me double pleasure to be able now to say that Mr. Stuart, H.B.M. Chargé d'Affaires, has acted in a manner worthy of the nation which he represents. Although he has been placed in a difficult and delicate position, he has from the first commanded the respect and the full confidence of all. Without going back to the difficulties of last year, in the settlement of which so much is due to him, I can hardly hesitate to say that, in this present difficulty, his presence here, as Chargé d'Affaires, has saved the Protestant community in Turkey from destruction.

Ali Pasha has now given his word that he will carry out the wishes of the community in respect to their Vakeel, and I am informed that he will immediately call the "notable" of the community, to learn from them directly what they wish.

It would have been more agreeable to my feelings to pass over in silence this discreditable affair. But I believe that it should be the fundamental principle of Protestant missions to conceal nothing from the Christian world, simply because it will try the faith of Christians, or produce an unpleasant impression.

The faith of the Church will never rise to its proper level, unless it comprehends the trials and difficulties of its missionaries, as well as their joys and successes. It is a fact, too, that the spiritual work among the Armenians in Turkey has never been so full of promise as it is to-day.

PERSECUTION OF CHRISTIAN TURKS AT DIARBEEKIR.

I learn from the American missionaries in Mesopotamia that a sad case of religious persecution has occurred at Cutterbul, on the Tigris, opposite Diarbekir. For some years past, two men have been living in Cutterbul unmolested, who were formerly Mohammedans, but had become Protestant Christians. They made no secret of their change of faith. The first of these, named Farho, is by birth a Koordish Moslem, of one of the villages near Liga. Some six years ago he began regularly to attend the Protestant place of prayer at Cutterbul. He was advised to go to some place where he could profess Christianity with safety to himself, but he declined, saying, "No! Here I found Christ, and here I will confess Him, and let befall me what may befall, God is great." The missionaries believed him to be a true Christian. After the official persecution of Christian Turks in Constantinople, last year, this man was seized, taken to the barracks of the Nizam, and there treated with great cruelty. It was claimed that three years ago the lot was drawn for him (his whereabouts being unknown) by another man, but that till now they had been unable to find him. Having been found, he must now enter the ranks as a soldier. Even if this were all true, of which there is no probability, it would yet remain that he had already been a Protestant three years when the lot was drawn, and six years when it was enforced, while as a Christian he was not liable to military conscription at all. He suffered terrible beatings every day at the racks in Diarbekir, until at last he was it away to Erzingan; since which time no rd, no report, no letter, has come from him, and his friends have not a doubt that he has n killed.

The other man, named Tamo, was a native Cutterbul, and had been an open and well-own Protestant for three years. He was ed about the same time as Farho, and en to the Pasha's palace, where he was ed to the lot for the military conscription. was of no avail that he declared that for ee years he had not been a Moslem, but a istian. He was compelled to enter the ka. He, too, was beaten much, but would give up his Christianity. He was finally t to Erzingan, but there seems to be posi- proof that he died before reaching there. It is true that in both these cases every- g was done under cover of and within letter of the law of conscription; but y are none the less, as we fear, cases of berate official murder, for the crime of pting Protestantism.

ICONOCLASTS IN SMYRNA.

A very interesting case of image breaking ired not long ago in Smyrna, which is ly to have considerable influence upon Armenian Church in Turkey. In Smyrna, ewhere, the Armenians of the old Church divided into two classes, the "enlightened" the "conservatives." This latter class a favour of adhering strictly to the old oms of the Church, while the former is vour of purifying it, and bringing it into brimity with the Bible. These "en- tened" Armenians comprise, of course, ous grades and kinds of enlightenment. e are in favour of simple, pure Biblical istianity; others, familiar with French ature, are followers of Renan and the onalists; others are simply in favour of ating civil from religious authority, and ming the former to laymen; but they agree in making war upon the conser- ve party.

he "conservatives" wished to set up : the altar of the Armenian church in rma the figure of an angel. The "en- tened" opposed the project, as leading to try; but, in spite of their opposition, a y image was made and put up in the ch. A man of the "enlightened" party, seems to have acted conscientiously, ag that the putting up of such an image he church was an offence to God, after ding a whole night in prayer, deter- d to destroy it. He entered the church, in the early morning, with the bell-ringer, there being no other person present, except an old woman, with candles to sell, and drawing out his yatagan, he literally hewed the image to pieces and scattered the frag- ments over the floor. He then left the church unmolested.

When the people assembled for their morning service the sight of the mutilated image caused intense excitement, and for a time a collision between the parties was apprehended; but this unfortunate result was happily avoided. The iconoclast was arrested, but very soon set at liberty again, and the war was transferred to the Armenian news- papers and Church councils.

The whole subject of images and pictures has received a very thorough discussion, and it is said that the majority of the General Council of the Armenian Church at Constanti- nople are in favour of issuing an order for- bidding the use of either pictures or images in the churches. For the sake of calming down the intense excitement, the whole subject has been referred to the Catolicos of Etchmiadzin, who is the spiritual head of the Armenian Church. No attempt has been made to replace the image destroyed in the church at Smyrna, and the opposition to this form of idolatry has been very much strengthened among the people there. It is even proposed to remove the few pictures which are now in the church.

DEDICATION OF A NEW PROTESTANT CHURCH IN CONSTANTINOPLE.

Some three weeks since a new Protestant church was completed at Hasskuey, a suburb of Constantinople, on the Golden Horn. The church was erected by contributions from Rev. Dr. Hamlin and Mr. S. M. Minasian. These gentlemen were engaged during the Crimean war in supplying the English hospitals with bread, &c. Dr. Hamlin's philanthropic labours in behalf of the Eng- lish soldiers here are well known in England. It may not be as well known that he devoted all the profits derived from his contracts to the building of Protestant churches in Turkey. On account of a long and vexa- tious lawsuit, in reference to the land on which the church is built, the money proved insufficient, and the church was com- pleted by the American Mission. The de- dicatory services were conducted by Rev. Dr. Hamlin, the venerable Dr. Goodell, and Pastor Simon, of the native Protestant church in Pera. They were of great interest, and the Church was crowded by a native congregation.

Basil Missionary Society. Speaking of the work of himself and his brethren, Mr. Müller writes: "The masses around us are friendly disposed, and listen to the preaching of the Gospel without much opposition; but we want an outpouring of the Spirit from on high upon ourselves, our churches, and the heathen."

APPEAL TO ENGLISH LADIES.

Not much accustomed to read newspapers, and having had still less practice in writing, and in expressing myself in words fit to appear before the eyes of the public, it is only with a throbbing heart and a trembling hand that I, the simple wife of a German missionary at Tellicherry, in Malabar, try to interest those not personally known to me for one branch of the Lord's work going on here amongst us. If you look at my words, there will be many reasons to treat the writer with much indulgence. Still, I believe that the Lord, to whom we trust, will bring the words, and the intreaty they contain, to many a heart; so that our wants will be supplied, and our poor widows and their fatherless children, for whom I now appeal, may again see that their God cares for the forsaken, and gives the daily bread to all those who believe in Him. It is, perhaps, necessary to give, in a few words, some account of the Lord's work on this coast. It was in the year 1839 that here in Tellicherry the first small congregation was gathered and cared for by Mr. Gundert. Two years afterwards, (1841) Mr. Hehich began his work at Cannanore. Almost at the same time, in Calicut, Chombala, and Paulghaut, small flocks gathered, and many, formerly the unhappy slaves of sin and darkness, began to rejoice, freed from the bondage of Satan, and made the happy children of the one living God. But our small infant churches had to struggle much to get their daily bread. All those who joined the Lord's people had to forsake everything they possessed, glad to escape, their poor children, and their twenty children, have been gathered near Cannanore, and our committee pay their expenses. One of them is stationed there. The women do different works, and earned rupees. But their expenses amount to more than they receive; and on account of this our society is in with were told that they could not these poor women, but wish to do so. They promise, however, of 3,000 rupees to the asylum laid up as a fund for the widows only must be spent for their interest, together with the committee, give an income of 650 rupees which the asylum cannot be weeks ago the missionaries of gether here to give a careful subject. They resolved to given by our committee as They opened a subscription and will make a collection in But they find that without English friends they will ne Müller has been entrusted with these widows; and considering get the money, we have to see poor women, and knowing to tions they would be exposed overcame my reluctance, and culty before you. Looking at our faith is almost failing; upon the Lord, who is rich hands are not shortened, an hearts of His children willing in Him, that also in this ca forsake us nor our poor women gathered from among the heat company these simple words, the hearts and the hands of those who have found a resting-place who pray for the coming of Jesus who, for His sake, interest

Khiva, and Bokhara. These countries affect the productions of India and the manufactures of Europe, and export the yield of their own soil and climate, that they may obtain them in exchange. The Lohanis are the great carriers. Before the mountain passes between Ghizni and the Indus are blocked up by snow, they come down in vast caravans of several thousands, the whole tribe moving on dromedaries, men, women, children, and cattle, their goods being placed on camels and onies. They arrive at Mooltan in October and November, bringing raw silk, goats' wool, camels' hair, goods, furs, &c. Some of the caravans proceed in advance to Delhi and the Gangetic provinces; but others remain at Mooltan, and dispose of their goods to native agents, who forward them to Hindustan. The Affghan traders make up their investments at Mooltan during the cold season, and the return caravans arrive from Hindustan in April, when they all return to Afghanistan. Of the wealth of these Lohanis some idea may be formed from the following statement, stated by Sir B. Frere, when Commissioner of Sindh: "I have heard of the wife of an eminent merchant of this tribe, whose husband had been detained at Delhi longer than he expected, offering the Kaffila-bashee (head of the caravan) demurrage at the rate of 10,000 rupees a-day to defer the upward march of the caravan, and enable her husband to rejoin, as she knew, if left behind, she would be unable to follow them through the passes, except at great risk to his life, and the property he might have with him." Thus, at all these Punjab stations the missionaries meet with men of various races, and they are thus preparing for future missionary efforts in countries which are not yet accessible. It would be a rash attempt if our missionaries were as yet to enter Cabul with the intention of doing the work of evangelists; although they cannot enter the country the Affghans, the Affghans come to them. And now another and more distant nation comes forth from the deep recesses of Asia, and, by its representatives at Peshawur, implored for help. The Rev. W. Handcock, one of the Church missionaries at that station, forwarded the following intelligence:—"Last month I had to record the deeply-interesting interviews with the prime minister of the Ameer of Cabul, and his acceptance for him and the Ameer of copies of the sacred Scriptures. This day I have to mention visits received from four inquirers from Kafiristan, a country beyond the mountains north of Cabul. Its name Kafiristan, "land of infidelity," has been given to their country by the neighbouring Muslims in consequence of the rejection of Mohammedanism by its inhabitants. They are, however, not ashamed of their name, for when speaking of themselves they use the term "Kafir." It is remarkable that, though their territory is surrounded by powerful enemies, it is not known ever to have been conquered. Historians even say that Tamerlane, who subdued the empires between the Hellespont and Central India, retired baffled in his attempt to overcome the people of this kingdom. Though the language of the Kafirs is quite distinct from those spoken at Peshawur, yet one of the four visitors has been some little time in the country, and, having mixed with the Affghans, is able to make himself understood in Pushtoo; and it is through the medium of this man, named Gara, that we are able to hold intercourse. He is about thirty years of age, and is a man possessed of much intelligence. His appearance is rather striking. He is of middle stature, firmly, but not clumsily built, with blue eyes, and a complexion as fair as a European. He says that the people in his country, who dress in the skins of goats, live by cultivating the soil. They worship the stone image of a god named Addrakpanow. Before this idol they offer goats in sacrifice, throwing the blood on the image. Beyond this they seem to have few religious ceremonies; and, possessing no written language, they have not an elaborate system of worship, like that of the Hindu.

The Kafir who gives this information and his companions show every desire to hear the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ. They manifest their wish to receive instruction in Christianity by proposing to remain a few days in Peshawur, and to embrace every opportunity of gaining information respecting those things which belong to their eternal peace.

A few days afterwards a missionary mentions the departure of these Kafirs, adding:—

During the time that they have been with us they have displayed great eagerness to hear of Christ. And one result, by the blessing of God upon His word, has been, that their confidence has been shaken in their own idolatry. They have, moreover, invited us to commence a mission amongst their countrymen, assuring us that a messenger with such glad tidings would be well received. They themselves are returning home, resolved that henceforth they will not bow the knee to Addrakpanow, but that they will serve Him "who has put away sin by the sacrifice of himself."

We hope and pray that they may reach their country in safety. If they are detected as Kafirs when passing through Mohammedan Cabul, they will either be put to death, or after being most barbarously treated, they will be doomed to perpetual slavery. In consequence of these dangers, two of them will travel, in disguise, as fakirs, and the other two will travel by night and hide during the day.

It is gratifying at this time to see the missionary zeal of our own native Christians. Two of them, Jonah Messeech and Fazl-i-Hukk, have offered, in the face of so many dangers, to accompany the Kafirs and share their lot.

Kafiristan is one of those countries of the great Asiatic continent respecting which little comparatively is known; nor did it appear at first where recent and reliable informa-slopes of the Hindu Koosh, divided into a number of independent states, all lying to the north of and between the Cabul river and the Indus. Of these, Kafiristan—a word derived from the Arabic Kāfir, “unbeliever,” and the Persian participle, istan, “a place or station,” is one. On its north boundary lie the Usbek states of Kunduz and Badakhshan; to the south it is separated from the Cabul river by certain districts of Afghanistan; to the east lie Chitral and Kashgar; and on the west it is bounded by mountains and the Panjshar river, which separates it from the Kohistan, or highlands of Cabul. It is a country of ridges and steep spurs of the Hindu Koosh, enclosing “narrow and fertile valleys, descending in terraces towards the Cabul river and the Indus, in a north-east and south-west direction.”

All around this home of the Si’ah-posh Kafirs, or Blackclad unbelievers (so called from the black goatskin garments which they wear), Mohammedanism prevails. Kashgar, Kunduz, Afghanistan, the petty states north-west of Peshawur—all have been Mohammedanised; while Kafiristan stands forth like an island amidst the surrounding deluge. The Kafirs, by their own account, are divided into eighteen tribes, of which ten retain their ancient faith, and observe their former customs. Of the remaining eight, one whole tribe has been proselytised to a lax Mohammedanism; four more have been, for the most part, so, but not entirely; while, of the remaining four, only a few have changed their faith. Fourteen of the tribes may now none of their enemies—save for period, and then only in far numbers—have been able to oppose success.”

On the day following the great annual festival, bands with the object of making Mohammedan territories. The bard, stimulates the assembly by deeds of their ancestors, chiefs distinguished themselves utter their harangues, and the warriors set f

These forays are simply wrongs which they have suffered from Mohammedans, who continually enter their territory, for the purpose of carrying off slaves and cattle.

Captain Raverty concludes his following paragraphs:—

In summing up the character of this race, a highly-interesting remark that they appear by all accounts from the descriptions of their enemies to be of a merry and sociable disposition, quick to anger, are as easily appeased, and are not at all susceptible to a fault, they treat their enemies kindly than brothers. Even to allow that they are as sincere in their enmity, are faithful in their promises, and hold boasting, lying, in sovereign contempt.

Lieutenant Wood, in the introduction to “A Journey to the Oxus,” remarks of them (in which I most cordially agree) “they resemble Europeans, in their great intelligence, and from all I have heard of them, I consider they offer more promise for missionary exertion than is to be found elsewhere on the continent of Asia.”

their own remote land. Their commission is, at the present time, to act more as pioneers than as permanent residents. This perilous journey has been undertaken in response to the invitation given by certain natives of Kafiristan, as before narrated. Let it be remembered that the Si'ah-posh regard the Affghans as their most relentless foes. They sometimes enter into a truce of friendship with the people of Badakshan and Chitral, when they exchange weapons, and, until these are returned, they remain at peace; but with the more cruel and bigoted Affghans this is rarely done. Yet, here are two Affghans—men who, had they remained Mohammedans, might have headed a predatory party into Kafiristan—at the peril of their lives venturing thither on a mission of mercy, desiring, after the example of their great Master, not to destroy men's lives, but to save them. Surely friends at home will not fail to help forward this deeply-interesting movement by their prayers.

AMERICA.

New York, April 10, 1865.

THE GREAT FEDERAL VICTORIES: TONE OF THE PUBLIC MIND ON THE OCCASION.

Two months ago I ventured to express to you the first hope of peace which our people had begun to indulge since this fearful war began. At that time, like weary sailors, we thought we scented the odours of the unseen land. But now we see land. It comes out plain and clear, like a bold promontory under a lifting fog. A week ago to-day the news came that, after masterly manœuvring and brave fighting, our troops had compelled the enemy to evacuate, first Petersburg, and then Richmond, and that the Union forces occupied both those cities. New York was agitated with excitement. In Wall-street all business was suspended. Men swarmed and thronged like bees along the sidewalks. Soon Wall-street was filled. Enthusiastic speeches were delivered from the steps of banks and the public buildings; and at about three o'clock P.M., after successful telegrams had confirmed and expanded the statements of the decided success, the multitude, then many thousands in number, came forth in that same Christian strain which, as I wrote you, acknowledged in the Cooper Institute the news of Mr. Lincoln's election:—

Praise God from whom all blessings flow!

A scene was never witnessed in a marketplace before. No Christian church, even, was ever filled with such a volume of praise as the church could contain such a congregation. The substantial, resonant harmony rose up into the chambers of the tall banking houses like the roar of the elements. The multitude itself was moved to the deepest emotion.

All through the uncovered multitude were weeping while they sang. When the solemn strain was ended, some individuals, who were less devout than the rest, attempted to unite the assemblage in some of the current patriotic airs. But the attempt quite failed, until at length the sentiment inspired by "The star-spangled banner!" came near enough to worship to renew the enthusiasm of many of the crowd. But even this popular chorus was given tamely, in comparison with that first outburst of Christian praise. We cannot forbear to ask ourselves with satisfaction and gratitude, How came that crowd of American bankers and merchants to be able to sing this doxology to the triune God? And what influence turned their patriotic exultation into worship? They sang in the street what they had learned to sing in the church; and they addressed their praise for victory where they had been accustomed to address their prayers.

After this eventful Monday each day of the last week informed us how our able generals and their enthusiastic troops followed up their successes with the greatest skill and energy; and every new despatch from the pursuing forces encouraged the hope that the enemy, cut off from his line of retreat, and hard pressed by superior numbers, would be compelled to capitulate. But not till this morning was the land electrified again with the announcement—"General Lee has surrendered, with all his troops." On the afternoon of Palm Sunday the brave and skilful leader of the army of Northern Virginia, "to save the further effusion of blood," desisted from his hopeless task, and accepted the wise and generous terms of General Grant. Their interesting correspondence will, no doubt, be copied into your own newspapers. While I write I hear the booming of cannon on every side, expressing our national exultation over a victory which must portend speedy peace.

This joy, of course, is welcome for its own sake. But the marked religious element that enters into it makes it to Christian patriots a

EDITORIAL.

The profound joy of the nation in this auspicious result cannot be expressed in effervescent enthusiasm and noisy huzzas, but will appear in the form in which it is so fitly and opportunely proclaimed by the Secretary of War—ascriptions of praise to Almighty God, and offerings of honour to the great leader of our armies, whom He has used as His instrument to save the nation.

THE CITIZENS OF NEW YORK TO ABRAHAM LINCOLN, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

With devout thankfulness to Almighty God . . . we desire to acknowledge His merciful goodness, and to join in reverence for His holy name. [The paper proceeds to request the President to designate a day when "the whole people may assemble to offer praises and thanks for the brilliant successes" which "Divine Providence" has granted to our arms.]

This is not hypocrisy nor mere sentiment, but a substantial growth of religious feeling. The moral aspects of the war; the frequent rebuffs which God has given to our national pride during its progress; the diffused and intense interest in the spiritual good of the army, which the Christian Commission has helped to elicit, and which the grace of the Holy Ghost has honoured and rewarded in the remarkable revivals among the soldiers; the signal interventions of Providence in our behalf in momentous crises by sea and by land; the reverent, religious tone of the President's public documents;—these and similar influences, following upon the great revival of 1858, and seconded by the prayers of so many churches and Christian homes, and the pious instructions of so many pastors, have given to the national mind a tone of devout-than acquiescence in the less has taught them and us. God you will see, has accorded to officers and men the privilege to their homes, not to be distant States authority so long as the parole and the laws in force side." These terms meet the bation of the great mass of that longer fighting might more rigid conditions, but be ditions include all they desire many, indeed, who would be leaders of this great rebellion the greater number even of them by a desire not for mere revenge vindication of rightful authority ever intimidate the arrogant spirit out of which this rebellion

I observe in the March number the quotation of one opinion concerning the spirit the one nation in this great Germany will not furnish me to that estimate. It is sheer so remarkable for its bitterness and absurdity.

CHRISTIAN LIBERALS

The effect which the near has upon the financial interests is far from favourable to any violent giving. The great fall gold subjects almost every loss upon his stock, intimidate many departments of trade are) to the American Board, and 10,000 dollars were deposited upon the plates. Some months ago the trustees of the Union Theological Seminary of the City (Presbyterian) went to effect an endowment of 150,000 dollars for their institution. They have already reached the amount of 140,000 dollars, without going out of this city; the single church of Dr. Adams above named contributing 60,000 dollars of that sum. These are facts which meet me, without being sought. And another fact is, that the most magnificent givers are the warmest patriots. It is hard to understand, then, how our patriotism should be reverent towards God, forbearing towards our enemies?

CHRISTIAN UNION.

The name of the highly-respected pastor we referred to is just now associated with every significant act of ecclesiastical courtesy. Our readers will remember the account I wrote a month ago of the celebration of the Holy Liturgy in one of the Episcopal churches of this city. This service has attracted a great deal of attention. The Roman Catholic press insists, and with good show of evidence, that the Mass, pure and simple, has been celebrated in a Protestant church. The Evangelical party of the Episcopal Church are disgusted with the sympathy that has been shown for this Eastern superstition, and, possibly stimulated by the license which the High Church party have taken in the introduction of a Greek priest and his clergy into a consecrated building, seem disposed to test their right to interpret the laws of their Church just as freely in favour of Presbyterian piety and orthodoxy. Dr. Cotton Smith, of Ascension Church, has invited Dr. William Adams, of the Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church, to preach in the sanctuary of the former on the evening of last Sunday. The invitation, heartily made and pressed, has been accepted, and thus their most becoming advance is made, not towards the production, but the recognition of Christian union. The act suits well the temper of the times as well as the spirit of our piety. When our venerable hero, General Winfield Scott, heard of Dr. Smith's invitation, he exclaimed in true soldier phrase, "I am glad my minister has done so gently a thing."

THE ROMANISTS AND THE ENCYCLICAL—THE MEXICAN EX-PRIESTS—THE UNITARIANS.

The Roman Catholics among us have been awfully reticent in regard to the Encyclical. The Tablet, the chief organ of that church in this city, declared in February that the letter had been mistranslated, and that when properly translated, the phraseology was meant for bishops, and the laity would not be apt to get the sense of it. Since then that journal has not found time to translate or explain the obscure document. Archbishop McClosky, indeed, speaks out plainly in its favour. He says it differs from other Encyclicals only in condemning at once, and in detail, the errors which have formerly been condemned one by one. And this, he says, is the reason why "the votaries of all prevailing errors unite in assailing it." The Bishop of Maryland takes very different ground, and insists that the letter was not meant for this latitude at all. The most significant token of its measure of influence with the Catholic community of this country was given at a recent mass meeting of Catholics—I think on St. Patrick's-day—when one of the speakers squarely denounced its illiberal sentiments, and received the hearty applause of his hearers.

An interesting meeting was held in one of the largest churches of Brooklyn, on March 7th, to listen and respond to the statements of two Mexican ex-priests of the Church of Rome, representing more than a hundred others, who, disgusted with the enormities of the Church in which they have officiated, have dissolved their connexion with it, and assumed the position of Reformers. Many of these are now serving as curates of parishes, by the choice and support of the people. The statement of their persecutions and of the firmness of their purpose to labour for the evangelization of that distracted and benighted country, has elicited a good deal of interest and sympathy.

The proposed Unitarian Convention was held in this city on Wednesday and Thursday of last week. Six hundred delegates are said to have been present. The chief interest of the meeting centred in the contest between the extreme liberal and the conservative wings of the assembly, for the control of its action. I have only space to say that the conservatives triumphed, incorporating into their "constitution" such expressions concerning "the Lord Jesus Christ" and the "Son of God," that if the name "Unitarian" had been left out, any reader might think that the document had proceeded from an "orthodox" body. The movement has some notable features. I may speak of it again when I have more space, and see more of its development.

in the Irish Primate, whose charge to his diocese has lately been published, and will be found full of information on several important points. We pass over his estimate of its revenues and of the various confiscations to which it has, from time to time, been subjected, merely remarking that, at present, a net income of 51,110*l.* is divided in the proportion of 13,610*l.* to two archbishops, and 37,500*l.* to ten bishops ; while deans, archdeacons, and beneficed clergymen divide among them very nearly 400,000*l.*, or about 260*l.* on an average to each of 1,510 beneficed clergymen. The more important point in the eyes of many persons will be : What are the numbers of the parishioners of these clergymen, and what relation do they bear to the Roman Catholics around them ? Here the statements of the Archbishop are more satisfactory than there was reason to expect. The Census Commissioners made the report that there were 199 parishes in Ireland without a single Protestant. The Archbishop exposes the fallacy of this statement : The "parishes" thus referred to are, in most cases, mere civil parishes, so called—suppressed monasteries, now occupied by a barn, a mill, or other similar building. Of the parishes in the ordinary sense of the word there is only one in the destitute condition referred to. Of course the same fallacy runs through all the other calculations of the Commissioners. Instead of there being 575 parishes with fewer than 20 Protestants, there are only 76 ; so that out of 1,510 parishes there are 1,433 and where their great success was at a meeting in Ireland, the Dean of Cork declared, after declaring, that he made no distinction between the Church of Ireland and the Church of England, which connects them. It was in the power of the pope to do the latter; but the life was safe beyond their reach.

PROGRESS OF SUPERSTITION

The advances made by persons still professing to be of the Church of England grow more marked, and daring. They vie with each other in how much of Romish ceremony they can introduce without collision with the express provisions of the Church's formularies. For this matter, have come to the aid of Mr. Wilson's "Essay" of evading the law of the Church by these men. Where these practices can be introduced in their own parish church, they have power to hire some one to indulge themselves in ritual to their hearts' desire. In the eyes of the world, the abject superstition of Ignatius acquire an importance not otherwise belong to it. It is known that he and his I. Benedict receive pecuniary parties that secretly sympathize though they dare not yet ome as possible, and this, though a clergyman of the Church of England, the Rev. J. Ouseley, took a leading part in them. After a variety of much more of these semi-monish ceremonies—

Brother Ignatius proceeded to read or sing the Gospel of the day, or, as he termed it, "the Passion of our Lord Jesus Christ, according to St. John," Mr. Ouseley standing with uplifted and folded hands. The Gospel for Good Friday is a pretty long one, and, as Brother Ignatius read the several passages, such as "Pilate therefore took Jesus and scourged him" (the word "scourged" was almost indefinitely prolonged); "Behold the man;" "Away with him" (the cry of the Jews); "Woman, behold thy son;" "I thirst" (given very loudly), &c., a feature of the service occupied a considerable time. At the words "It is finished," and "He bowed his head and gave up the ghost," an attempt was made to portray the lightning and thunder under which the Scripture narratives record events attended the real event. The thunder was more successful than the lightning, which was said indeed to have been a mere flash in the pan; some of the kitchen utensils would have been concerned behind the scenes in the action of the thunder. At this extraordinary scene—or rather attempt at a scene—Brother Ignatius, Mr. Ouseley, all the monks, most of the congregation, prostrated themselves for a few seconds. A veiled crucifix was removed by Mr. Ouseley from the top of the altar, the cope which covered it was partly removed, and Mr. Ouseley, holding it aloft, said, "Behold the wood of the cross!" Brother Ignatius and the congregation responded, "Amen, let us adore." The cope was then removed, the crucifix again held aloft, and he said, "Behold the wood of the cross!" and, with the same response. Then the crucifix was entirely removed, and the figure of our Saviour was exposed, Mr. Ouseley saying, "Behold the wood of the holy cross, on which the salvation of the world!" The response has been sung, the crucifix was lowered to the ground, and Brother Ignatius, creeping towards the altar, reverently kissed it. Mr. Ouseley, taking off his cross-embroidered vestment, followed his example. Brother Ignatius then said that, "in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost," he desired to say a few words to the congregation whom he addressed as men and women, and daughters of our fallen race. He accordingly ascended a kind of pulpit, and, in a tone of impassioned entreaty, besought all to show their love for Jesus by coming to adore His holy cross. They kissed, he said, the pictures of relatives and distant friends; and the emblem of their faith, the cross of our Lord? He then prescribed that during the singing of a hymn should be sung; that the people, in drawing near to the altar, should make three prostrations; and, finally, that they should kiss the hands and feet of the figure on the crucifix.

These are the practices to which it is now about to bring back the people of England! The doctrines taught are much on a level. A schism has lately been published, and is said to have had a considerable sale, on the "Office of the Holy Communion," edited by a committee of clergy. Our first impression on looking at this Catechism was that it was a Roman Catholic publication, and that the committee of clergy belonged to that Church, but it soon appeared that they profess at least—for no names are given—to be beneficed clergymen of the Protestant Church of England. In this book it is declared that the Holy Communion is a "sacrifice," or "offering made on an altar to God;" and that the bread and wine "become the body and blood of Christ," which at the communion are "afresh offered and presented to the Father." It is difficult to see in what "Holy Communion," thus explained, differs from the "Sacrifice of the Mass."

ENGLISH PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—SCOTTISH CONGREGATIONAL UNION.

The period for the May meetings has come round again, and, in anticipation of them, some of the minor Nonconformist bodies have been holding their annual meetings. The English Presbyterian Church met, about the middle of the month, in Liverpool, when the reports presented from the various organizations showed considerable progress. There were about 9,000 actual Church members, of whom about 1,360 persons were actively engaged in various branches of the Church's work. About 4,000*l.* was raised for foreign missions, and upwards of 9,000*l.* was raised last year for church extension and extinction of debt. It was reported that a legacy left on behalf of the college was hampered with some legal difficulties, but there was good reason for hoping that a sum would be secured enough to place this institution above the need of special aid from the Churches. The Scottish Congregational Union held its annual meeting at Aberdeen. There, too, the reports given in were of a gratifying character, and the meeting is said to have been a cheering one, but no special instance of progress during the past year was reported.

THE ANTHROPOLOGICAL SOCIETY AND MISSIONS.

The Anthropological is about the youngest of our so-called scientific societies, and it is also the most pretentious. Its members appear to be of all creeds and of none; and its most prominent supporters—we are far from saying its most numerous—are in favour of the doctrine that man has been developed from a monkey, and that the African negro is the animal in process of development. This section of the society has lately made a fierce attack

Monthly Survey of Missions

SYRIA.

Hasbeiya, in the Lebanon—for several years a station or out-station of the American Board, with a Protestant church, and a neat, substantial ship—was, it may be remembered, one of the places desolated during the war. It has been visited recently, first by the Rev. Mr. Berry, and afterwards by Mr. Ford. Mr. Berry thus describes what he saw :—

The charred ruins lie in all directions, but comparatively few of those who were slain and widows are still wailing and smiting their breasts when they narrate the deeds of blood. The murderers are living in peace and security by their sides, and appear to have no remorse. The palace was shown me where not less than 500 Christians were killed. The cold blood, in the lower court, while the soldiers who were sent for their upper story, looking with complacency upon one of the most awful of butcheries, would not admit the poor creatures within the court until they delivered up their arms. That they had disarmed them, they would not use their own arms in their defence. The marks of the massacre were several inches deep, and its marks are not yet entirely erased within that place.

The catastrophe which destroyed the town fell heavily upon the little church. Some of its members perished in the massacre, and the rest were driven from their homes. But at last, in the good providence of God, nearly all the surviving Protestants have returned on their way back, and have been enabled to rebuild their ruined houses ; several schools have been opened, the regular worship of the Sabbath has been resumed, and the church has been reorganised.

Last Sabbath, for the first time in four years [writes Mr. Ford, who was present], its members gathered round the table of their Lord, to celebrate His Supper. On the preceding day they had come together for prayer and conference, and after confessing their sins and offences, they had with one accord declared their purpose to follow the Christian course and to walk circumspectly, aiding each other by mutual watchfulness. And now, as they were about once more to profess, in the most affecting manner, their attachment to their crucified and risen Lord, they felt called upon to renew, in the presence of the congregation, and then sealed their vows with the covenant. It was a cheering and hopeful sight, contrasting most happily with the desolation which stared on us from blackened walls and heaps of ruins all around.

INDIA.

At Jubbulpore, in the dark interior of Central India, the Rev. F.

respectable Mussulmans, some of them declared that after what he had done it behoved them to inquire whether these things were so.

Shortly before his death, the venerable Pastor Gossner, the founder of the Chota Nagpore Mission, proposed to transfer its affairs to the management of the Church Missionary Society, and nominated a friend by whom this arrangement might be carried out. The committee of the latter institution have resolved, however, that no step shall be taken in the matter until a clear understanding has been obtained with the Berlin Society "of the grounds which justify the apparent interference of one society with the operations of a sister society."

Eleven individuals, six of whom were adults, have been baptized at Kampti (a military station, about ten miles from Nagpore) by the Free Church missionaries. These brethren were also baptized, at Nagpore, five adult females, all of whom had been under special instruction for some months, and had given evidence of their sincerity. A young man longing to the city was to have been baptized on the same occasion; but his friends consented to detain him at home till the service was over.

The Baptist missionary at Delhi reports several baptisms, both among Europeans and natives, and that the mission has made solid progress during the year. Every evening the Gospel is preached in four places in the city, and a central school has been commenced in a market-place. The building was formerly the Government College. Fifty children attended on the opening of it. Another missionary belonging to the same body, who has been engaged in a preaching tour through the districts around Dacca, reports that the baptism of several inquirers was likely soon to take place.

Encouraging accounts continue to be received from the Travancore mission of the London Society. "God is indeed working in our midst," says the Rev. James Duthie, of Cochin. "We have now upwards of twenty-five thousand professing Christians under regular instruction, who have raised for religious purposes, during last year, the astonishingly large sum of 783*l.* 12*s.*;" an amount which, considering the extreme poverty of the people, is indeed astonishing. Mr. Duthie also reports the baptism of a Hindoo ascetic in one of the adjacent villages, a man who had originally devoted his life to religious observances, in such that he might escape death by cholera, a case of which he had been terrified by witnessing.

CHINA.

Two adult converts have been baptized by the Church missionary at Fuh-chau. One of them had been in the habit of going to the mission chapel for the sole purpose of abusing the catechist and interrupting the service, and at length became so troublesome, that he had to be forcibly removed from the premises. He did not make his appearance again for some months, and then it was to ask how he might become a Christian. The missionary, on consulting with him, found reason to believe that he was sincere, and that his heart had been deeply touched by the Divine Spirit. He was placed under instruction for some months, and rapidly grew in knowledge and in faith. His baptism took place on Christmas-day—though he was at first unwilling that that festival should be appointed for the purpose; but," said he, "I am not worthy to be baptized on the day that my Saviour came down into this world." By becoming a Christian, he has not only had to relinquish a very lucrative business in connexion with the idolatrous temples, but has had to suffer much persecution on his former acquaintance.

The occupation of Wu-chang, one of the most important cities in the empire, and the seat of a provincial viceroy, as a mission-station, has been the occasion of a keen contest between the mandarins and the Rev. Griffith John, of the London Society. Mr. John gives an amusing account of the tactics of the native authorities, in their endeavour to defeat that object. The viceroy, at the outset, was all politeness. He would be very happy to have the missionaries there, but he could not bear the thought of their exposing themselves to insults and dangers. This objection being set aside by the missionary, the permission sought was given—in words, at least. The district magistrate also affected to be most obliging and deferential, and pretended that he would place no obstacle in the way. Still, so long as Mr. John appeared in the matter, he was unable to obtain house or land in the city. At length, a native evangelist was put forward as the purchaser, a piece of ground was bought, and the deeds handed over by him to the missionary. Great was the excitement of the mandarins when they discovered the object of the purchase. The man who had sold the land, and the evangelist who had bought it, were threatened by the authorities, on the ground that including one of the ablest native preachers, have not been heard of since it

Gratifying accounts continue to be received of the progress of the Gospel in Amoy. In the country stations of Kwan Kau and An-bin, during the same year, the Rev. J. Stronach, of the London Society, baptized nineteen converts, many others of whom good hopes are entertained. In the city of Amoy several were received, during the same half year, into the Church by the London Society. The aggregate number of native Christians in and around Amoy, of the London Society, is nearly four hundred, while the members in connexion with the Presbyterian mission and the American Dutch Reformed Church are still more numerous.

At Peking, the Rev. W. Burns, of the English Presbyterian mission, is rendering the "Pilgrim's Progress" into Mandarin colloquial—which is the northern half of the empire. From Swatow we hear that a "Gospel-boat," of the same mission, is on the stocks. A house in the occupation of the mission on the Island has been accidentally burned down, and a large number of Chinese destroyed.

JAPAN.

The missionary of the American Episcopal Church stationed at Nagasaki cannot be very long before the country is opened to direct missionary operations. Romanists are 'wise in their generation,' and are greatly in advance of us. French Jesuits here at Nagasaki, two at Yokohama, and one at Hakodadi. A lesson from them in this respect."

SOUTH AFRICA.

A missionary of the Propagation Society, stationed on the Bashee River, Kaffraria, mentions the death of Fubu, the chief of a tribe, supposed to be very old, leaving descendants of the fifth generation, his eldest grandson being also old. A great number of curious ceremonies were observed and practised at the time.

Immediately after the death of Fubu the hut which he occupied was closed, the door fastened, and never again opened: an opening was made in the side of the hut for the body, which was about to be buried. The grave, as is usual on the death of a great man, was in the entrance to the cattle-fold, or kraal, which after the burial will never again be entered, cattle remaining outside till a new kraal is made, which, on this occasion, was done. The old kraal is never again entered, but is gradually allowed to fall to pieces. A grave is erected near the grave, and certain men have been appointed to reside there, as sentinels. They will probably remain there for a considerable time. They are supplied with a number of milch cows appointed to them for their own special use. These "watchmen" are considered to be highly privileged persons, and no matter what crime they may be guilty of, during their term of watching, they cannot be prosecuted or punished. I had often

He writes respecting the field at Cape Palmas, in which he has been labourber of baptisms has been unusually large, the scholars seem more diligent, those in tions more earnest, and a more serious spirit pervades the natives. This view of the ot only been gathered by actual observation, but from the ministers and catechists at meetings, which we have held since our last Convocation. The Gospel is regularly about twenty villages, and upwards of twenty-five thousand people have the oppor- ring it.

SOUTH AMERICA.

agents (six of whom are clergymen) are now labouring in the field occupied by American Missionary Society. One of these calls attention to the neglected the Chincha Islands. On the occasion of a recent visit he was heartily wel- he reports that from the large number of British and American vessels resorting ano, there is an average floating population of more than 1,700 men, wholly itual oversight. The medical missionary in Patagonia writes encouragingly of : of the work upon which he had entered, and of the peculiar value attached to al services.

NEWFOUNDLAND.

spondent who dates from Bay de Verds, referring to our mention of the tion in Ireland, in January last (p. 47), remarks :—

ecks ago certain articles appeared in our local papers, copied from Toronto journals, give an account of a secret plot by these Fenians to assassinate all the Protestants in These accounts have caused a considerable amount of alarm amongst us ; not that I l to them myself ; for surely no persons, having a fair share of worldly prudence, pt such a thing in the present state of society, seeing that vengeance would return ids tenfold. Nevertheless, the people in this neighbourhood, who are half Protestants anists, were, as I have said, much affrighted by reports which were continually reach- the smith, who has a forge here, and occasionally visits the place to do any necessary ept employed for two or three days repairing guns, of which one or two, and ree or four, and those of a large size, such as are used for shooting seals, are found in Even our young lads are well used to the gun. I think that the people's fears are 3- our young men will, in a few days, be upon the stormy deep, in the regions of the ice, he seal fishery. May the Lord prosper their labours, and bring them back in safety. ay previous to their departure we generally preach what is termed an "Ice-hunting rning them against evil companions, profaning the Sabbath by taking seals on that and distribute among them a few tracts. The voyage generally occupies from six weeks hs. In many a hopeful youth have the buds of piety been nipped by his first trip fen of all characters and professions, to the number of from fifty to eighty, being shut n the hold of a vessel for weeks, in comparative idleness, Satan, we may be sure, is hem ; and youthful piety is often put to a severe test.

NORTH-WEST AMERICA.

ouching to observe how earnestly and repeatedly the missionaries stationed at nces from each other, in the far North-West, are impelled, in their journals and ek an interest in the prayers of the friends of missions at home. Truly they t sympathies, for they have much to depress them. Besides the rigour of the harsh aspect of nature, and their lonely and isolated position, they are often ial difficulties in their work. Thus we read of the native missionary at Cum- ing Moose Lake out-station, and being, as he well might be, depressed by finding professedly Christian Indians there relapsed into heathenism. In other cases, the nominal profession of Christianity is maintained, its precepts are set at nought intemperance. In the case of the heathen, this vice is indulged in without 'or example, one of the native missionaries at Nepowewin writes :—

then, when absent from the neighbourhood, look forward to this place of location in re way that Mussulmans look forward to their prophet's false paradise ; only the chief the encampment here is mighty rum. My poor heathen brother will embrace a rum te as ardently as the deceived and fanatic Islamite hugs his awful delusion. . . . It that the day on which we were employed at the new frame of a schoolhouse then in ction, the Indians had procured a good quantity of liquor, and it was not long before np was engaged in wild revelry. Some few individuals we had persuaded to assist us ry timber, but they soon all disappeared. The smell of liquor tainted the air : they fection, and vanished. Our helpers vanished from the scene, only to reappear with it, hideous gestures, and boisterous singing. One Indian, "The Turtle," remained hile, but he had no peace from his fellows. Messenger after messenger came to in- in in their unholy revels. Good right they had to him, they thought ; for "The good. The first thing he noticed was their daily habit of morning and evening of their kindness and forbearance towards himself; and then, their devout observance day. Other boats might go on, but not theirs. By them the day was devoted to worship; so that, before reaching Norway House, he said he was filled with distress that he, who had just come from a land of Gospel light and Christian privilege so careless about his soul, and forgetful of his Saviour, whilst those poor Indians, expected to know nothing of those things, were so diligent and prayerful. And so distress became, that one evening while the Indians were at their devotions, he plucked up courage and went to the woods at some distance off, and for the first time in his life, with earnest prayers sought God's pardoning mercy and forgiving love.

AUSTRALIA.

A missionary movement among the poor Chinese population of Australia commenced by the Synod of Australia, in connexion with the National Church. A Chinese convert has been engaged as missionary, and the Free Church Local Missions have united in the good work by sending contributions to its fund.

POLYNESIA.

Intelligence of great interest has been received by the American Board respecting movements on the island of Hawaii (Sandwich Islands); the formation of two or three Presbyteries—the "Evangelical Association of Western Hawaii" and the Association of Eastern Hawaii—the "arranging for twenty-four Evangelical converts of them under native pastors," eight of which have been already organized, the licensing of eight native pastors, and the licensing of four other natives as preachers of the Gospel. The missionary brethren express much gratitude in view of such events that they constitute "a great step in advance." In all the proceedings the harmony, and the Good Shepherd was felt to be present.*

Referring to Adamu Pali, who on this occasion was ordained, and installed over one of the new churches, the Rev. Mr. Lyons says:—

Here was the first pure Hawaiian that had been ordained on this island to the Gospel, placed as pastor over a church, some members of which were among the first natives to hear the Gospel's joyful sound from the lips of the first missionaries. Kawaihe was the first native on the island trod by the foot of the missionary. It was quite appropriate that the first Gospel was first preached on this island should have the first Hawaiian pastor.

Civil and political affairs at the Sandwich Islands were not in a promising state. The legislative body, convened under the new constitution, were likely to open the gates of intemperance, as those of licentiousness were thrown wide open during the reign of Kamehameha IV. One missionary says: "We continue on in the regular missionary work, with no open opposition from Government, though it is obvious a strong under-current against us." Another writes: "Intemperance and licentiousness are the great evils of the island."

Literature.

Popery, Ancient and Modern: Its Spirit, Principles, Character, Objects, Prospects, Checks, and Extirpation; with Warnings and Counsels to the People of England. By JOHN CAMPBELL, D.D. John Snow.

WHATEVER comes from the pen of a writer of great experience, and long familiar with all departments of the Christian world, is almost sure to attract attention; and we have no doubt, therefore, that the book before us will be read by many. From the introduction to the volume we get a bird's-eye view of the Romish ecclesiastical system in England and Scotland. This is very interesting, as it suggests the relative strength of the party in different districts, and the cause of the differences which appear. Thus, the diocese of Northampton, comprising not only that county, but Bedford, Buckingham, Cambridge, Huntingdon, Norfolk, and Suffolk, only contains 31 priests, 16 churches and chapels, and 5 convents. Again, the diocese of Plymouth, comprising Devon, Dorset, Cornwall, and the Scilly Islands, with about twice the population of the Northampton diocese, has only 34 priests, 35 churches and chapels, and 8 convents. But the diocese of Liverpool, with a population about equal to that of Northampton, boasts of 193 priests, 110 churches and chapels, a college, 5 religious houses of men, 25 convents, and 35 poor schools. Wiltshire also, with a population of 600,000, has 67 priests, 70 churches and chapels, a college, collegiate institute, 5 religious houses of men, and 14 convents. Similar disproportions are everywhere observable, and the reason is evidently the presence or absence of Irish immigrants: where they abound, Popery is numerically strong, where they are few it is weak. The inference is, that neither the English nor the Scotch have been perverted to any large extent.

The substance of Dr. Campbell's work consists of thirty-five chapters on the chief points of interest in the Romish controversy. Facts have been culled with great industry, and quotations given from an immense number of Popish and other authorities, while a practical turn is given to the whole by an abundance of hints, inferences, and observations. The author writes with great earnestness and energy, as one who is conscious of the dangerous tendencies of the principles and practices he opposes. He advocates, with all his mind and soul, resistance to the encroachments of this mischievous system, and the maintenance of the simple and divinely revealed plan set forth in the Word of God. He shows that Popery is radically and essentially wrong, and at war alike with the best interests of humanity and the truth of the Gospel. The record of its follies, audacities, and crimes, is certainly most startling, and is described in truly graphic language. If but the hundredth part of what is here said be true, there cannot be any doubt as to the duty of every sincere Christian to view the Popish system as the great apostasy, and to deal with it as the real and bitter enemy to the true Church of Christ. No one who reads the book can have any hesitation in coming to such a conclusion, for the facts are not only abundant, but set forth in language remarkably forcible and lucid. We do not know when we have met with a volume so well fitted to instruct the Christian world on this great subject, and to awaken it to a sense of its obligations.

If the author had deemed it desirable, he could have multiplied his facts ten-fold; but he has not thought this necessary, and probably with reason in his favour. There is one point, however, on which it will be said by his adverse critics, that he is at fault. We allude to references to authorities. Sometimes no references are given where they would have been better introduced. For example, when speaking of "falsifying the Scriptures," it might have been added that "penance" is uniformly put for "repentance" in Popish versions; that the expressions, "the sacrifice of the Mass," and "the fire of Purgatory," appear in a French version published at Bordeaux in 1686, and that the latter of these occurs also in a French Bible issued at Paris in 1667. In the same section we have a reference to 1 Cor. xi. 2, which should surely have been Jude 3; and, in like manner, we think 1 Cor. vii. 10 should have been 2 Cor. vi. 14. Passing over some other cases, we read, at p. 286, "according to that MS.," a phrase for which we seek an explanation in vain. So, just after, the words "the same work" are equally ambiguous. As a fact, the information we want is to be found in Mendham's "Literary Policy" (Introduction, pp. xvii.—xxii.), and there we see that the "MS." and "the same work" are one, viz., Gee's edition of "A Memorial of the Reformation." A little further on, Dr. Campbell quotes a decree of "the third Council of Lateran," which we cannot find, and immediately adds that this decree was confirmed by "the eleventh Ecumenical Council," not observing that this and the third Lateran were one and the same. The words next quoted as from "the same canon," really occur in Can. 27 of the Council in question, but those which precede do not, and appear to be the summing up of some commentator. Other defective references might be pointed out; but these are named to show how much care is required in such matters. Our author will add to the efficiency of his book by having the references revised as far as possible before he brings out a second edition. Weakness here is weakness everywhere, or will be so interpreted by our adversaries.

These remarks, however, must not be taken as militating against the credit of this excellent work, the facts of which remain in all their substantial accuracy, and may therefore be relied upon. In conclusion, let us express our hearty admiration of the popular, clear, and forcible style in which the book is written, and our conviction that it is in many ways fitted to be of immense service, now that Popery is insidiously attempting to make converts among us, and to gain the confidence of the uninformed by an assumption of innocence and simplicity which certainly savours of the serpent rather than of the dove.

Discussions on the Gospels. In Two Parts. Part I. On the Language Employed by Our Lord and His Disciples. Part II. On the Original Language of St. Matthew's Gospel, and on the Origin and Authenticity of the Gospels. By ALEXANDER ROBERTS, D.D. Second Edition, revised and enlarged. Cambridge and London: Macmillan and Co.

THIS is, in more senses than one, a substantial volume. The author has presented us with a series of elaborate and really learned disquisitions upon critical questions of great present importance. Assuming that St. Matthew originally wrote his gospel in Hebrew or Aramaic, some would-be wise men have taunted believers with its disappearance. "Why," say they, "a portion even of that very New Testament which you believe to have been given by God's inspiration is irrecoverably lost, and that lost portion is no other than the first of all the Gospels, which you now possess only in a Greek translation. Under these circumstances, how do you know whether your copy of St. Matthew is a correct one or not?" All this is mere sophistry, and has been shown to be no more; but it is deprived of even the semblance of plausibility by the able author of the work before us. He offers the strongest reasons for believing that St. Matthew originally wrote in Greek, and that we consequently possess his actual production in his own words. This very important result is reached by a careful historical and critical process. Evidence is adduced to prove that in the times of our Lord and His Apostles Greek was so commonly spoken in Palestine, that we may conclude it was the language which they usually employed. The evidence is partly historical and partly derived from an investigation of the New Testament itself. The Gospel of St. Matthew is submitted to a searching examination, and every indication of its Greek original is distinctly exhibited. After showing that thus far there is no proof nor argument in the New Testament, and the times when it appeared, for a Hebrew or Aramaic Gospel of St. Matthew, but that the testimony is against this supposition, our author turns to opposing theories. Early ecclesiastical writers say St. Matthew wrote in Hebrew, and their statements have been adopted by some in modern times. It is conclusively shown that a tradition ought not to be accepted in preference to well-ascertained facts, and the phenomena of the first Gospel. A recent theory put forth by the late Dr. Cureton in behalf of a Syriac translation, discovered by him, is effectively disposed of. These discussions occupy four-fifths of the volume, and may be referred to as constituting one of the best critical treatises which this age has produced. The chapter on the origin of the Gospels is a skilful endeavour to show that the Evangelists wrote narratives which are independent of each other, and not derived from some lost original, either in whole or in part. This chapter is supplemental to the preceding, and concludes in these words: "Our Lord Jesus Christ spoke in Greek, and the Evangelists independently narrated His actions and reported His discourses in the same language which He had himself employed." The chapter following, on the authenticity and credibility of the Gospels, has been added to this edition, with special reference to the recent "Life of Jesus," by M. Renan. It is deserving of the same commendation as the rest, and triumphantly refutes the rationalistic theories of the brilliant Frenchman. In a closing chapter the author gives somewhat like an application of what he has already advanced, and shows the great importance of the inquiry. The whole of the work has been carefully revised, and is very well written and accurately printed. The only mistake of any consequence is on p. 161, where "Peter" is put instead of "Paul." The volume will be found a treasure to every Biblical student, and is in such a style that any educated person may read it with pleasure and instruction.

Realised Wishes: a Tale of Working and Waiting.
By MARIA SINGLETON. Nisbet and Co.

WE can strongly recommend this story on all accounts. It is excellently well planned and written, and the spirit of it is every way admirable. We shall be surprised if it does not rapidly win its way to public favour; and we have no doubt that those who read it on our recommendation will in turn recommend it to others. The incidents are so numerous, that we hardly know how to present a summary of them in a few words, but we hope our readers will be satisfied with the character which we have given to the volume.

Monthly Retrospect.

FOREIGN.

A great war in America, which has filled the world with astonishment for the last four years, is now over. Its death-blow was received when Sheridan, bursting through the obstacles it opposed his progress, fell upon and turned the right wing of the Confederate army, which had entrenched before Petersburg; and the feat was consummated on Sunday, the 9th of last month, when General Lee surrendered himself and the remains of his army to General Grant, on the simple condition that the officers should retain their side arms, horses, and private property, and that officers and men should be disbanded and go home on their parole. The intervening steps between the first and the last of these events were that Lee, immediately after his defeat, evacuated Richmond, which was taken possession of by the Federals on the evening of the same day; that a force was sent in pursuit of the retreating Confederates, who came up with, and inflicted another severe defeat upon them; and that, finally, being surrounded on all sides, they had no other resource than to lay down their arms. It is said that President Davis has fled to Augusta, in Georgia. Lee has gone to London, in North Carolina, the head-quarters of General Johnstone, who is in command of the only regular Confederate army now in the field, and it is probable that on his advice Johnstone also will abandon the now clearly unequal contest. The town of Mobile holds out, and there is said to be a large force somewhere in the State of Mississippi; it is probable also that there are various other guerilla bands, which may continue for some time to infest the country; but for all practical purposes the war may be considered at an end, and the great and difficult work of reconstruction is about to commence. At present, the Federals are approaching the task in the best possible spirit. Their rapid, unexpected, and decisive strokes of success which have lately attended their arms, have made them as generous as they are joyful, and throughout the Union a general sentiment in favour of clemency to the conquered has gone up, broken only by the discordant dissenting note of General Butler. It remains to be seen how the South will bear themselves under the reverses they have sustained. If they submit patiently to the lot which is theirs by the arbitrament of war—an arbitrament which they themselves invoked, of whose award, therefore, they cannot complain—the work may be greatly smoothed; if they resist, or sullenly refuse to co-operate, it may be that the present humane temper of the victors may be exasperated into tyranny. Under any circumstances, there is much to be done in the re-adjustment of the personal, social, moral, and political condition of the Union to tax the energies and the ability of her ablest statesmen, and demand repose for several years to come. The greatest difficulty of all will consist in the settlement of the condition of the negro. Slavery, of course, is at an end, never again to raise its hateful standard over the whole of that wide continent. But will the Southern planters accept those free labourers whom they have so long ruled as their human chattels? What provision is to be made for the sick and the aged—for the education of the young—for the proper remuneration of the labouring class? Is the negro to be still considered as politically inferior, though socially free? or will he be at once raised to the rights of citizenship? These, and a hundred questions like these, press for solution. It is not for us to solve them; we can only wish, in the interests of our kinsmen, that the men who have the responsibility of the task may be guided to the right solution. And for their encouragement, we cannot fail to note one special characteristic of the late war, which, we doubt not, has been marked by many besides ourselves. At its commencement, the majority in the North refused to make the abolition of slavery a condition of peace, and even after the question had assumed a more prominent position, they still coquetted with it, and refused to commit themselves on the subject. If the South would but come back, they might retain their slaves. And all the time the North was subjected to humiliating defeats, and the chance of success was on the side of the South. At last, President Lincoln issued his decree for the entire abolition of slavery. Since that time the North has had a course of unbroken success, and that deed of justice and equity, though it was supposed to exasperate the South and make peace hopeless, has been followed by victory after victory, and crowned at last with the submission of the Confederate antagonists. "Verily there is a God that judgeth in the earth!"

Much excitement is produced in Paris by the announcement that the Emperor is about

Rome should remain in bondage for the benefit of Catholicism at opinions have been energetically disavowed by M. Thiers's colleagues in the Legislative Chamber, and they were admirably answered by M. Rouher, the Ministers; but he too was enigmatic. In his address he spoke of the full and absolute observance of the Convention; but as to whether the Pope leave Rome, and the Romans determine to amalgamate with its complete silence. Probably, as our correspondent suggests, neither he nor they themselves. On religious questions, the struggle between light and darkness in the Lutheran Church, in France as well as on the Continent, heresy is opposed while in the Roman Catholic Church puerile superstitions like the miraculous images of the Virgin lead to the monstrous combinations of heresies manifested in Michelet's "Bible of Humanity."

The condition of Italy is full of more than usual interest. The dissensions of the Government have caused them to precipitate a measure which they otherwise have hesitated about, and a bill for the suppression of the convents is now before the Italian Parliament. The quarrel between the King and the Pope has had for one effect the non-filling up of various episcopal vacancies, and the King has been moved by it to make some concession to the Pope, willing to allow Victor Emmanuel to appoint bishops for Piedmont on the old terms, but he cannot make up his mind to allow the King to nominate bishops in the States of the Church. A Minister has, however, gone to Rome and has had an audience with Pius, in order to come to some agreement on this point, though it is not yet known with what success. In the meantime, the Word of God is being carried on there by various agencies. Nothing is more interesting than the fact that so many of the agents are Italians. No doubt these men are the Gospel from our standpoint, and they may occasionally do acts and carry out government and discipline which we in this country might not approve, but we must pardon minor defects, for the sake of the one evident advantage, that the Reformation will thus be made a National Reformation. And it is also satisfactory to see that efforts are making among the various bodies for a union.

The political state of Germany remains highly unsettled. Our respective correspondents, who firmly grasp the principle, how powerfully the movements of the statesmen affect the progress of truth, points out very forcibly the entanglement of German affairs have got since the Prussian Minister refused to attend to the sation more than twenty years ago, and it seems not unlikely that that daring experiment the popular superstition may be repeated. From another quarter, we have a curious illustration of how religious liberty is understood in Roman Catholic Austria. A new sect has sprung up there, which appears to combine Evangelical truth with some minor extravagances, and have brought them under the notice of the police; and in answer to the plea that religious liberty is now established in Austria, the reply was, "Yes, liberty for those creeds that are already tolerated, but you do not belong to them." So much for Austrian inter-statement of religious liberty.

The Czarewitch is dead. The heir to the throne of All the Russias died at Nice, in the twenty-second year of his age. Since the death of our Princess Charlotte there has perhaps been no such mournful instance of the cutting down of the brightest human prospects—no such impressive warning of the vanity of all earthly grandeur. His health had been delicate some time past, and he had been sent to Nice, in the hope that the disease might be rested; but it was all in vain. His mother was in attendance by his bed-side; his father hastened across Europe, to be with him in his last hours; and his affianced bride—or he had been betrothed to the Princess Dagmar of Denmark, sister of the Princess of Wales—had the mournful satisfaction of a parting interview with her lover, as he stood on the brink of the grave. In the overwhelming sorrow which this severe affliction has brought upon the Imperial house, it is possible that the sorrows of other families suffering for conscience' sake in his dominions may come home with more than usual effect on the heart of the Czar. We refer to the case of those who have been imprisoned or exiled for their religious opinions in the extreme north of Russia, as narrated this month in our pages devoted to the Evangelical Alliance. Some colonists have seen it their duty to leave the Lutheran communities in which they were brought up, and to become Baptists; and for this they have been subjected to an amount of legal persecution which could only, we think, have come from ecclesiastical spite and tyranny. It does not appear that the Imperial Government is at all concerned in the matter, though its agents have been made tools of, and we cannot doubt that when the matter is heard before the authorities at St. Petersburg, full redress will be given to these estimable sufferers for conscience' sake.

We would earnestly direct the attention of our readers, and especially those of them who wish to understand how justice is administered in Turkey, to the ominously discreditable part which was attempted to be played upon the Protestant community in Turkey, as detailed in the letter of our correspondent. We will not venture to spoil the interest of the tale by any attempt at compression; it will be much better to be read at length. But we deduce from the story two reflections. First, that the Mussulman authorities are, from some cause or other, ever ready to lend their ears to insinuations against the Protestant community; and next, and following from this, the importance of maintaining at the English Embassy a Minister who is ready and willing to throw the shield of his protection over these poor, despised, and persecuted people. It is gratifying to find that the issue of the transaction recorded by our correspondent is more satisfactory than its beginning promised. It is especially gratifying to an Englishman to find that this better state of things was brought about by our Chargé d'Affaires, Mr. Stuart. Had Sir Henry Bulwer been present at his post on the occasion, the issue, we fear, would have been very different.

H O M E.

The most notable event of the past month is at the same time a melancholy one. On the 2nd of April Richard Cobden died. His health had for some time past—indeed for years—been in a delicate state; but, up to within a few hours of his death, not even his most intimate friends felt any immediate apprehensions. The announcement caused profound sorrow through the country; and all parties, even those most opposed to his political principles, remembered only his unquestioned sincerity and the noble unselfishness of his career. In the House of Commons, the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition united in the expression of admiration for his genius and respect for his character and conduct; and their remarks found an echo in the heart of the country at large. Tributes so sincere and generous paid to the memory of a private man, who had sprung from the ranks of the people, and had never held official position, are not often bestowed. But they were felt to be due to the great work which Mr. Cobden accomplished, first in removing restrictions on the food of the people, and next in breaking down the commercial barriers which divided nation from nation in Europe. It will not be expected of us that we should enter into politics ; but the repeal of the Corn Laws has long since ceased to be regarded as a subject of party contention, and is now universally regarded as one of those blessings which Heaven bestows, when, as Cowper says, " it means mercy to a land." Its material benefit in multiplying and cheapening the means of food have hardly been more conspicuous than its social and moral advantages, in removing causes of discontent, in assuaging the bitter sense of wrong, and in uniting all classes of the community in a common bond so firm and true, that the national difficulties which have since occurred only tended to strengthen it, and which has resisted the efforts even of some of those who laboured with Mr. Cobden subsequently to break. In the attainment of all these blessings the late member for Rochdale was God's chosen instrument ; he was the life and soul of the agitation ; and though other men entered before him into the field of labour, and others worked it ably and vigorously, yet the judgment of the country at the time supported, and we believe posterity hereafter will confirm, the opinion of the late Sir Robert Peel, that " the country is indebted for the repeal to the unadorned eloquence of Richard Cobden." How valuable to the peace of the country his achievement was, how timely it occurred, one single reminiscence will be enough to show. The Corn Law Repeal took place in 1846. The last French Revolution took place in 1848. All Europe was convulsed by the latter event. In England we had a slight agitation, and some seditious movements on the part of a few obscure and insignificant men. Yet who can doubt that, if the Corn Laws had remained unrepealed, and that exciting cause of national discontent had not been removed in time, the demonstration of the 10th of April, 1848, would have ended otherwise than it did, in an idle and aimless display. Reminiscences like these are forced upon us by the sudden removal of one of the chief agents in the events, and mingled with sorrow for his loss is the reflection arising out of them, that God has not yet forsaken nor ceased to interfere on behalf of England.

The tide of superstition to which we have adverted on former occasions still runs strong in this country. The celebration of Easter afforded an opportunity for the display of its strength which was not likely to be neglected. We have given, in another page, some account of the abject follies and mummeries practised by the young man who calls himself Brother Ignatius and his followers ; but he is only, as, indeed, some of his sympathisers call him, " a rough pioneer " in the way whither a large and, we fear, increasing proportion of the ultra High Church clergy are tending. On all sides we read of the austerities with which Good Friday was observed, and of the decorations of churches on Easter Sunday. Some of the semi-Romanising journals publish catalogues of the parishes where the festival is thus honoured, and they boast of the ever-increasing number of churches which have their interiors adorned with floral decorations. Of these practices, considered in themselves, we might find little to condemn ; they may probably be classed among things indifferent, and as such, left to the taste of each individual clergyman and his parishioners. It is when they are elevated to the importance of religious observances that they become snares to the conscience, and as such, sternly to be condemned. And as religious observances they are evidently regarded by the great body of those who practise them ; trusted in as outward channels of grace, and sharing the fate, we fear, of all such outward channels, where the form rapidly tends to obscure and obliterate all sense of the substance.

The Rationalist movement may be regarded as in many respects a reaction and protest against the Tractarian practices. To avoid the error of making religion consist in form and outward show, they rush into the opposite extreme of making it entirely a thing of consciousness and feeling. The leaders of these opinions have of late been frequently in the pulpit ; and a sermon preached by one of them, Dr. Temple, of Rugby, one of the " Essayists," has attracted much attention. As one of the Whitehall Lenten preachers, he addressed his congregation from the words, " He spake as one having authority," which he applied, not to the Saviour only, but stated that it was equally true of the Bible itself, which took us in a way no other book did directly into the presence of God. On the subject of the inspiration of that book he was unusually vague, and contended that its narrative of the creation was to be read, not as history, but as poetry, and that the seven days mentioned in it had no reference to time, but were the well-known Hebrew symbol of perfection. More recently the Dean of Westminster, Dr. Stanley, preached in the Abbey ; and while he contended that the religious thought and life of the people in the present day had changed its mode of expression, yet the old forms could be revived by them, and the Church was therefore to be cherished, even though they may not revere its formularies in the spirit of their framers.

Evangelical Alliance.

NOTE.—The Evangelical Alliance is responsible only for what is inserted under this head.

MAY MEETING.

The members and friends of the Evangelical Alliance are invited to the annual soirée in Free-sons' Hall on Thursday evening, May 4. The Rev. William Ashley (one of the vice-presidents of the Evangelical Alliance) will take the chair. Mr. John Stuart, of Rotterdam, will address the meeting on the Religious Condition of Holland, and give information of the arrangements for the next General Conference of Christians of all nations, to be held in Holland in 1866. Mr. Demole and M. Max. Perrot, from Geneva, will speak on the religious and social condition of that city. Tea and coffee at six; public meeting at seven.

ANNUAL CONFERENCE, 1865.

At a meeting of the Alliance Committee in Hull, held March 24, H. J. Atkinson, Esq., was in the chair, it was unanimously resolved:—

"This Committee, desiring to aid the cause of Christian union in this town and elsewhere, and to spread information respecting the objects and operations of the Evangelical Alliance, as well as to afford an opportunity for fraternal intercourse among Christians of all denominations, resolve to invite the British Organization of the Alliance to hold their next annual conference in Hull, and they suggest the last week in September as a suitable time for so doing."

The Committee of Council, at their meeting on March 29, cordially accepted the invitation. Subjects of great interest will be brought before the Conference, it is hoped that there will be a large attendance of the members of the Alliance and other friends of Christian union. The programme of arrangements, subjects of addresses, &c., will be announced as early as possible.

OF SPECIAL PRAYER FOR THE CHILDREN OF CHRISTIAN PARENTS.

In accordance with the invitation issued by the Committee of Council, numerous meetings were held on Wednesday, April 5. It is confidently hoped that the many fervent prayers read this year will find acceptance and yield a vast amount of blessing in the families of believing parents even larger than that of the previous year. In London meetings were held, as last year, in Free-sons' Hall, and were very numerously attended, some 1,200 parents being present in the evening, when Capt. Trotter presided. The Rev. Thomas James, the Rev. J. Harvard, Mr. Soltau, and others, offered prayer. Several requests for special supplication were read, and letters of thanksgiving for answers returned to prayers offered last year. The Rev. A. Brock delivered the address.

The evening meeting was presided over by Mr. Cheetham, Esq., M.P. The Revs. — Mr. J. Howard Hinton, Mr. Robert Baxter, and others, offered prayer. The Rev. Aubrey — gave the address.

OL. XIX.—VI. NEW SERIES.—MAY.

WEEK OF PRAYER IN JANUARY LAST.

In addition to the extracts given in our March number, we have received further communications, showing how extensive and world-wide was the observance of that Week of United Prayer.

To the Secretaries of the Evangelical Alliance.

Constantinople, February 14, 1865.

Dear Brethren,—In answer to yours of Jan. 7, making inquiries in regard to the observance of the Week of Prayer in this vicinity, I would state that the circular letter of the Alliance inviting Christians of all nations to unite in the observance of the week, and suggesting topics for prayer and mutual exhortation, was translated and published by the American missionaries here in both the American and Turkish languages. More than 2,000 copies of these translated circulars were sent out to different parts of the country, and I have every reason to suppose that meetings for prayer were held during the week, with few if any exceptions, among all the Protestant congregations of the land.

In this city the foreign Protestants have their places of residence so far from each other, that but one general meeting was held. At this the attendance was large, considering the very unfavourable state of the weather and the streets. The exercises also were of a deeply interesting character. Other meetings were held during the week in different parts of the city. The native Protestant congregations also have their meetings. At these also the attendance was good, the number present falling but little if at all below the customary attendance on the Sabbath.

A letter from Nicomedia, the ancient capital of Bithynia, reports that while in 1863 the average attendance upon the meetings for prayer at the beginning of the year was only four, and that of 1864 only eighteen, the number present this year, 1865, did not fall below an average of forty persons.

At Smyrna, meetings were held by the foreign Protestants residing there, which "were well attended and very interesting." "The native brethren also of their own accord held similar meetings at their little chapel in the Armenian quarter." Letters received recently from Smyrna report a very encouraging state of religious feeling in the native Protestant church there—"a degree of union and brotherly love among the brethren such as before has been rarely seen."

A letter from Adrianople, in European Turkey, written by the Armenian Protestant preacher, states that daily meetings for prayer were held during the week in that city, with an average attendance of thirty-five. The usual attendance upon the Sabbath is not more than forty.

The daily meetings in Marsovan, in the centre of Asia Minor, were held in the morning, with an attendance of fifty each morning. Those present seemed to manifest a tenderness of feeling and an increased interest in spiritual things.

A letter from Karpoot, beyond the Euphrates, says: "The Week of Prayer here was full of in-efore them either to recant their errors or exiled. Five of the leading men of the were then transported to Cherson, where suffered much in prison; from Cherson re marched to Odessa. Here their case known to Christian friends, who directed a German agricultural colony, Catalni, Itscha. Their sufferings during a ten narch from Nikolaef to Odessa, we are ve been intense. Furnished with letters nmendation to Christian brethren in a, the exiles were taken to Catalni, he colonists, among whom a religious ng of intense spirituality had lately ed itself, received them with open arms as brethren in Christ.

A. A.

of the five exiles, who had been recog- s Turkish subjects by the Pasha of a, went, in December, 1864, back to ntzie, in order to sell their estates and to air families. They were furnished with passports, duly vised by the Russian at Tultscha, and arrived safely at New at the beginning of this year; but the persecution soon again arose against. They were led before the Inspector of ony, to whom they communicated the of their return. He, with great kindli- k their passports from them, under the of sending them to Odessa, in order to rom the Government authority for their ry stay in the village, and for the sale property. But soon afterwards they risoned, are now lying in chains at ; and "threatened by the President of ice at Odessa of being sent to the pro- and of the Russian Government—viz., " hristian brethren at Odessa have brought before the Turkish Consul at Odessa, Pasha of Tultscha. Neither of them will reclaim the prisoners as Turkish subjects, they have been so short a time in hope of these poor persecuted people respondent writes] rests now, under the Christian efforts of the Evan- Alliance, which has hitherto been so lessed by God; and our hearts' prayer your Committee would think of their and day of affliction, and that the all grace and consolation would grant sing also to this effort, and to your in- on in behalf of those who, exiled from mes or imprisoned for conscience' sake, eatly in spirit and in body, and who ideo, be soon brought to beggary."

ears that the charge brought against oners is having returned to Russia passports. Though there were three who had seen them deliver their pas- to the hands of the Inspector, such is or and the intimidation of the persecu- t these people have not the courage of eclaring it.

most satisfactory intelligence has reached mittee of the Evangelical Alliance as to tian and social character of the exiles and sers. They were the most honourable and t farmers of the village, cultivating their perties; they had never been accused of ical crime, nor been before any court ; they were loyal subjects to the Emperor, most conscientiously obeying the laws of their adopted country.

The following is the petition which has been forwarded to the Committee of the Evangelical Alliance by the exiles of Catalni:—

"Dear Brethren,—We, the undersigned colo- nists of the colony of New Dantzic, near Niko- laef, in South Russia, were brought up in the Lutheran Church. When grown up we came— like hundreds of our brethren, by reading and studying the Holy Scriptures—to the knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. From year to year we saw more plainly, from the preaching and the actions of the pastors which were sent to us from the Lutheran Synod of St. Peters- burg, that we could not advance the salvation of our souls in connexion with the Lutheran Church. And as we had not the slightest hope of legally dissolving our connexion with that Church, we joined, on the 5th May, 1864, the communion of the Baptists, and our example was soon afterwards followed by many more.

"Up to this time we were considered to be the first and best among the colonists, and the testimony will be freely given to us that we fulfilled our obligations towards the Imperial Go- vernment most conscientiously and accurately, and never in the least acted contrary to them. In this conviction, and fully assured that the manner of treatment which we have been sub- jected to is not in harmony with the humane and Christian sentiments of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor Alexander II., we feel it our duty to inform the honoured Committee of the Evan- gelical Alliance of our circumstances, and to request them kindly to exercise its influence in our behalf, and to lay our case and our petition before his Most Gracious Majesty the Emperor.

"Our case is this:—

"Immediately after our baptism some vil- lagers went to the pastor, who advised them to obtain from the municipal council of the village a declaration, that a pernicious sect had sprung up in the colony, which they did not desire to tolerate. Upon this being done, the Colonial Inspector, Mr. Czerniawsky, came to our colony and remained four days. We were placed before him, and he submitted to us seven points for signature.

"Five of them referred to our duty and obe- dience to the Government: they were known to us, and had never been transgressed. The two other points contained a prohibition of our pri- vate divine service, and pledged us to hand over to the authorities any fellow-believer who should visit us. We were in conscience bound to refuse consenting and pledging ourselves to these two points. Fearing the possibility of a false report being sent in to the higher authorities, we re- quested the Inspector to grant us passports for St. Petersburg, which were promised. Upon the request of the Inspector not to celebrate any domestic service until his return, we asked him to allow us to celebrate divine worship in the fields, and this was granted by him. Three weeks afterwards we were informed by letter that we could not obtain any passports.

"Hereupon a certain colonist of New Dantzic, of the name of Heinrich Jedecke, offered himself to exterminate our sect. He brought all possible accusations against us. In consequence of his re- ports, Mr. von Ostensacken, adjutant of the Governor-General, appeared at New Dantzic, called the colonists together, put us aside, and

Evangelical Christendom.

THE APOSTOLICAL FATHERS.

ANOTHER work upon the Apostolic Fathers is not necessarily one too many. The interest of the subject is inexhaustible. What Christian would not wish to know how those men spoke, and thought, and wrote, who were the immediate successors of the Apostles—who witnessed the cessation of the extraordinary inspiring influence of the Divine Spirit—who experienced and exhibited the first influence of Christianity, when it was left, unaided by miracle, guided by those ordinary operations of the Spirit which we still enjoy, to commence its long battle with principalities and powers? The colours of the dawn are more lovely than those of noon tide or afternoon, and it was to be expected that, when the heavenly light of Divine Revelation first mingled with the atmosphere of earth, the tints of the clouds and the glittering of the dew-drops would be freshly and radiantly beautiful. Irenæus of Rome, Polycarp, Barnabas, Hermas and Ignatius, are the men whom subsequent ages have honoured with the name of Apostolic Fathers. All of them were contemporaries of John, some of them of Paul and of Peter. The interest attaching to persons thus chronologically placed is, as we said, inexhaustible; yet cannot be affirmed that the majority of good Christian people know much about the Apostolic Fathers. The reason probably is that most people are not controversialists, and that the Apostolic Fathers, instead of being described as men, and contented in the simplicity of their Christian life, have been fought for as prize-fighters in innumerable controversies. Romanists, Protestants, High Churchmen, Low Churchmen, Rationalists, Evangelicals, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, have in turn ransacked their works with a view to finding aid in maintaining their respective positions. Instead of being genially read and liked, the poor men were put to the question. Did you regard the Pope as supreme bishop or did you not? What were your views on Apostolic succession? Were bishops, in your opinion, identical with or different from presbyters? What did you of Synodical authority in relation to pastors and to congregations? When they have been plied with queries relating to the Arian controversy, the Trinitarian controversy, the controversy on the nature and limits of Inspiration. In short to say, the Apostolic Fathers can teach us little in those matters. The ablest authors are now agreed on this point. It may be well to hear one or two of them, since the first condition of a just and sensible appreciation of the character of the Apostolic Fathers, and a correct understanding of what may be learned from them, is to recognise that they stood on an incomparably lower level than the Apostles, and have no claim whatever to the authority of inspired men. "All these writers," says Mosheim, "possessed little learning, genius, or eloquence; but, in their simple and unpolished manner, they express elevated piety. And this is honourable rather than reproachful to the Christian cause. For, that a large part of the human race should have been condescended to by Christ by illiterate and untalented men, shows that the propagation of Christianity must be ascribed, not to human abilities and eloquence, but to a Divine power." No authors could differ more in general spirit and mode of treatment than Mosheim and Neander; but on this subject they agree. "The ecclesiastical writers," says Neander, "who came next after the Apostles, are the so-called Apostolic Fathers, who lived in the age of the Apostles, and are supposed to have been their disciples. A phenomenon, singular in its kind, is the striking difference between the writings of the Apostles and the Apostolic Fathers." B B of the Apostles and those of the Apostolic Fathers, who were so nearly their contemporaries. In other cases, transitions are wont to be gradual, but in this instance we observe a sudden change. There is no gentle gradation here; but all at once an abrupt transition from one style of language to another; a phenomenon which should lead us to acknowledge the fact of a special agency of the Divine Spirit in the souls of the Apostles, and of a new creative element in the first period. The times of the first extraordinary operations of the Holy Ghost were immediately followed by the period of the free development of human nature in Christianity; and here, as in all other cases, the beginnings must be small and feeble before the effects of Christianity could penetrate more widely, and bring fully under their influence the great powers of the human mind." Hase, whose strong rationalistic tendency is notorious, is even stronger than Neander in pointing out the break which occurs between the New Testament writings and those of the Apostolic Fathers. And, not to accumulate testimonies on a point concerning which those of Mosheim and Neander must be deemed conclusive, the late Principal Cunningham, whose consummate scholarship and exact logic are acknowledged by all acquainted with his writings, speaks thus: "The striking contrast between the writings of the Apostles and their immediate successors has been often remarked, and should never be overlooked or forgotten." Clearly, then, the Fathers will not aid us much in determining difficulties which have attended the perusal of the New Testament, and have perplexed the minds of controversialists; it remains to be inquired whether they will aid us in any other way.

N. XIX.—VI. NEW SERIES.—JUNE.

Mr. Donaldson, of Edinburgh, who has just devoted to the Apostolic Fathers the first volume of "A Critical History of Christian Literature and Doctrine from the Death of the Apostles to the Nicene Council"—a volume distinguished by ripe erudition and great general ability—returns an affirmative answer to this question. Setting out with the admission that we need not expect much light from them in the interpretation of the New Testament, that they were not men of profound thought or exact critical faculty, and that therefore "it is absurd to speak of their authority" in theological controversy, he maintains, nevertheless, that much is to be derived from them in the way of instruction and edification. In this we are prepared to agree with him, although we are not sure that the particular lessons which he derives from them are those which they seem to us specially to teach. Every period of history, Mr. Donaldson maintains, "contains a message from God to man," and the age of the Apostolic Fathers has, of course, its own. This general proposition cannot be disputed; it might be affirmed of every word or work wherein the power or wisdom of the Most High is shown forth; and it must apply with peculiar force to the case dealt with by Mr. Donaldson. It is, besides, he observes, a valuable exercise for mind and heart to throw oneself, by force of sympathetic intelligence, into the position and beliefs of men living at a time widely different from our own. It conduces to modesty in our estimate of ourselves, and charity in our sentiments towards others. It tends to widen our range of thought. "These advantages," says Mr. Donaldson, "flow in an especial manner from the unprejudiced study of early Christian literature. The point from which we start is the most momentous in the world's history. The fact which we have to consider is the greatest. Even to the most callous mind Christianity must appear a movement of gigantic importance. The student of early Christian literature traces this great moral movement in the words of those who were influenced by it. He, as it were, speaks with those who felt the first waves of the Spirit's influence; and he examines their modes of thought, that he may see how Christ's Gospel changed their whole being, and how in consequence they worked in and in the world. At the same time he has to rid himself of most of his modern sociations. He has to transport himself into a time when the very modes of conception and expression were widely different from those of this age, and he has to realise a thousand influences which acted most powerfully on them, but which have now vanished for ever. If he really feels that he is of one spirit with those old workers for Christ, if he is ready to stretch forth the right hand of fellowship to them, his sympathies will flow largely with most divisions of the present Christian Church, however diverse on some points their beliefs."

All this is true, and, in order that his work on the Fathers may convey to us these advantages, Mr. Donaldson makes it his object to be rigidly impartial, non-controversial, and correct. "My main effort," he says, "has been simply to record the theological doctrines of the early Christian writers, with an anxious desire to state accurately, without exaggeration or distortion, what they thought." That Mr. Donaldson has succeeded in this object is proved by the fact that his quotations from the Fathers, and his statement of their opinions, are so ample and so fair, that he occasionally draw an inference from them different from that suggested by himself. He appears to us to be sometimes too decided in forming what may be called premature conclusions. When something is not said, he infers that it was not known or believed. This does not necessarily follow. It is possible to hold a doctrine—to state it in express logical form—and yet to refer to the truth it embodies in a manner entirely independent of theological formula. Would any one in writing a sermon allude to a point of doctrine in the same way in which he would state it if required to embody it in a creed, catechism, or confession of faith? In one case, he would glance at one of its sides or phases, he would touch at some point where it had special momentary application to the matter at hand; in the other, he would state point after point in symmetrical exposition, including all that it implied, and excluding everything else. Would it not be illogical to conclude from the necessarily partial statement of the doctrine that only a part of the doctrine was held? The doctrine of the Trinity is illustrated in point. In the New Testament, as we maintain, there is complete recognition of the doctrine that Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are one God. For more than a thousand years the scriptural evidence of this doctrine has been brought forth in its completeness by the Christian Church, and the doctrine stated explicitly and fully. But, in the writings of the Apostolic Fathers, intervening as they do between the promulgation of the New Testament and the formal elaboration of the doctrine of the Trinity by the Church, there is no express or symmetrical recognition of Trinity in Unity and Unity in Trinity. Does it therefore follow that the Apostolic Fathers were, as Mr. Donaldson calls them, "heterodox on the Trinity?" No, we reply, if their statements on the subject are irreconcilable with the orthodox view; and we do not find that Mr. Donaldson makes this assertion. The expressions they made use of appear to us to agree accurately with the hypothesis that they held the doctrine substantially as we hold it, but were unconscious of any necessity for stating it in logical form. No one would be likely to use the words, "Christ is God" unless he felt that the fact alleged was not familiarly known to those to whom he wrote, or unless he were aware that it was controverted by heretics. What Christian minister in the present day would write to a friend, or address to a congregation, the words, "There is but one God?" In a thousand expressions he implies this, but he never makes the statement in terms. The Apostolic Fathers, in like manner, made use of countless expressions in which the superiority of Christ to all created existences was affirmed, in which He was referred to as an object of worship, in which honour was claimed for Him befitting only a Divine Being. Had they been asked whether this Jesus of whom they said so much was clusive on this point. "Let us"—the words are those of Clement

"reverence the Lord Jesus Christ, whose blood was given for us."
"On account of the love which He had to us, Jesus Christ our Lord for us by the will of God, even flesh for our flesh, and soul for our soul modern Evangelical, profoundly convinced that the sacrifice of Christ justice, demand more explicit language than this? Once more, therefore to pronounce the Fathers heterodox because they did not use the terms or other speculators on the philosophy of the Atonement.

Obviously, however, the proof of orthodoxy which may be adequate of the Apostolic Fathers will not prove that those who adopt their principles in modern times are sound in the faith. A child of five may be a proficiency which in a boy of twelve would be irreparable.
If every age has its own message from God to man, surely teen centuries of Christianity, we ought to know better what message is than the Apostolic Fathers. In point of fact, had been such masters of systematic theology as the ablest modern times, the miracle of their attainment would have been level with that of inspiration itself. They had not a complete New —the books were all in existence, but the Church had not fixed the canon. They had no opportunity of collating the New Testament, as the Old Testament, as a whole. The Gospels and Epistles were in the they had no precise ideas as to the limitation of the inspiring influence period—they had no clear conception that inspiration had ended and was closed. This is demonstrated by the fact that the letter of Clement the Corinthian Church, as well as the epistle of Barnabas, were churches along with the canonical Scriptures. The blaze of inspiration recently been withdrawn, that the Church believed the mystic effulgence poured forth. Centuries had to elapse before the scheme of Divine inspiration be apprehended in its wholeness, and the grand organic features of Divine be traced out by the systematising human intellect. But the limits have long been practically beyond dispute, and we are taught from our air morality was pure ; in the midst of gross materialism, the spirituality of their aversation and tone of mind was exalted. God was in all their thoughts ; and ture, instead of a confused medley of forces elevated by polytheistic idolatry into ds, was to them a manifestation of Divine wisdom and of Divine law. When emens, for example, writes to the Corinthians, exhorting them to peace and oord, he points to the spectacle of harmony presented by the visible universe as ething which, for Christians, must have an august and authoritative significance. e passage is so devout and beautiful, as well as characteristic, that we r it before the reader. "The heavens," he says, "moved by His manage- nt, are obedient to Him in peace. Day and night run the course pointed by Him, nowise hindering each other. Sun and moon and the ruses of the stars roll on in harmony according to His command, within ir prescribed limits, without any deviation. The pregnant earth, according to s will, sends up at the proper seasons nourishment abundant for men and beasts l all the living things that are on it, neither hesitating nor altering any of the rees issued by Him. The inexplorable parts of abysses and the inexplicable angements of the lower world are bound together by the same ordinances. The t immeasurable sea, gathered together into various basins according to His hioning, never goes beyond the barriers placed round it, but does as He has manded. For He said : 'Thus far shalt thou come, and thy waves shall be ken within thee.' The ocean, impassable to men, and the worlds beyond it, are xted by the same commands of the Lord. The seasons of spring and summer l autumn and winter give place to each other in peace. The stations of the winds the proper season perform their service without hindrance. The overflowing ntains, fashioned for enjoyment and health, never fail to afford their breasts to rish the life of men. And the smallest of living things meet together in peace l concord. All these the great Fashioner and Lord of all has appointed to be in ce and concord ; doing good to the whole, but exceedingly abundantly to us who e fled for refuge to His mercies through our Lord Jesus Christ, to whom be glory l majesty for ever and ever. Amen." Compare with that the highest utterances Pagan philosophy, the loftiest flight of academic or stoical ethics, and you will have e idea of the elevation and spirituality to which the religion of Jesus, imme- tely after its communication to the world, raised simple minds and childlike rts. And the secret of deriving instruction and edification from the Apostolic thers is just this—to study their writings with a view to learning, not what they de of Christianity, but what Christianity made of them. It is because it enables to form a vivid idea of the character, personality, habits of thought and feeling, the Apostolic Fathers, that Mr. Donaldson's book has extraordinary value and a gular and enchaining interest ; but we should have several points to discuss with a before we could assent to all he says as to the relation in which they stood to matic theology.

B.

OUR ATMOSPHERE.

L our days we have been living at the bottom of an invisible ocean ; and because s invisible we do not think much about it, and are scarcely conscious of it. Of creatures which inhabit the aqueous ocean, some can rise to the surface, and some, e the flying fish, can for a moment emerge and fling themselves into the space ond. But we are not able to get to the top of our ocean, so as, nautilus-fashion, ow about on the summit—if summit there be. Bound by heavy laws, just as umps and other crustaceans walk at the bottom of the tide, whilst fishes spread ir fins and float overhead, we are obliged to creep about at the bottom of our ocean, hammer is for the main part made up of these light, elastic, viewless pa

And there is a spiritual atmosphere. Because it does not descend like hailstones or hard meteorites—because we do not knock our head against the wall or pillar—we forget the air which is all above us and before us meets us wheresoever we go. And so of this moral or spiritual atmosphere, after all, the breath of our inner life—the pabulum which keeps up and so preserves the mental machine in motion. Call it influence—call it the spirit of the times, or the genius of the age—call it the tone or call it the life and power of godliness—every man is surrounded by a spiritual atmosphere—fresh or foul, wholesome or deleterious—which he is inhaling, and by the state of which the health, the growth, the vigour must be, to a great extent, determined.

We may go farther, and say that there are several atmospheres, just as there is of a maritime air and an inland, the air of the plains and of the hills—there is a world atmosphere and a church atmosphere; there is a certain atmosphere characteristic of every age, of every society or set of people, yes, and of every day. And in such an atmosphere it is hardly possible to be steeped and immersed day without being materially affected and modified.

For instance, there is something very stimulating in the present time—surprising and energetic—full of bold schemes and brilliant discoveries and revolutions. If you want your likeness, the sun will take it in a twinkling; you want to travel, instead of footing the weary miles, you shall be projected in a tube, or along the glossy path of polished iron shall gleam like an arrow; although that mark should be far across the cloud-capped hills, or deep in the morrow. Do you want tidings of the absent friend? The globe is one mighty nervous system with a thousand million heads—one vast universal eye and ear, telling to each separate sensorium what all is doing in every spot between the burning tropic and the frozen seas. And with the steam out of oil, with dull earths burnished into silvery metal, or blazing with splendour, with oceans bridged and lightnings tamed, it is not wonderful that we should grow giddy as it spins along, or talk a little wildly as the Christianity. Missions, for example, we wish to be instantly successful, and we insist that their products shall be miraculous men. Being ourselves angelic—leading as of habitual devotion, and from either outstretched hand scattering fruits of holiness and blossoms of beauty on that world which our tip-toe scarcely touches—we expect something more glorious still in the recent reprisals from heathenism. And just as we are disappointed if the moment a missionary takes his stand under the mango-tree shade, the whole village does not come wondering to his feet, and weeping at his message, and finish off with a bonfire of idols—just as we are disappointed if a Chinese Christian does not show a seraphic superiority to filthy lucre, or if a New England convert smitten on the one cheek does not at once turn the other also: so we are disappointed if the sermons preached to ourselves are not thrilling sensations. We are disappointed if they do not raise us to some third heaven of emotional exaltation, or from some safe prophetic pinnacle show us an awful Armageddon which is coming off next year, or at the very latest the year thereafter. And the only thing with which we are not disappointed is our personal progress. Because the ship whose deck we are pacing makes ten knots an hour, we think our rate of sailing quite wonderful. Because the palm on which we are parasites has shot up so fast, we fancy that we are each year adding a cubit to our stature. Because the time is so swift and eager, we imagine ourselves active and earnest, and growing in wisdom: whilst looking at others running to and fro, we take for granted that our own knowledge is increasing.

The age is rationalistic. Some of the fathers made the fatal mistake of treating faith and reason as opposites—as almost foes to one another; and on the principle, "It is absurd, therefore I believe it: it is impossible, therefore I adore it," through the middle ages the minds of men lay tamely buried beneath Papal infallibility and transubstantiation and the most monstrous ecclesiastical legends. The Reformation was not only the revival of spiritual life, but along with it, and to a large extent mixed up with it, came the revival of good sense; the revolt of reason against the bondage of superstition, as well as the resurrection of apostolical Christianity from the bondage of corruption; and in the great explosion which brought down a third part of the Papacy, it was not only the Mass and Purgatory and Mary-worship which were blown away, but a clear space was left without wonder-working relics, without pilgrimages, without ghostly fathers able to shut the doors of heaven and hell, without priestly confessors able to bestow or withhold salvation at their pleasure.

In this removal of old-world rubbish the Reformation was mightily helped by men who were not eminently religious—men like Erasmus and Ulrich von Hutten; and this part of their work was seconded and carried full length by Bacon and the inductive Philosophy. And now we have not only reached the full noon of reason, but, elated by the march of intellect, some begin to speak as if from this blazing light religion, as well as superstition, must shortly flee away.

And though the believer who has found a Saviour, and who has felt his faith, is not likely to be much disturbed, we do fear that the freedom with which all things are canvassed, and the flippant tone in which many talk, will prevent some from ever becoming rooted and grounded in the truth, and will be to others a welcome cloak for their carelessness; whilst many who have too much sense to surrender the facts of history to the peradventures of hypothesis, and who have no idea that because Europe has ceased to believe in goblins and witches it must abandon the Gospel and Acts of Apostles, are still troubled in mind and injured in spirit by the prevailing irreverence. Though our unbelief cannot alter the truths of God, an atmosphere of incredulity may harm those who habitually breathe it; and loyal as

And what is the gain of high culture—logical precision, accurate information, exquisite refinement—if we lose higher tastes and holier affections? Speaking of the pious people whom he knew in his youth, Mr. Jay remarks: "Their attachment to the means of grace was intense; nor would they suffer distance, or weather, or ight indispositions, to detain them. The Sabbath was their delight, and they numbered the days till its arrival. And as to the poorer of them—

Though pinched with poverty at home,
With sharp afflictions daily fed;
It made amends, if they could come To God's own house for heavenly bread.

"These services were remembered and talked over for days and weeks after; for the sermons they heard, if not highly polished, left effects which were as goads, and as nails fastened in a sure place. They also seemed to have more veneration for the scriptures, and to peruse them with more directness, simplicity, and docility; for the Bible had not yet been turned into a work of science, rather than of faith, and everlasting criticism, rather than of devotion." * Science and criticism are poor substitutes for a living Saviour. At the same time, when science and criticism have done their part, we may hope that the Bible will be better understood, and, if so, the Saviour will assuredly be more highly enthroned and more tenderly endeared. We think we see some dangers of our day—ominous signs of the times; and yet we have faith in God. From the dark and dusky bud we expect a beauteous flower, and as long as there is a sun above we expect that clear weather will be the survivor of every cloud. We do not think the blessed God would have brought the world so far as we now find it, and then abandon it for ever—even as we do not think He could have bestowed such a costly largess as the great Redemption without contemplating some more glorious outcome than the existing Christianity. We do not think that men of vast intellect or high refinement are necessarily men of cold affection, and we know no reason why men of the severest logic and most accurate formation should not be men of deep devotion and ardent piety. And we long to see the conciliation when the soundest sense and the truest spirituality shall exist together; when information shall not be flippant and intellect shall not be arrogant, cause faith shall not be timid, and no knowledge shall be true which does not take in the knowledge of the Lord; and when a world far more attractive and enjoyable than the present shall be so much nearer the Father's house as to make the transition welcome—good to be here, and to be there "far better." H.

JESUITISM. †

RARELY, indeed, can an author venture to put forth three works on the same subject without fear of "over-writing" himself. "The Nun" and "Under the Ban" both had a great success. We are told that of the first of these works ten editions were called for in less than that number of months; and we have no doubt the book before us will not fail to be widely read in France. The religious novel is of more recent introduction there than it is in this country. Besides, public events in France give to works of this kind an importance which they can rarely hope to obtain among us. Where a whole nation is waiting, hanging on the breath of their ruler, feverishly anxious to gauge his feelings towards the priesthood, we can well understand that an author may attack the subject again and again without in the least exhausting the patience of his readers. To us, the argumentative parts of the

* Jay's Autobiography, p. 176.

† Le Jésuite. Par l'Abbé ———, Auteur du Maudit et de la Religieuse. Paris, Librairie Internationale, 1865.

French Chambers on April 10 was sadly significant, when taken in connection with the liberal demonstrations which the Government was supposed to have made not long ago. It is disappointing, after M. Rouland's promising speech, President Schneider stopping MM. Favre and Garnier Pagès from reading Emile Ollivier's reactionary oration, and at the same time passing a vote of thanks to the Emperor for admitting the French archbishops to the Senate, and for having done for the Catholic religion." What will happen who can tell? It is not probable that such a change as would secure anything like substantial liberty to the Church is yet too much to be hoped for.

In M. Michon's "Under the Ban" we had the history of a good, honest man, proscribed—literally hunted to death—by the Jesuits, because he is good and a strenuous opponent of the overweening claims of the spiritual power, and because he and his sister are the heirs of an old aunt, whom the worldlings wish to get into their power, and persuade to will away her property. Naturally, the man is indignant, goes to law, very nearly gains his case, and (losing it) secures the law, those who never forgive, and whose power for mischief is enormous. The book is full of the "temporal power" of the Pope, the bondage in which the clergy are kept, the bishops, who can transfer a man from one cure to another, the pomp and circumstance of the higher clergy, so thoroughly different from Apostolic simplicity, and incidentally discussed, and remedies proposed, in the book of which we have just spoken. "The Nun" describes the adventures of a lady in search of a convent: the story is very sensational in it. The condemnation of the monastic system is all the more convincing owing to the quiet way in which the author attacks it—not on the ground of its startling immorality (this for France, at any rate, he strenuously denies) but because of its hollowness and miserable littleness, and because, while it does not raise to higher things, it makes the "spy system" a regular part of its life. We should remark that, in both these former works, the Abbé asserts that he is an orthodox Romanist, condemns Protestantism, as he does, on the ground that he is an unhappy and weakening schism, and maintains that he is justified in doing so, on the ground that every member of the Church has the right to do so, provided he does not touch dogmas. Still, though he re-asserts everywhere, and in Italy "religious" persons of all kinds, are described as being very lax in regard to those temptations which we Protestants have always been apt to connect with celibacy. A Jesuit's business is to promote the interests of the Order, not to save his own soul; and so young, handsome men, if they be telling teachers, are forced into the hotbed of Parisian society; and if the sins of the flesh take root in them, why the offence is looked on as much more venial than the least opposition to the Society's commands, the least questioning of its rules, would have been. Tanquam ac cadaver is the Jesuit's motto—the total annihilation of self—not, unhappily, that God may be all in all in the heart, but that the man may be ready and able to carry out unhesitatingly whatever work he is set to accomplish. This is why Jesuitism is rightly characterised as the subtlest device of the enemy. Self-denial is the basis of all true Christian life: it is likewise the law of the Jesuit's existence. But then how different the motives which in the two cases keep the man in action when the strong spring of selfishness is taken away. With the true Christian, the love of God shed abroad in the heart takes the place which selfishness occupied in the natural man; with the Jesuit "obedience," blind and unquestioning, to the Superior is the rule; the will of another man, and not the will of God, has triumphed over the individual will and affections; and so we may well say that the last state of such men is worse than the first. When we look to results, the difference is just as striking. The Christian strives by the Spirit's help to mould his will more and more after God's will, that he may work the works of God. The Jesuit surrenders his will to his Superior, that he may be a ready instrument in promoting schemes of worldly power, and above all, in helping to fill the coffers of the Society. The scarcely disguised worldliness of the Jesuits has never been better exposed than in the work before us: the love of money has taken hold of them; they have an organised system of fortune-hunting, and never do they let a rich childless person die without moving heaven and earth to gain at least a portion of the property. In some conversations recorded in these volumes, the General of the Order quite laughs at the idea of voluntary poverty. "The modern world [he says] is moved by money. If we mean to do anything, we must be rich. The hair shirt and spare diet were all very well in the dark ages; but wealth is the great power now-a-days, and the Jesuit, to be successful, must be able to command it, and must aim at being, not an awkward ascetic, but a man able to shine in any social circle whatsoever. The revenue of our Order exceeds that of a good many third-rate kingdoms." Political influence and money so valuable as a means of maintaining political influence, especially where, as at home, everything has its price) are what these men deny themselves, giving up their own will, to obtain for their Order. Poor, low aims, truly; but then their Jesuitism, imposing at a distance, appears throughout poor and contemptible on a nearer survey. They set out with the grand idea of establishing a universal theocracy; they end by putting their own petty interests in the place of God, and by seeking to set forward his world-wide spiritual dominion by a host of back-stairs intrigues and petty tricks of diplomacy, in which (after all) they are generally worsted in the long run by those whom they seek to undermine. They succeed very well in ruining their friends; they often gain a negative triumph over their opponents; but, except the expulsion of Louis Philippe, to effect which they threw all their influence into the scale of republicanism, our author can point to very few of their successes which have been more than transitory. He claims a thorough acquaintance with all the secrets of the Order, giving us their private rules, explaining the cypher system by which the General corresponds with the chiefs of the Order, entering into particulars which do not seem to be invented, and which (if genuine) prove that the writer must have been through most of the scenes which he describes. Two new facts he brings promiwhom the true secret purpose of the Order—to establish an authority : other, even to that of the Pope—is made known. Even they are not alone ; they think they are sole accredited agents, but (all the while) haps some humbler, “ brother ” is watching them and reporting ever head-quarters. Jesuitism, in fact, is a complete system of espionage the novice is taught is that such a system—so revolting to the best nature—is excusable, nay, praiseworthy, when employed to further t terests. Now, how is it that, in a country like France, a subtle web have been thrown over so large a section of society, cramping its vitality, as surely as the spider's web kills the fly ; often (like th brushed away by the hand of violence, but always replaced as soon force has been removed ? It is because the Jesuits have got so firm education of the country. Hence they not only gain more or less power of all except the very few who can pass through their training unchanged family secrets, which often enable them to fix their hold on persons who be independent of them. The novel before us shows how valuable t are in strengthening the foundations of the Society. The hero, young noble family, is trained at St. Acheuil ; his mother wishes him to be an enthusiastic boy, fired by the ambition of belonging to such a powerful body ; and he determines not only to be a priest, but to be after his mind is made up, his brother dies, and his parents entreat him and take his place as future head of the Ste. Maure family ; but no ; always says, “ I had a father, a mother, &c., when I was in the world ” the novice begins by wringing his mother's heart and carrying through disobedience. We cannot enter much into the details of his training “ sensation ” way he discovers that his “ director,” a man of great talent much ability as a preacher, is carrying on an intrigue with a Countess's child is the fruit of this unhallowed love ; and the personal interest of very much upon the fortunes of this poor girl, whom the Fathers first recognised as the Count de Flaviac's daughter, and then succeed in restoring her mother's and of her wretched father's fortune. Besides all

For a liberal Pope will run the risk of being assassinated. So, despite the influence of the Jesuits, Mastai-Ferretti, who bids fair to be a liberal, is chosen; only, however, to fall in a few months under the yoke of the Jesuit College. They prove to him that no Pope can get on without them; and he so thoroughly accepts the Pope's traditional place as second in command to the General of the Order—puppet king, master indeed before the eyes of men, but inferior to him in all the essentials of power—that the Carbonari gnash their teeth with rage at his defection, the Revolution breaks out in Rome, and Pope, Jesuits, and all, have to quit the city. This is just exactly what the holy Fathers wish. They are confident that they will be brought back somehow, though they do not quite foresee that their return will be effected by French bayonets; and, of course, the Pope is safe never to think of reform again after having been so badly treated by reformers. We in England are bound to be sorry for the failure of any attempt to carry out liberal principles at Rome; but we confess we do not sympathise very deeply with conspirators of the Carbonari type; they are too much like the Jesuit whom they oppose; their desperate schemes and underhand plotting are a sad instance of that "wrath of man" which "worketh not the righteousness of God." Like so many other evil things, they are a direct product of the Papal system. Intolerable oppression, most maddening because administered by priests—servants of him who claims to be the vicegerent of God upon earth; oppression from which escape is hopeless, for foreign interference bars the way; this the sure recipe for producing Carbonarism, red Republicanism, any of those Continental protests against tyranny from which we, by virtue of our freedom, are happily exempt. We cannot sympathise with such people, just because we happily have never been placed in circumstances like theirs; but we can understand how they come to be what they are, and cannot find it in our hearts to condemn them.

The closing chapters of the book describe the hero's attempt to reform the suit body. He is (as we said) an enthusiast, devoted to his Order. When all the chives are opened to him, the secret history of past centuries explained, the rings of action of the great Society laid bare—when, in fact, he becomes one of the higher order of the initiated, he is captivated with the grandeur of the idea by which the heads of the Order—at any rate from Acquaviva downwards—have been actuated. Further reflection, however, interviews with Father Ventura, with the sure Pope, Cardinal Mastai, and, above all, with the confidential agent of the Count de Chambord—all these somewhat shake his faith in the perfect adaptation of suitism to modern times. He is sent on a secret mission to see which will make the best bid for Jesuit help, in view of the coming expulsion of Louis Philippe—the Legitimists or the Republicans. The Legitimists decline, in toto, making any promises, and rather twit the envoy with forgetting his nationality in the service of such "universal aliens" as the men whose boast it is to have no country, no patriotism. The Republicans say they mean to act on the broad principles of liberty and equality; but for fraternity, they won't promise much of that so long as the Jesuits continue what they are. Our hero gets into his head an idea still grander than that of the old fathers of the Order: supposes he can reform the body—bring it up to the requirements of modern times; preserve its admirable organization, and at the same time strip off its love of wealth, its spy system, its incredible meannesses, its unbearable repression. What a blessing for the Church (thinks he) to have such a body of workers, indelible, one and all, in the good cause, instead of in the bad one. He tries, working craftily, on the principle, "pour Jésuite, Jésuite et demi"—a good many of the fathers think with him—a grand conclave is held at Rome, the Jesu—reform is on the point of being carried—when the General of the Order, whose motto is that by which the Jesuits have always answered temporaries was the Society of Jesus, and the more truly Popish a F more does he approach the spirit of Loyola and Malagrida, of Ricci and Sisters of Charity, barefooted Benedictines—these and many more n doing a good work among our poor outcasts ; but so long as the inf Pope and his right to temporal power are dogmas of Romanism, so always be the danger lest what seems at the outset harmless, nay, should grow up into the horrible system of withering repression and which (without extravagance or apparent exaggeration) this work of l furnishes such an unanswerable condemnation.

Foreign Intelligence.

FRANCE.

—, France, May, 1865.

THE MONTH OF MARY.

While I write this letter, the Church of Rome is exhibiting her most pompous pageants and celebrating her most brilliant festivals. You are aware that I speak of the worship paid to the Virgin Mary. The entire month of May is exclusively devoted to her. At this period of the year God and Jesus Christ are banished to an inferior position, and scarcely obtain a brief and cool mention. The preachers fill their sermons with the merits, the virtues, the graces, and the merciful deeds of Mary. If we are to believe these ardent apostles of the Papacy, the Virgin accomplishes all that is necessary for the human race. She obtains chanting music, in which take part, illuminations in the clerical seminaries, and

What are the results of Assuredly there are here excite public curiosity, and impressions are thus produced upon the male portion of the population. In the evening, the Papal sanctuaries are especially at the close of the day are fond of striking the senses of the multitude.

of the congregations show enthusiasm ; but still the especially by the presence of charms of music.

There is in this a sort of but it is a false and empty ch which accords to a simple creature the age and adoration due alone to God, our tor and Redeemer.

he same with the Freethinkers and in- a. If the Popish clergy hope to achieve triumph by such means, they are grievously ived. The enemies of the Gospel find in e almost idolatrous exhibitions new argu- ts against the Christian religion. And thus IX. believes that the worship of the aculate Virgin will strengthen his tem- d power, he will be disabused by the e of events. Neither the French who at all educated, nor the Italians, will have respect for a communion in which science conscience yield the first place to such nmeries.

REGULAR ALLEGATIONS OF THE JESUITS.

must point out another aberration of the ical party, which has furnished matter for e keen epigrams. The disciples of Loyola e devised a plan of explaining all events be profit of their pretensions, and of in- erting after their own fashion the designs Providence. Here is an example. You aware that the heir-apparent of the Czar under II. died lately at Nice, at the age twenty-two. This is a sad loss to the erial family of Russia, but there is no- g extraordinary in it. What do the con- ors of the Jesuit journal, the Monde, e of it? They say that the death of this g prince coincided, day for day, with the ation delivered last year by the Pope st Alexander II., with reference to nd. So, according to their interpreta- God punished the son of the Czar, by g him to a premature end, in order to tion the Papal anathemas.

he same proceeding is adopted by these ical writers with respect to the Italian smen and superior officers who are re- ed from this world. If a counsellor of or Emmanuel, or a general, dies before ing extreme old age, it is a judgment, castigation from God, according to the its. The disciples of Loyola even invent ular circumstances and accidents, and all is attributed to a Divine decree, which shes the adversaries of the Papal See. Garibaldi should expire to-morrow, you be sure that these reverend personages dd find means of explaining his death as result of a special interposition of ven.

And I add that the journals of the al party reply to these scandalous alle- as by bitter jests? They ask if the Jesuits are admitted to the Divine counsels, if the Supreme Ruler of the world reveals His secrets to them, and if He submits to the orders or the wishes of the clerical faction. Will the advocates of Romanism never learn that there are limits which, from a mere sense of propriety, should never be passed; and that assertions so unwarranted, far from favouring their cause, serve only to compromise it still more?

ANTI-ROMISH WORKS WRITTEN BY PRIESTS.

Facts are occurring in the camp of the Romish priesthood which betray the existence of wide dissensions. While the leaders of Ultramontane opinion fail in every rule of prudence and common sense, certain of the inferior clergy display a more decided disposition to revolt. I spoke in one of my former letters of a book, composed by a priest, and entitled Le Maudit. It was a narrative, half true, half fictitious, of a curé who is the victim of abominable persecution on the part of his spiritual rulers, because he has adopted and put in practice liberal ideas.

Another work of the same kind, written also by a priest, bears the title, La Religieuse. Here is a revelation of scenes of jealousy, disorder, and cruelty, which occur in the interior of convents. These are painted to the life, and are calculated to inspire a keen aversion to monasticism. This book has been read by thousands of persons, and it will certainly deter not a few young women from entering those cloisters, which are like premature sepulchres.

I have now before me a new publication, entitled, Christ at Rome, or the Last King-Pontiff, by the Abbé —. Everybody easily understands why the author has not given his name. The lower order of priests have no security for their independence; they are in some sort the slaves of the bishops, who submit themselves to the domination of the Jesuits; and if a humble abbé did not take care to conceal his authorship, after having attacked the abuses of the Papacy, he would be immediately ejected.

In this case the Abbé — supposes that Jesus Christ goes to Rome, in these last times, in the garb of an old Nazarene, and that He penetrates into the secret councils of the Pope and the cardinals. The stranger, whose appearance is venerable and whose voice is grave, addresses to the princes of the Roman Church the most vehement reproaches on their ambition, their avarice, their dissolute lives, and their tyranny. He accuses them of having distorted the Gospel, correnounce his temporal sceptre, to abolish superstitions, to authorise the marriage of the priests, and to return to the doctrine and discipline of the primitive Church.

What are we to conclude from this work, and others like it, which have been written by certain of the clergy? That into the lower ranks of the Romish priesthood the spirit and the want of a great reform have penetrated. The fire is hidden under the ashes; but it finds inflammable materials, and it spreads; and if a new revolution should break out in France, it is probable that a considerable part of the ecclesiastics of the dominant religion would give the signal of revolt against the Jesuit party.

TWO ADDRESSES BY M. GUIZOT.

The general meetings of our Protestant religious societies were held at the end of the month of April and the beginning of May. I leave to your special Paris correspondent the duty of communicating to you details respecting the labours and cheering success of these different institutions. My task must be limited to mentioning that which is of general interest in the developments of French Protestantism.

M. Guizot, who, in spite of his advanced age, is still full of zeal and activity, delivered two addresses—one before the Religious Tract Society, and the other before the Society for Primary Instruction—which deserve to be noticed in our correspondence.

The illustrious speaker fully approves of the Religious Tract operations and thinks ture. But he does not apply the principle of instruction being universal and compulsory. He says that we are in a condition to make the education of their children be relieved from this duty of gratuitous instruction granted only to the poorest. Legal obligation, or constraint, is bad, and that Protestantism would suffer by it, because forced, in many parishes, to send children to Roman Catholic schools. I do not here discuss the views of Guizot. Opinions may differ; but the honourable speaker hesitated to speak with the sincerity, and this is an example being followed.

SPECIAL CONFERENCES

While the religious meetings were proceeding, there were also Conferences in Paris. Some of these are the Reformed and Lutheran National Churches alone have laid delegates from the Consistory present. Other Conferences are because the pastors and members of the Independent or munions have also a deliberation. I shall analyse, in the discussions which took place.

In the Special Conferences of Principles, proposed last year was the subject of a new ical ability which recalled to mind the brilliant days of his political struggles. If, the Declaration of Principles has anctioned anew by 130 votes against This is a considerable majority, and all re remarkable because the Rationalists ne all that was in their power to sum- Paris a great number of their friends. ery just remark was made in the course e debates. The Protestant Radicals h men of Evangelical sentiments, now eing servile echoes of the past, and rith having abandoned the belief of times. These accusations are contra- If the Orthodox of our day no profess all the dogmatic opinions of they display their love of liberty ; and act as free men, how can they be with servility ? The fact is, that ism, not being able to defend itself is own ground, seeks everywhere for retexts in order to discredit the r and acts of its opponents.

GENERAL CONFERENCES.

he General Conferences, a question, at ry important and very precise, was d. It may be put in the following Is belief in the resurrection of Jesus necessary to the Christian Church, and ministers and members of that Church ? be owned that one of the gravest and phenomena of our time is revealed imple announcement of this question. are there individuals who claim the pastors, who exercise its functions, amemorate the festival of Easter, and do not admit the reality of the re- on of Christ ? Yes : and they even a, besides, that they are the most ned, and the best of Christians. perfluous to say that the Orthodox ergetically established the absolute r of admitting the fundamental fact of urrection, in regard to those who e name and privileges of disciples of

But on this occasion the Radicals ad a curious spectacle. Some among openy reject the miracle of the tion. Others are undecided, and to pronounce either for or against : s studying, and searching, and decide ; Others, in fine, continue to believe miracle ; but they were afraid of eparated from their friends.

o complicated and embarrassing a posi- how did the Radicals act ? They up a very obscure declaration, accord- which, as they pretend, belief in the authority of the teaching of Jesus is inde- pendent of His bodily re-appearance ; and, having placed in the hands of the chairman this document, bearing fifty-two signatures, they went out of the meeting, refusing to take part in the vote with which it con- cluded. This desertion signifies that the Radicals dare not yet, at least for the most part, confess their negations before the Pro- testants of France ; and that they envelop themselves in clouds and equivocal terms, in order to continue to perform the functions of pastor. We shall see whether our churches will long endure such dissimulation.

It is evident that, in such circumstances, the friends of the Gospel have important obligations to fulfil. They must labour to dissipate this darkness, to instruct the people, to show them the abyss towards which we should be fatally drawn if there were not some positive doctrines, some fixed points, beyond which it is no longer possible to recognise the Christian faith. All lawful means ought to be used : preaching, the pe- riodical press, religious tracts, family visitation, &c. Light ! light ! this is our watchword, and our security for the future.

Evangelical men will not be wanting for the performance of these duties. They are upon firm ground, and the blessing of the Lord will attend their generous endeavours.

X. X. X.

THE FRENCH PROTESTANTS AND THE LATE PRESIDENT LINCOLN.

The Pastoral Conferences mentioned above adopted two addresses of condolence with re- ference to the assassination of President Lin- coln—one to be presented to the Minister of the United States in Paris, having reference especially to the loss sustained by the Ame- rican people ; the other for transmission to the widow of the deceased President. The follow- ing is a translation of the latter document :—

Madam,—We have learnt with utter dismay the news of the crime which has just placed your family and the entire people of the United States in mourning, and which has so suddenly changed the song of triumph and thanksgiving into lamen- tation. The name of Abraham Lincoln was the symbol, in our eyes, of one of the noblest causes that can inflame the heart ; and it is at the very moment when that cause comes forth victorious from a cruel struggle that he to whom belongs the chief honour in connexion with it falls a victim to a senseless fanaticism. The horror inspired by such a deed was the only thing wanting to slavery ; it is the consecration of the victory, the glory round the head of the defender of liberty.

Madam, we will not seek to console you with the idea of the renown henceforth attached to the name of your husband, whom future ages ther all His children, illustrious or obscure, round Jesus Christ, who gave His life for the salvation of the world. We pray that the indignation roused by this abominable crime may not was established—namely, P was recently founded the emancipated negroes.

THE PROTESTANT ANNIVERSARIES IN PARIS

Paris, May 20, 1865.

During the last week in April, so charged with facts of eventful public interest, the Protestant annual meetings were held in the capital. The news from America of Abraham Lincoln's assassination fell like a thunderbolt amongst us, and gave the utmost intensity to prayer for the United States, to active benevolence towards the four millions of emancipated slaves, and to expressions of the deepest sympathy with the bereaved nation and family.

The meetings in themselves partook of the predominant character of the piety of the present day. Much head-work, straining after lofty thought, and shooting over the heads of the masses. It was difficult, on coming out of the Conferences, where Christian men had to fight intellectual subtleties slight as vapour, but dangerous as the mist which veils the precipice, or the ignis fatuus which leads to destruction, to unbend and speak for their auditors. Yet the meetings were generally well attended, and edification was the result, but not so much as if each speaker had felt he had immortal souls before him, some hungering for life ; others, sleeping in semi-worldliness, needing to be aroused ; and others, again, satisfied with having obtained years ago a measure of peace, and vigorous and youthful Bible ! is hailed as a promise of and revived blessing. The the thirty-second and last, over by one of the founders Pastor Audebez. The soci balance in hand, and a p dollars from America. Since ment it has printed more copies of the Scriptures. I sen., spoke of the British a Society's work in France. porteurs have sold this year the Scriptures, more than were disposed of among crusade of the priests again version has had the curious r the Romanist purchasers up version of Ostervald, which l siderable demand from then was in Taitbout Chapel.

The Sunday-school Societ tenth anniversary on Tues the Chapelle du Nord, p Pastor H. Paumier. It does vigorous response from pro out of 1,100 letters in which all the French pastors, infor Sunday-schools, and offered 177 answers came in this ;

from the sale of its publications. The of receipts last year, from benevolent was 5,518 francs. It continues the tion of the Musée des Enfants—a al beautifully illustrated, and intended plant the bad illustrated papers now ing our towns, by supplying harmless, and moral instruction and entertain- and its Quarterly Bible Lessons on the of truth it proposes for Sunday- instruction during the year. It has off 10,000 copies of its hymn-book, as now attained its 59th thousand.

Bible Society of France met for its iversary, in the Oratoire, M. François rt in the chair. Its origin was in the adherence of certain members of the nt Bible Society, last year, to the re- uthorised versions; while new ver- garded as unfaithful and rationalistic, roduced by a vote of the majority. eadfast members seceded, and have l the adhesions of 119 churches. The of the French and Foreign Society ie Bible Society of France is every- hat could be desired. The receipts ed to 26,745 francs. The finances . satisfactory condition, and the union brated in an expansive, fraternal, and pirit.

he same evening the forty-third anni- of the Paris Tract Society was held bout Chapel. M. Guizot presided, e a correct view of the present fearful popular literature. The report red the society as hampered by want is. The Religious Tract Society of . offered 22,000 francs, if the same ere raised in France; the condition filled, the debt has been liquidated; e Almanach des Bons Conseils, being ow cost price, the more popular it s, the heavier burden is it upon the of the society. The number of 0 copies was far exceeded this year. er production of the society, in view nteracting bad periodicals (like the -school Society), is the Ami de la a. Its subscribers amount to above . It has published no tracts, nor has ed any more volumes to its Family r. The receipts of the society ed to 113,728 francs, of which more 5,000 francs were obtained from dona- nd subscriptions.

Wednesday the Protestant Bible Society e the forty-fifth time, at the Church of edemption, under the presidency of Montandon. It was principally occupied by explanations relative to the versions; 10,466 copies of the Scriptures have been distributed to Protestants this year. It has received 41,000 francs, and expended 38,300. The speakers were all Rationalists.

The Protestant Sou Society showed an in- crease of funds, but not yet sufficient to claim the legacy of M. Eynard. Its aim is to in- terest all the Protestants in France in the various religious societies, by encouraging subscriptions of one sou a-week.

The Evangelical Society of France was pre- sided over by Professor Gruner. Its stations are reported as being prosperous in some parts, and just maintaining their position in others. In Paris all are stated to be in pro- gress; but conversions are not numerous, though the general influence is immense. The receipts for the year amounted to 119,849 francs, but this was largely exceeded by the expenditure. The deficit, amounting to 31,000 francs, has rendered necessary an appeal to foreign assistance. A deputation is gone to America for that purpose.

On Thursday was the joyous gathering of all the Paris Sunday Schools, in the Cirque Napoleon. There were about 4,000 children. The hymns, alternating with the short speeches of the pastors, were, as usual, thrilling, and the whole proceedings had their usual charm.

The Missionary Society met on the same day at Taitbout Chapel, presided over by Count Jules Delaborde. Its principal action is in South Africa, to which must now be added Senegal and Tahiti. The twelve dif- ferent stations in Lessouto have various trials and blessings, from Lérivé, the most exposed to the pretensions of the Boers, and conse- quently to the emigration of the natives, to Bethesda, where a remarkable revival has taken place. Authorisation has been obtained to re-open the Protestant schools at Tahiti, and the mission is prospering. There are but five pupils in the Paris Mission Seminary, and a strong appeal is made to increase their numbers. The balance in hand is 58 francs, but 12,000 francs are owing to missionaries. The receipts during the year amounted to 201,589 francs. During thirty- five years the number of missionaries has been sixteen French and six Swiss.

On Friday there was an interesting little festival in the Asylum for the Aged, a pleasant retreat, which contains forty inmates, and which has been lately acknowledged by Government as an institution of public utility. In the evening, the Central Society of Pro- testant Evangelization held its nineteenth anniversary at the Oratoire. Its first grand nary for the ministry at Bagnolles is prosperous ; it has now nineteen pupils, which complete the 100 it has received from its commencement. Five pastors have itinerated during part of the year in order to promote the revival of Protestant Churches. To seek out neglected Protestants, and to meet the spiritual wants of sick persons and others at watering places, are also important features of the society.

On Saturday the Society for the Encouragement of Primary Instruction met in the Oratoire, presided over by M. Guizot. The society is in a prosperous condition ; its re-continue in corresponding their conduct the excellent sown during the time of the colony. Various work afforded opportunity for fraternal and philanthropic the Deaconesses' Institution for Promoting the Welfare Mutual Relief Societies. interesting series closed with Evangelical Alliance in the fraternal participation in the evening.

GERMANY.

Frankfort, May 16, 1865.

DEATH OF PRESIDENT LINCOLN : IMPRESSIONS PRODUCED BY IT UPON GERMANY.

In the life of nations, as in the experience of individuals, there are events which seem to be permitted by Sovereign Wisdom, in order "that the thoughts of many hearts may be revealed." Such is, assuredly, the frightful tragedy at Washington, which has come like a thunderbolt to fill with horror and grief all the souls which are capable of understanding and feeling throughout the whole world. Nations, as well as individuals, have furnished the measure of their principles and of their moral understanding of the signs of the times, in the sentiments which they have manifested on this occasion. Now, what has been the part of mentary assemblies, under political liberalism, have manifested their indignation ; but, in general, they left our populace in a state of indifference. I do not know the ignorant who are incapable of judgment upon contemporary educated men—theologians and members of society so placed influence upon it. "Have you news from America?" "What news?" "President Lincoln has been shot!" "Indeed!" "No; I have not heard." Such is the dialogue which I have heard on my own ears on the very day brought that despatch which we all believe. And after this the conversation changed the conversation to account for this phenomenon. Let us speak of something else.

THEOLOGICAL CONTROVERSIES.

Of what? Of theological controversy, if you will. In this field Germany always furnishes the most abundant harvest. Meanwhile, it must be admitted that at present the subject is a very serious one, inasmuch as it is the final struggle of the most absolute belief against the Christian faith, defending itself in its last intrenchments. Observe, to begin with, in the first rank of the most deadly enemies of Christianity, the famous Strauss. This pantheistic theologian, who, in his "Life of Jesus" and his "Dogmatic Theology," maintained a silence of several years, and appeared to wish to make himself forgotten as a theologian, by devoting his labors to historical studies, has reappeared in the field of battle more ardent than ever. By his "Life of Jesus for the German People," a reproduction, still very dull, and no means popular, of his first work, he has expressly announced an intention to demolish in his country the very lowest foundations of Christianity and the Church. This book has not caused any great sensation, but it has been very little read among the people, for whom it was designed. Soon after the publication of this work there appeared a "Life of Jesus" by Schleiermacher, gathered from his university lectures. Everything that comes from this great Christian teacher, whose influence is still profound in Germany, is received with the most lively interest in our theological world. Although the semi-Rationalist principles of his method have been surpassed in our day, the appearance of this last book has not suffered Strauss to remain at rest. He has entered the lists again, and in a new book, entitled, "The History of Faith, and the Jesus of History," has undertaken to destroy, piece by piece, what Schleiermacher, in his depth of Christian sentiment, still retained of the true Christ of the Gospels. Strauss regards Schleiermacher as the last scientific defender of the Christian faith, and seems to think that, after having annihilated his influence, there will remain absolutely nothing of our old Evangelical superstitions—I mean, the King of Jesus, but a man such as each of us lives, perhaps. That which characterizes the polemics of Strauss is an inveterate enmity against the old Christianity, and above all against the divines and ministers of religion who constitute its representatives. This enmity is expressed in a yet more personal way against those who, while they make considerable concessions to Rationalism, wish still to preserve the fundamental principles of revelation. Therefore it is that, while he breaks his last lance against Schleiermacher, Strauss has violently attacked Dr. Schenkel, of Heidelberg. This professor, who is regarded as one of the chiefs of the negative party, has vigorously defended himself in the periodical which he edits. And it is truly curious to see the same man, against whom most of the orthodox pastors of Germany have for some time past directed their protests, acting the part of the apologist, in opposition to Strauss. In Germany every intermediate degree is occupied, from the most absolute negations to the most orthodox belief.

Another controversy, sufficiently characteristic for me to say a few words about it here, has been recently carried on between two eminent men, both belonging, not only to the Christian faith, but to strict Lutheran orthodoxy. I have several times had occasion in these letters to speak to you of Mecklenburg, as distinguished above all for the exclusive ultra-Lutheranism and the spiritual despotism of the ecclesiastical bodies which rule there. Your readers will not have forgotten the persecution carried on by these Protestant inquisitors against Dr. Baumgarten, a professor as distinguished for his piety as for his attainments. One of the most influential men of this duchy is Dr. Kliefoth, who is very well known as a preacher and writer, and as an ardent defender of the orthodoxy of his church. In a very violent controversial writing, entitled "Two Political Divines," Dr. Kliefoth, as if he had wished to describe the party to which he belongs, has thought well to associate together two names, as unlike as possible, in order to cast upon one all the discredit which, in his eyes, rests upon the other. The two names are those of Dr. Hofmann, professor at the University of Erlangen, and Dr. Schenkel, of Heidelberg. This last is very well known by your readers, and I have just called to mind that he is now in all Germany, as it were, the banner of the negative school, upon which all the defenders of ecclesiastical orthodoxy are firing in every direction. Who then is Dr. Hofmann, that we find him in such company? He is one of the most eminent divines in Germany, venerated on account of his character, admired for the profound attainments displayed in his writings, and finally, a member of the Faculty of Erlangen, which is renowned for its fidelity to the principles of Lutheranism. What, then, can be his prove to you, by a salient fact, what I have often had occasion to observe in these letters, and what to a stranger might appear to be incredible—that is, that in the eyes of the greater part of the religious men of Germany liberalism is a sin, and that, to be a Christian, one must identify Christianity with absolutism. Unfortunately, they have only too well persuaded the enemies of religion, who take occasion thence to hate it.

CHRISTIAN ACTIVITY.

There is something more fruitful and edifying than controversy: it is Christian activity employed upon works of beneficence or of evangelization. Thanks be to God, that notwithstanding its rather exclusive love for science, contemplation, and speculation, Germany is not altogether without that activity. The Christians of this country are learning, little by little, to make sacrifices for their faith. Thus, in the course of last year, the Gustavus-Adolphus Society has been able to expend 90,000 thalers (about 12,800*l.*) in charitable grants to various poor communities, to succour their needs for edification and instruction. These communities, scattered over Catholic countries, scarcely rising out of their ruins after ages of persecution, are in so great numbers, that there have been no fewer than 744 applications for assistance from the office of the society.

Thus, again, there is every year made in the Protestant provinces of the kingdom of Prussia, a general collection, intended to provide for the religious wants of the country.

science from dead works, c for this corruption, and, t this preaching sounds for The Vaudois alone, who c lation of 22,000 souls, ha messengers of peace in t all who are persuaded th the Gospel shall be the lif the numerous Protestant established there will forr open their hands, and su our brethren." The Berli advertises donors to this affords its assistance onl which pertain to the Chu in Italy, and not to atter tion conducted by the Dar who, it says, "may inde Christ individually, but c Gospel to future genera grant that this appeal may Germany, and that the h
Society may be realised!

THE VACANT ARCHBISHOP.

I told you, some time s in the archiepiscopal see the nomination of a new p ment, which is of great Rhenish provinces, has
The cause of this delay differences which have metropolitan chapter and vernment, on the one han Rome on the other. Th that the Pope, after havir number of that body will be called to this eminent position who is not himself animated with the same spirit. No doubt this, on the part of the Roman Church, is to show itself consistent with the principles of the Encyclical; but it is also the certain way to alienate from itself all the enlightened portion of Catholic peoples. In Germany this enlightened portion is more numerous than elsewhere, thanks to its constant relations with Protestantism. But let us wait till the election, and I will give you an account of it in its time.

TURKEY.

Constantinople, May 8, 1865.

DEATH OF THE FIRST ARMENIAN AND THE FIRST TURKISH CONVERTS TO PROTESTANTISM.

Death has made sad havoc in Turkey during the past month, as well as in America. Two of the most marked and remarkable men in Turkey have passed away from earth within a few days of each other. Rev. Mr. Williams, known by most in this country as Selim Effendi, was the earliest convert in this country from Mohammedanism to Protestantism. His life has been a most eventful one, especially since he was led, in America, some twelve years ago, to study the scriptures. He fled with his family to Asia; and, during the Crimean war, returned to establish himself at Bebek, a place on the Bosphorus, where there were several American missionaries. He has resided there ever since, and has done more than any one else to arouse an interest among Turks in Christianity. He died suddenly on the 14th of April, at the age of about fifty-five, giving every evidence of his genuine and living faith in Jesus Christ.

I would attempt to give you a sketch of the most interesting life, but I hope to be able next month to furnish you with a brief biography from the pen of Dr. Schauffler, his spiritual father, and through all his Christian life his most intimate friend.

Rev. Horhannes Der Sahaghian was the first inquirer and the first convert from the Armenian Church in the history of the American missions in Turkey. An interesting account of the life of this devoted man may be found in Dr. Dwight's "Christianity in Turkey." He was a pupil in the famous school of Peshtimalgian, and even before the arrival of the missionaries he had become an ardent student of the Bible. In January, 1833, he came to the missionaries and put himself under their instruction, saying, "I need your counsel and advice; I am in the dark, and I want you to put forth your hands and pull me out." He soon found the light which he sought, and became a most efficient instrument in spreading a knowledge of it among his countrymen. In February, 1839, he was imprisoned by order of the Armenian Patriarch, without any form of trial, and exiled to Cæsarea, a city about 400 miles from Constantinople. On the journey he was horribly tortured, and only saved himself from this, at last, by paying some 2,000 piastres to the officers who had him in charge. In May, 1840, he returned to Constantinople, and entered at once upon the most active labours for the good of his people. He was afterward sent to America, when he received a theological education at New Haven. After his return to Turkey, in 1848, he was licensed as a preacher of the Gospel, and in the following year he was ordained as pastor of the Evangelical Armenian Church in Adabazar. He married the widow of the first Evangelical pastor ordained in Constantinople, who is now left again a widow by his death.

Since Mr. Der Sahaghian's ordination he has been a most devoted, earnest, and active labourer for Christ. He died at Nicomedia, of pernicious intermittent fever, the same disease which one week before had proved fatal to Mr. Williams in Constantinople.

It is at the death-beds of such tried and faithful servants of Christ that the missionary receives his highest earthly reward for his labours. And in coming time, when pure Christianity shall have extended over this empire, the early consecration, the labours, the sufferings, and the faith of these men will be remembered, and will be precious to the Church. Already God has wrought wonderful changes in this empire since these men braved persecution and death for Christ's sake. Mr. Der Sahaghian, thirty-two years ago, was probably the only Evangelical Christian native in Turkey. The Bible was then almost an unknown book to the people. The Armenian Church was given over to idolatry. But now the Bible has gone everywhere. The Armenians have felt its influence, and already great reforms have taken place within their church. And now there is hardly a city in Turkey where there are not some Evangelical Christians—in some cities there are thousands.

famous plans, which I reported last month, has re-opened his office, and is now transacting the business of the nation. It remains to be seen whether the Porte will take any notice of the petitions sent in for his removal.

CONTINUED PERSECUTIONS.

As a sample of what Protestants in Turkey still suffer, I will give you some extracts from letters in my hands. One is as follows, addressed to the Rev. Mr. Greene, American missionary at Broosa :—

Edinjik, April 14, 1865.

My dear Sir,—It becomes my duty to inform you that the dear son, whom God gave us for our comfort, died yesterday. Our sorrow, however, has been greatly augmented by the difficulty which we have experienced these two days in securing its burial. Finally, since the body could be no longer kept, we buried it in the garden of one of the brethren. Even with this our sorrow ended not, for to-day the Armenians have risen up and declared that one of their number was in part owner of the garden where the child was buried, and that man has gone to make complaint to the authorities. Our fear now is that they will remove the body from its resting place. . . . The Mudir of Panderma, when informed of the death of the child, requested the Judge of Panderma to see that a suitable place was shown for the child's burial. The judge, being a miserable fellow, committed the business to the Armenians, and they pointed out a Protestant preacher their man.

Letters from Murad T which the Protestant I away so summarily by inform us of continued there. Protestant religion and the man appointed b to their civil rights is an who tells them to "th dogs' heads are not all br cites the people to attack

These things have l knowledge of Mr. Stua doubtedly, do everythin secure justice. But I l rable to mention them her of Turkey might have 1 sympathy of their Christi out the world, to sustain of these constantly rec The whole region where occurred is a field ripe : there were labourers, an them, large Protestant co gathered in almost all th trict. The work the so promising, and it is fact which rouses the I opposition.

AMERICA.

New York, May 12, 1865.

AN EVENTFUL MONTH.

If this monthly letter could bring to you the action by the Governmen the subsequent surrende General Grant's terms; t

I do not need to describe their proportions or their significance. I cannot doubt, however, that a question of great interest is in all those thoughtful circles where the magazine is read: What impression made by these unexampled events upon heart and character of the American people?

SQUIL BEARING OF THE NATION—RELIGIOUS SENTIMENT—THE TWO PRESIDENTS.

The most characteristic feeling of the American mind to-day, I think, is to be described in the single word, composure. We have been full of joy and full of grief; and great opposites have not neutralised each other; but they have united into strength. We fasten different metals together, that the different measure of their expansion composite rod may resist the influences heat and cold, so, in these last days of our struggle, God seems to have bound together the strongest and extremest elements of national feeling, that they might compensate and brace each other. Excited speech of minds has already passed away. Our concern is measured, as far as men can measure and without a misgiving, and without fear, we go forward, submissively, thankfully, hopefully, in the strength of God.

It is hardly possible to over-estimate the religious feeling which has pervaded our people during these momentous weeks. Of course, this is not all piety. But an intelligent reverent recognition of God's providence is a well-nigh universal. No land ever more distinctly that it was under the care of God, than did this land on that memorable 15th of April. And no people ever committed itself more confidently to the hand of God, than did this, in its cheerful acceptance of the new President, so lately put into power. You know very well that the late inauguration day gave us occasion to think of the Vice-President with suspicion and distrust. While Mr. Lincoln lived, those emotions were slowly fading from our minds. That 15th of April made Mr. Johnson our President. How could we have been the transition? The religious faith of the people endured it. "They can't kill Lord!" exclaimed an old negro woman at Freetown, when she learned that her people had lost their prophet and their king; and the same sentiment in many forms spread at once through every church and home, and through every heart. Then, with an interest proportioned to the circumstances, we set to work to measure more accurately those acts of Mr. Johnson which had offended and alarmed the nation. A large amount of testimony has been put before us, from sources the most respectable and the best informed. More private statements float from lip to lip. The effect of it all has been to relieve the nation of its fear. Those who have the means of knowing assert over their own names, and with a detail of circumstances, that the exhibition which shocked us was the result, not of habitual vice, but of the indiscreet attempt of an invalid to brace himself for an occasion. There can be no doubt that this is substantially the truth. We are expecting from the new President nothing short of the completion of the work of the immortal dead, with a fidelity to law and liberty equal to his own, and with a singleness and strength of purpose and an administrative ability which we believe have been disciplined for this very task. Is there not something very remarkable in the relations of these two Presidents to the people over whom they have been put? Both of them were without an ancestry, born in poverty, self-educated, and familiar by experience with every phase of American feeling and every grade of American life. In either case we are reminded of the inspired description of David's advancement: "I have exalted one chosen out of the people." Mr. Lincoln's character and views, however, were the product of Northern feeling and experience; Mr. Johnson's of Southern. The man appointed to break down slavery learned to estimate the frowning, horrid system in the comprehensive but remoter view of Northern ethics and of national policy. The man who comes in upon the ruins of that system to reconstruct the social and political elements which have been so thoroughly purged, but so nearly disorganised, brings to his task the most perfect acquaintance and sympathy with that vast class of Southern men out of which he has sprung—men who, having been neither masters nor slaves, offer the readiest, the largest, the most important material of the new national life in the South. In this again we see the appointment of God's providence.

THE NATIONAL GRIEF.

I have said but little concerning the sorrow produced by the assassination of our beloved President. The wave of horror and grief which that atrocious crime excited has already reached your nation, and we know by your profound emotion that you can understand our own. Consider how we trusted him; grief, which was again expressed and recorded in the most imposing and memorable progress of his body to his distant home, is an element of virtue and safety for our people. In this moment of military success the nation consecrates its supreme and undying affection to the purest and gentlest spirit that ever became famous among us. His memory enters into our national life a pledge of moderation, and justice, and magnanimity.

THE LAST LOAN—THE ANNIVERSARIES.

I observe that upon the announcement of Mr. Lincoln's death our public securities fell with you about ten per cent. The fall with mense amount of 17,400 do not speak of these things with thanksgiving. We our closets and our church God that this nation, at this trial, cherishes so steadfast in itself.

The week of anniversary. The services have all taken full, energetic, religious tones tempted to describe. What I shall have more to say. But at this time I could not of the nation.

Home Intelligence.

THE MAY MEETINGS.

The annual gatherings of our great Christian associations have been held this year under remarkable—we might almost say, unprecedented circumstances. We have been accustomed to attacks, increasing in boldness year after year, upon one and another of the leading doctrines of the Gospel, but not all our recent experience of the rapid growth of these heresies could have prepared us for the startling fact we have now witnessed; that in the heart of this Christian metropolis, and in the midst of men, none of whom have professedly thrown off the Christian name, one speaker after another should the Hindoos, and cry up native faith. But these men, always dwelling on the dangers of preaching a dilution, only pleaded for the native. Those objections, too, which Christianity had time to voice, but our modern infidels, more correct to describe, profess to speak from experience declare that the only effective Gospel to the Africans has still, lower in the death with the devil's image instead of er in Africa or anywhere else, the result cannot too soon be made at all further effort may be stopped, til the cause be ascertained how it Gospel of God's grace has, in that ts influence and become transmuted lessing to a curse. But if these are as false and malignant as we em to be, let the falsehood be ex-

 ; the foul slander may return on the those who have propagated it.
 enough of converts in all lands now air quality; and to the character f these Christian converts all our r societies confidently and loudly such was the general tone of the which were held last month. In as plain to see that these bold Christianity and Christian missions a new stimulus to the interest felt sion work. That work had been taking its place among the ordies of Christian life, and we were own into that state of indifference longs to the class of routine duties, rude alarm recalled our attention eatness of the work, set us upon a ation of the foundations of our faith, issued in a warmer-hearted, more attachment to the missionary cause.
 rest, the meetings were characterised me high and solemn tone that has hed our missionary gatherings of . Buffoonery was eschewed by the and the audience showed their in-the work by giving their attention orts, as well as to the speakers that hem. The funds too, show a large
 -in the case of the Bible Society a le one. It is the answer of the of England to the attacks of Bishop
 But the increase is spread over the societies; and it is satisfactory e that, as the wealth and prosperity ntry increase, the portion of wealth for Christ's service increases, we do n an equal, but at least in some le proportion.

THE BIBLE SOCIETY.

tendence at every May meeting of the ad Foreign Bible Society has always to us to be one of the most significheering facts in connexion with ous anniversaries. For this society by the very nature of its work from the romance and excitement that pon the sister institutions for the support of missionaries. Its work is for the most part of a preparatory nature. Its reports are not likely to be occupied with narratives of nations being born in a day.

 Its agents are not likely to be placed in situations of fearful peril, or engaged in the work of adventurous discovery. Their business and the business of the society is to sow the seed, leaving it for other men, in most instances, to enter into their labours. Its report is only occupied with the quiet, steady, unostentatious progress made from year to year in the distribution of God's Word; and from this work everything that savours of sensationalism is, as a matter of course, excluded. The assemblies that gather from year to year to its anniversaries can therefore only be drawn together from love to the Bible itself, in the belief that in it is to be found the panacea for all the woes of humanity. And yet there is no institution that attracts a more crowded or a more solemnly-impressed audience than the Bible Society.

The recent meeting fully maintained the high character of former years. The magnificent and imposing aspect of such an assembly—so vast a sea of human faces, all converging upon a speaker—was strangely and powerfully witnessed to in the fact that the veteran diplomatist, Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, the man who for years had ruled the rulers of Turkey by the force of his high character and his unbending will, was on this occasion so overawed by the moral grandeur of the scene before him, that he hesitated, faltered, and confessed that his emotions had deranged the order of topics on which he was about to address them. The noble chairman, the Earl of Shaftesbury, is more at home in these gatherings; but he, with excellent taste, declined to take up the time of the meeting, only congratulating the society on the increase of its subscriptions, which, in this age of theological criticism, proved there were more than 7,000 who had not bowed the knee to the image of the modern Baal.

The increase was to an extent that might well afford matter for congratulation. It amounted to more than 12,000*l.* above the sum subscribed last year, making the society's income, from all sources, reach the noble sum of 187,400*l.*, which has enabled it within the year to print and circulate
 2,450,000 copies of the Holy Scriptures.
 In every foreign country, with the exception of Turkey, the increase in the circulation of the Bible had been marked—most especially so in the cases of France and Italy. In Austria the Emperor, after a long delay, has at last given his sanction, on certain conditions, to the circulation of the Bible within his dominions; and depôts have already been opened, in consequence, at the three central points of Vienna, Pesth, and Prague, while in Portugal the Government have refused to admit the importation of Bibles, but they have given their sanction to the circulation of copies printed in the country itself—a condition, of course, which the society has readily complied with. In Mexico, also, the new Emperor has given his sanction to Bible colportage. The decrease in Turkey was caused by the recent interference of the authorities with the operations of the society's agents; but that interference has now ceased. In our own land, the circulation of the Bible goes on at an increasing rate, and it is an instructive and cheering fact that in London alone the Bible-women have received from the very poorest of our population the sum of 4,000*l.* in payment for Bibles within the last seven years.

The first speaker was the Bishop of Rochester, who, in moving the adoption of the report, made a short but feeling address, in which he stated that he had only consented to occupy the position he did because otherwise "the order of the ministry to which he belonged would not give a palpable token of the interest it felt in the proceedings of the day." He afterwards learned that a bishop from the sister church in America was to address the meeting, but that only quickened his anxiety, as "he should have felt jealous of allowing a bishop to appear from the Far West, and not to have found a brother to occupy the position which he was now allowed to hold." He was followed by Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, to whose appearance on the platform we have already alluded, and who, in the course of his short speech, gave the following noble testimony to his own personal feeling as to the Divine inspiration of the Scriptures. He said:—

One of the principal points which I think has aided the success of the society is the pure simplicity of the principles upon which it reposes—the simple, ungarbled communication of that which we hold to be the Word of God. I must say, for one, I care not if in that vast collection of authorised and sacred writings there may be here and there a passage of doubtful interpretation, or a matter upon which the mind of the sceptic and the infidel may gloat in the hope of being able to find out something to realise his false views; it is enough, to my mind, that the great features of the Bible come home to our convictions and to our consciences, that they present upon the whole the proofs of a great and saving religion, and that they present to us those rules of morality which become the worshippers of God.

Bishop Janes, from America, also addressed the meeting, and gave an interesting account of the American Bible Society, which was just twelve years younger than its British and Foreign sister.—

The society issues the English Bible in over eighty varieties, the English New Testament in forty varieties, and portions of the Scripture in English in twenty varieties, and the Scriptures in other languages in more than one hundred different forms. The aggregate issue from the commencement has been 23,383,522 volumes; and if the ratio of increase be the same in years to come as it has been in years past, when our society shall be as old as yours, we shall have issued as many copies of the Holy Scripture as yourselves. The receipts for the last year were 679,851 dollars. The volumes issued were 1,560,658. Of these 800,000 were distributed gratuitously, and 686,852 were given to soldiers in the army of the United States Government, and in the army of the so-called Confederate Government. For we are happy to give the Scriptures to everybody, and I like to say all the good I can to everybody, and I am, therefore, happy to say that that Government permitted us to send these Scriptures through their lines.

The Bishop expressed his belief that the circulation of the English Bible would be found the best solvent of the difficulty arising from the polyglot character of the American immigrant population.

The Rev. Newman Hall, in moving a resolution acknowledging the goodness of God in the success He had granted to the circulation of His inspired Word, entered into an interesting argument to prove the inspiration of the Old Testament from the use made of it by our Lord when on earth:—

Whether there is a Bible or no Bible, we have a Christ who died for us and rose again. There is a Christian Church, whether there is a Bible or not, and the Christian Church leads us back eighteen centuries, to the death and resurrection of our Lord and Saviour. Now, the New Testament contains the record by His immediate friends and followers of our Lord's actions and teachings. So I accept the New Testament, accepting the authority of Christ.

After a full and able exposition of the many passages in which our Lord quoted the Old Testament, making it, as it were, the guide of His life, he continued:—

"But," says some one, "yes, there is many a man in this world very zealous about certain matters; but, if he were to die and come back again, a few hours' experience of the other world would have shown him his mistake: in many things he would correct his mistakes; and many things about which he spake much he would say little about when he returned." I can imagine, my lord, that if, with my consistent and proper appreciation of what I think the right ecclesiastical principles to which I adhere, and which are to be a profound secret at the Bible Society with those preferences, I were to feel this, "all, all God's grace is in my corner of the yard; I cannot love anybody that thinks differently from me in these outward things; they may show that they love Jesus, and try to be good, and lead godly lives; if they are not members of my church, I can have nothing to do with them; I cannot meet them on common ground; I cannot join them at the Bible Society;" I say if those were my sentiments, and were to die and come back again, I think I should find out that I had made a great mistake. Now, how was it in the case of our Lord? He died, and He returned. And what did He do on His return? He referred to the Bible on His return? On the very first day of His resurrection, joining His disciples on the way to Emmaus, what did He do? "Beginning at Moses and all the prophets, he expounded unto them in all the scriptures the things concerning himself." It is a marvellous thing that the risen Lord, instead of dwelling on the great miracle of His resurrection as the grand proof of His Messiahship, turned then in His risen body to the written document.

Bishop Anderson, late of Rupert's Land; non Champneys; the Rev. E. E. Jenkins, in India; and Sir Morton Peto, also addressed the meeting,

The Earl of Shaftesbury wound up the proceedings by assuring the meeting how deeply he felt the honour and the responsibility of his position as President.

CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

Exeter-hall was, as usual, the place of meeting for all the great foreign missionary institutions. The Church Missionary Society had as chairman its President, the Earl of Chester, and the attendance was large and influential. The noble Earl, in his opening speech, made a feeling allusion to the assassination of President Lincoln, and remarked to the audience expressing their warm approval of the sentiment) that he was sure the people of the United States, in this hour of their affliction, would receive the deep sympathy of our brethren on this side of the Atlantic. The report, which was read by the Rev. Venn, showed that although the income of the year had been large (the receipts from colonies alone exceeding the average by £100,000), yet the expenditure had been still larger, and that thus there was a deficit of nearly £4,000. A special fund which had been raised for missionary operations in India was now exhausted, and the committee frankly stated the case before their supporters, that they could not keep up the present missionary effort, without a large augmentation of income. The report then reviewed the progress of the society's missions in various parts of the globe. Referring to Sierra Leone, where the native church has, for the last four years, supported its own pastors, the committee record with thanksgiving the growing missionary spirit in the native church and the increasing liberality of its contributors. The Yoruba, Niger, and Mediterranean missions were next brought under notice, many of the details given being such as have found a place in our pages during the past year. In their review of the Indian missions the committee remark, respecting the results of missions, beyond all mere statistical calculations, "What evidence do the missions afford that they have the Divine presence—that they are expanding—and that they are passing into the condition of self-supporting and self-governing native churches, able to maintain and propagate the truth?" In reply to the first question, the committee refer to the account given by the present Bishop of Calcutta of a visit to the South India missions, which enters fully into their history and present condition. To the second question, "Is the work an expanding work?" the reply is, that the progress of the work is slow, yet marked and certain. Several facts in proof of this statement were furnished:—

The third question which the committee are prepared to answer is this: Do the native churches afford evidence of soon becoming self-supporting and self-governing, and able to maintain and propagate the truth? The committee have received during the past year very clear evidence that such a happy euthanasia of the society's labours is approaching as regards the more advanced missions.

In referring to Ceylon, the report stated that in some districts of that island Bible-women have been introduced, and are wholly supported by native Christians, whose contributions to religious and charitable purposes amount to between 400*l.* and 500*l.*

The other missions noticed in the report were those in Mauritius, East Africa, Madagascar, China, New Zealand, North-West America, and in the North Pacific.

The following are the statistics of the society's missions:—

Stations	146
Clergymen : European	201
Natives and country born .	77
Total number of Clergymen	278
European Laymen : Schoolmasters, &c.	23
European Female Teachers	7
Native and country-born Catechists, &c.	1,983
Communicants	17,783

The Archbishop of Canterbury, in moving the adoption of the report, expressed the satisfaction he felt in publicly testifying his admiration for the society, and remarked that he had been associated with it from the earliest dia, and in China, and by the cost of the mission in Italy." Special contributions behalf of Italy, however, form a new and stiffening item in the report, and more than ,000% of the year's disbursements were expended upon the Continent of Europe. The Bible Fund now amounts to upwards of 8,000%. The report reviewed the society's stations in France, Spain, Germany, Italy, India, Ceylon, Africa, the West Indies, Canada, Australia, and Polynesia. In describing the aspect of the different parts of the Indian field, it is remarked of the Madras district that "in most of the societies, the year was one of spiritual progress; and change everywhere going on in the notions and feelings of the heathen, by which they are being prepared for the reception of the truth, is, even in the Madras presidency, the stronghold of Hindoo orthodoxy, more apparent and rapid than ever." The following is a general summary of the society's labours and agency:—

Preaching Places and other Preaching Places ...	4,659
Ministers and Assistant Missionaries, including forty-five Supernumeraries or Paid Agents, as Catechists, Interpreters, Day-school Teachers, &c. .	958
Unpaid Agents, as Sabbath-school Teachers, &c.	1,408
and Accredited Church Members ..	17,779
Trials for Church Membership	141,735
Marriages, deducting for those who wavered at the Day and Sabbath-schools ...	13,873
Existing Establishments	154,584
	8

The reading of the report was followed by a noble speech from the Rev. Dr. Etheridge, vindicated, in glowing and poetic language, the endeavours of the society to carry the Gospel into the domains of "civilized heathenism," as well as of savage populations.

Smith, of Camborne, addressed the meeting with the utmost brevity, and was welcomed by Bishop Janes, of the Methodist Episcopal Church of America. He was cheered with loud cheers, and at once responded, with hardly-restrained emotion, to the sympathy he has found in England with the bereavement of his beloved land:—

"When [said he], on Saturday last, the ship reached Queenstown, there was an intense excitement on the part of the American passengers in the English newspapers, and when we saw it and read them, and understood the feeling which pervaded the public in this country with reference to our country in this hour of her sorrow, there were few American eyes in that hall that were not swimming in tears. The mission upon all our hearts and minds was loved and most grateful; and I have no doubt, that these communications reach our nation are there seen by the people at large and by authorities, that there will be made upon the nation and upon the Government of that nation an impression which perhaps no other event than the sympathy manifested here could have made upon that people with reference to this people.

The speeches which followed were not only of a truly missionary character, but three of them in succession were by men who had laboured in foreign missions. The Rev. George Scott gave a succinct history of the mission to Stockholm, and proved that, though discontinued in one sense, it is not a lapsed, but a germinant and increasing revival. This was its origin:—

A good man in Norwich, the late Mr. Dixon, asked one of his workmen, not accustomed to attend public worship, Samuel Owen, to come to the Methodist chapel which he frequented. The invitation was accepted, and this is the grain of mustard seed from which has grown your entire Swedish mission. Mr. Owen was sent to Stockholm, to superintend the erection of a steam-engine, and intelligent Swedes, seeing in him a skilled, enterprising, and diligent workman, encouraged him to remain in the country, and commence a foundry of his own. He soon became great in the land, and received the Gustavus Vasa order of knighthood from Bernadotte, the King. Having several English workmen in his employment, Mr. Owen desired for their families and his own the privilege of public worship in the mother tongue, and, remembering the chapel at Norwich, he very naturally applied to the Wesleyan Missionary Society for a minister—an application not made in vain. Pure catholicity has distinguished this mission from the beginning; the denomination, as such, has not been extended, but much spiritual good has been effected. The British subjects residing in Stockholm willingly attended that service, though in general they considered themselves members of the Episcopal Church of England. God graciously blessed this work. Several of our countrymen who had neglected the great salvation at home were led to seek it abroad; and the Englishman occupying the highest position there—the late Lord Bloomfield—was, to use his own words, "led to the light from a state of utter darkness."

The missionary was at length driven, by persecution, from his post, but he is able to testify:—

An awakening of a most extensive and satisfactory character has undoubtedly followed our mission efforts in Sweden. Dr. Fjellgteelt assured me in 1859 that he considered the godly in the land numbered half a million. I could not go so far as this, but I feel persuaded that about half that number have become children of God by faith which is in Christ Jesus, and the good work pervaded all ranks, from the royal house to the poorest in the country. Let us, then, as we have opportunity, do good unto all men, seeing what has resulted from asking a thoughtless workman to come to chapel.

The Rev. John Walton, late of Ceylon, directed the attention of his audience to the requirements of the field in which he had laboured, and to the character of some of the seven central stations, commanding easy access into vast tracts of surrounding country, churches have been formed, in which there are now more than eight hundred "intelligent and practical" Chinese Christians. A numerous band of native agents preach the Gospel to their countrymen with earnestness and intelligence. This development of native agency is the most promising feature in the Indian, as well as the Chinese stations. The labours of the missionaries in Southern India have been so signally blessed, that whole communities have accepted the Christian faith. The Madagascar mission, as our readers are aware, is in a most prosperous condition. The report announced that the Rev. Wm. Ellis is at last about to seek the repose to which his long years of labour so abundantly entitle him, and that he may be expected to return to this country in a few months. Reference was made in the report to the interference with the society's operations in the Loyalty Islands, the satisfactory assurance of the Emperor of the French upon the subject, and other topics, which have already found a place in our pages.

Besides the Congregationalists, by whom the society is almost wholly supported, other religious bodies were represented by different speakers—the Church of England by the Rev. S. Minton; the Wesleyan Methodists by the Rev. R. Roberts; and the Presbyterians by the Rev. Dr. Edmond. The Rev. J. G. Rogers, the Rev. Dr. Lindsay Alexander, the Rev. Mr. Macgowan, from China, and the Rev. E. Mellor, also addressed the meeting. The speech of the day, however, was delivered by Dr. Livingstone, who was loudly cheered by the vast audience. Like some of the gentlemen already mentioned, he referred to the assertions made at the Anthropological Society, but he went on to say that he had never thought them worth answering.

I have been behind the scenes [said the doctor]. I know something of the missionaries, and I know a good deal about the converts. Some people do not call me a missionary now, but I do not care what they think of me if they will only grant that I am an honest witness. I have seen the converts and the missionaries both in South and in West Africa, and I have formed a totally different opinion of them from that which has been recently put forth to the world. I believe that those who talk about either the missionaries or the converts as being unworthy know nothing about them. I had the pleasure of making the acquaintance of a gentleman in South Africa who has had an idea, ever since seeing the working of the mission under Mr. Moffat, that Mr. Moffat and another missionary there are the only missionaries in the whole world. He went into a certain town, and was surprised to see no one there; but when he got to the centre of the place he found a black man preaching to all the inhabitants, and he admits now that that black man must be a good fellow. That black man you may see figured in a picture that has now become pretty common, as standing by a missionary when he was bitten by a lion; he showed himself to be a man of courage then, and he has shown himself ever since a brave and good Christian man. Ever since then my friend has not known how to show me sufficient kindness, simply because he saw what I was doing; and I think that any man who has seen the missionaries at work, and has talked with the converts, will entertain as high an opinion of them as my friend. In my opinion the missionaries on the West Coast, and likewise in South Africa, seeing how often they are cut off by disease, and how bravely they hold on to their work, only want an air of antiquity thrown over them to decide that they are quite equal to the saints and martyrs of old. Ever since I was a boy I have heard a great deal about the advance of Mohammedanism; and in my own pretty extensive travels I have also been looking out for the advance of that wave of Mohammedanism which I was led to believe would soon spread over the continent of Africa. Now, I never happened to meet with a Mohammedan till two years ago, when I met two Arabs on Lake Nyanza, who were very busy slave-traders. They were building an Arab vessel to transport slaves across the lake towards the East, and they were at the time as busy as they could possibly be transporting the slaves by means of two boats. One of their men understood the Makololo language; I found him to be very intelligent, and we could converse readily together. I was rather anxious to find out whether he had been made a convert. He was the servant of these Arabs, who had been there for fourteen years, but this poor fellow knew nothing at all about Mohammedanism except that it was wrong to eat an animal if its throat was not cut. Why, the people knew as much of our religion as that in about three weeks after our arrival, for they would not go to hoe their garden on Sundays because they were afraid that if they did they would have an unlucky crop. All the Mohammedan proselytism that has come under my own observation, and all that I have been able to ascertain about their converts, is simply this, that occasionally in the west and north of Africa they make forays and capture numbers of people, and sometimes conquer large portions of territory. In doing this they gratify their own selfishness; they get slaves, land, and other plunder; but, I find lately, on making some inquiries, that the native Christians, the men whom our missionaries have converted in West and South Africa, and also in the West Indies, contributed upwards of 15,000*l.* annually to the support and spread of their faith. . . . When the slaves are at the public whipping-post—for they have institutions of that kind—they often call out, when undergoing the lash, "Oh! for the English! when will the English come?" making their masters, of course, much more angry than they were before; but this again shows that the good name which the English have through the missionaries and through the efforts of our Government extends a very long way inland. Thus the leavening process is going on, the men are being prepared for much greater advances in Christianity than we shall ever see in our day. The converts that I have seen I think to be an may say that I am going out next month again to renew my labours, and I shall be extremely glad and thankful if you will follow me with your prayers.

BAPTIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

Sir Morton Peto presided at the meeting of the Baptist Missionary Society, and addressed its subscribers in his double capacity of treasurer and chairman. His speech was full of practical points for the guidance of the institution; and it must be owned that he did not spare the shortcomings of the society. He told them that the yearly income—somewhere about 30,000*l.* from all sources—was unworthy of the numbers and resources of the Baptist denomination, and altogether inadequate to the extraordinary openings for the entrance of the Gospel which God in His providence was preparing for them in various heathen lands. But it was not the inadequacy of their resources alone that met his censure: he rebuked, also, the spirit in which some previous discussions, respecting an alteration in the constitution of the society, had been carried on. And, again, when one of the speakers commenced his address with a high rhetorical allusion to the martyrdom of President Lincoln, the chairman checked him, and reminded him that the cause they had met to promote was not to be served by such allusions as these.

The report presented a survey of the various portions of the society's mission-field, and stated that, in all directions, the year had been one of much labour, and accompanied with manifold tokens of God's blessing.

Mr. Sampson, of Serampore, the present state of the native and gave some details of 1 Hindoo Deists (or Brahmo: we have more than once referred to them. (Iran. Chris., 1864)

Mr. Sampson also dwelt on of the efforts put forth by the cause of foreign mission the meeting that even if the to increase their strength in to maintain their present state to send out three missionaries to fill up the gaps; but, in the last two years they had sent for years before that they had one. It was stated, in the proceedings, that the Mission gate-street had been sold for nearly double the original cost

COLONIAL, CONTINENTAL, AND

The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts met at the Hall, the Archbishop of York. The report showed that there was an increase, during the year, in the amounting to 5,616*l.*, which was due to the great prosperity of the appeal which had been made by the archbishops. The society's included 501 clergymen, and contained wholly or in part, and of catechists, schoolmaster These are labouring in di British North America 41 be made suitable in every way to the wants of the present time. Among the new arrangements contemplated was the division of the society into three departments—one to have for its object the promoting at home an interest in the proceedings of the society abroad, another to take charge of the general business of the society, and a third to overlook and direct the whole of the foreign work. The meeting was then addressed by the Bishop of Grahamstown, who enlarged on the value of the society's aid in his diocese, both to the colonists and the heathen. He stated, amidst loud cheers, that he for one rejoiced at the freedom accorded to the South African Church by the recent judgment of the Judicial Committee. He concluded by strongly urging the need of a native ministry. After a few remarks from Earl Percy, the Bishop of Quebec gave a lengthened account of the state of the Church in Canada, especially insisting on the fact that the first duty of the society was towards the English colonists. Among the other speakers were the Hon. F. Lygon, M.P., the Rev. W. H. Harper, Mr. Gorst, and Mr. Acland, M.P.

The Turkish Missions-Aid Society, which met at Willis's Rooms, was presided over by the Earl of Shaftesbury. The report stated that the financial position of the society was encouraging, the receipts of the past year showing an advance upon the previous one of upwards of 1,200*l*. The society had supported, wholly or in part, 110 native agents in connexion with the American missions in various parts of the Turkish empire, besides assisting Bishop Gobat's and other schools. The Rev. C. E. Oakley moved, and the Rev. Dr. Bliss seconded, the adoption of the report. Referring to the progress of the Gospel in Syria, the latter gentleman said he had frequently been asked if there were any conversions there. Why there had been more conversions in Syria every year in proportion to the population, the number of sermons preached, and the other means employed, than took place in London or any other part of the United Kingdom. He went on to warn the meeting that they must be cautious in taking the testimony of travellers with regard to missionary work, and told the following instructive anecdote:—

He knew an American clergyman who, in visiting Syria, met a friend of his, the Rev. Mr. Washburn, one of the American missionaries. This clergyman remarked to Mr. Washburn that he did not think it was worth while for missionaries to be employed in Syria, as they did not seem to be accomplishing anything. Mr. Washburn said to him, "Did you hear Dr.

Thomson preach this morning?" "No," was the reply, "I did not know that there was any service." "Oh, yes there was," said Mr. Washburn, "he preached in English this morning." "Indeed!" said the clergyman, "I should like to have heard him." The conversation was continued as follows: "Did you hear Dr. Vandyke preach in Arabic this afternoon?" "No; you don't mean to say that he preached in Arabic?" "Yes; and he has a congregation of 200 persons every Sunday morning." "Did you visit any of the schools at Beyrout?" "Schools! Do you mean to say that you have got schools here! I am glad to hear that you are going on so well." "Did you see the printing press?" "Printing press! Have you got one?" "Oh, yes; we have a printing establishment in which as many as twenty persons are employed." Thus but for this conversation that clergyman, who was really a good man, might, when he got back to America, have told people there that the missionaries had never done anything.

More persons had become Protestants in Syria during the last four years than during the preceding forty years. As regarded the Mohammedan power in Turkey, they might rest assured that it would not fall without a tremendous struggle. There were two hundred millions of Mohammedans in the world, extending from the shore opposite Gibraltar to China; and it was not likely that a power so supported would be broken up without great convulsions. He believed, however, that England could do almost anything she liked with the Turkish Government, provided she were properly represented. Romanism will never upset Mohammedan despotism—it must be done by Protestant Christianity represented by England. Dr. Bliss referred to the necessity for a native ministry, educated in the East, and explained that this had led to the resolve to establish a college for that purpose in the Lebanon. The Rev. Mr. Barclay, of the London Mission to the Jews in Jerusalem, and the noble chairman, expressed their decided approval of the proposed college. The meeting was also addressed by the Rev. Mr. Tristram, Dr. F. Tompkins, and the Rev. Mr. Caston.

The report of the Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews showed an increase of income amounting to 2,000*l*. It also stated that in the Home Mission fifty-one members of the house of Israel had been under instruction during the year; sixteen adults and seventeen children had been baptized, and seventeen Israelites had been confirmed. The Jews in several large towns in different parts of the kingdom had been visited, and the operations of the society in a number of foreign cities in Europe, Asia, and Africa, were brought under review. One feature adverted to last year still continued fifty converted Jews in the whole of this kingdom. "In London alone," said his lordship, "you have now 3,000 converted Israelites. The society can tell of 20,000 converts, of whom it is assured that they are members of the invisible, as well as of the visible, Church of Christ. More than a hundred ordained clergymen, originally members of the Jewish communion, but now converted to the faith of Christ, are preaching the everlasting Gospel." The speech of Canon M'Neile was in the same eloquent strain, and of somewhat similar import to that delivered at the Church Missionary Society, and, like it, elicited loud applause from the meeting. Mr. Fremantle referred, in language of earnest and affectionate sympathy, to the Rev. Mr. Sterne, the society's missionary, now imprisoned in Abyssinia, and besought on his behalf the prayers of all whom he addressed.

The Bishop of Carlisle (in the absence of the Marquis of Cholmondeley) took the chair at the meeting of the Colonial and Continental Church Society. The committee reported that the serious checks which the income of the society received on the occurrence of the Lancashire distress had been succeeded by tokens of returning prosperity, and that it was regaining its old ground. In connexion with much detailed information respecting the colonial operations of the society, the report stated that the need of spiritual assistance was urgent in the case of those to whom they sought to impart it. "Thousands upon thousands of our fellow-countrymen are desti-society.

Two foreign missionary their annual meetings for the season—the Moslem Mission Universities Central African first of these, the chair was Stratford de Redcliffe, who mending the society to the meeting, gave a number. The most striking of these were that they should respect the country, and abstain from attacks on Islamism. The Rev. Mr. Rowley, who gave account of his personal experience of the mission settlement, Aldington and Mr. Horace members of the mission, and work in which they had been

It was stated in the report of the meeting of the Foreign-Aid that in the course of the twenty-five years completed, the society has raised which 44,000% has been re the foreign Evangelical association and which, originally two now no less than ten, the chiefly raised up in France was also remarked that the small aid given by the so-

Monod, Pastor Roussel (the last three gentlemen as representatives of foreign associations aided by the society), and by Mr. C. D. Bracebridge.

The Evangelical Continental Society reported that they had continued to undertake the entire support of evangelists in places selected by them, leaving the local societies to superintend the work. The society, during the past year, supported five evangelists in Italy, in addition to the help afforded to the Vaudois Committee of Evangelization, and to schools in Turin, Milan, and Naples. In France they supported eight, and in Belgium four evangelists. Mr. R. N. Fowler occupied the chair at the annual meeting, and, as in the case of the Foreign-Aid Society, addresses were delivered by deputations from the Continent.

HOME MISSIONS.

The Church Pastoral-Aid Society met in St. James's Hall, the Earl of Shaftesbury in the chair. The report was highly encouraging, the receipts showing an increase on the year of no less than 15,742*l.* Upwards of 12,000*l.* has accrued from the munificent gift of Mrs. Scott. This has been specially invested to sustain twenty "Scott Grants" for a period of ten years. There were sixty-one grants more than were reported at the previous anniversary. The total number of grants is 644; 472 are for clergymen, and 172 for lay agents; and the population benefited amounts to nearly four millions. The speaking indicated the same unwavering adherence to Evangelical truth which has ever characterised the advocacy and operations of this admirable institution. Two specimens may suffice—the one from the first of the addresses which followed the reading of the report, the speaker being the venerable Bishop Sumner; and the other from the judicious remarks with which the noble chairman closed the proceedings.

The Bishop of Winchester said:—

I look upon the stated ministry of the Church as a very great blessing; but we know that the stated ministry of our Church may be anything but a blessing. Unhappily, we have, in many instances, reason to be dissatisfied with the working of the ministry in our districts. We have reason sometimes to deplore a lack of energy, sometimes to lament an indifference, I grieve to say it, to the great interests of the souls committed to the charge of parochial ministers; and sometimes we have the yet greater mortification of seeing the Church scandalised by an imperfect exhibition of Gospel truth, or, what is yet worse, by something which is not only an imperfect exhibition, but in direct contradiction to the great principles of our Church. Perhaps it may be said that these are things over which we ought rather to throw a curtain than to expose them. I am not of that opinion. I think it is better to acknowledge the defects, to be humbled on account of them, and, God helping us, to do all in our power to remove them. That power may be little—it too often is very little—too often it is nothing. And those who are sometimes inclined, and naturally, to think that defects of this kind are overlooked by those who they presume might correct them, must bear with me if I say that our power in most cases is not equal to our will. But then I cannot think that it is well to dissemble these things. We cannot hide them if we would. They are as notorious as the sun at noonday, and the first step towards correction is acknowledgment.

These sentiments elicited hearty cheering from the meeting, as did also the following observations of the Earl of Shaftesbury:—

I am not afraid of Tom Paine and his adherents; I am not afraid of Pio Nono and his adherents; and still less am I afraid of that great Zulu deputation which has come from Africa to this country. I am far more afraid of treachery within than of these open enemies without. I fear not those who are open foes of our society, whether they be in the extremes of Tractarianism, or in the extremes of Neology, but I do fear those well-intended, weak-minded, vacillating, soft-hearted, amiable men, who are looking now to the right hand and now to the left. . . . Let me say, in the presence of some of their number, that I cannot help very humbly expressing the wish that some of our right reverend prelates would consider the absolute necessity of departing a little in these days from a rigid adherence to rubrics and established regulations, and of enlisting in the service of God what I would call a vast body of irregular troops, in order that they may assist in evangelizing the masses. Depend upon it you will not make anything like satisfactory progress while adhering rigidly to forms and systems. . . . I am sorry to say that I think the educated classes in this country are going deeply into Tractarianism and Neology. The educated classes of this country, male and female, are gradually acquiring a great dislike to all doctrinal teaching; they are gradually maintaining the position that there is much in all the three systems of the Church of England, including Neology and Popery; that there is much in which they resemble each other; and that, in short, it is a matter of little difference which of these systems you embrace. But as regards the great mass of the people of this country I am quite satisfied that they are quite accessible to our efforts; I am satisfied that if we address ourselves to the millions of people who never profess to enter a place of worship, we shall have the manifest blessing of God on our labours. If you go among the mass of the people you will find that they will either have no religion or will have religion of the best type. They like simple Evangelical doctrine: they hate processions, they hate pomp, they hate ceremony; they are not much in favour of that which I am rather sorry to find is making its way in different parts of the country—choral unions; but at the same time they are quite open to the best kind of influences. Let us go among them heart to heart, and face to face; let us show them that we have no other object than that of promoting their temporal and eternal welfare, and I am convinced that astonishing effects will be produced.

The Bishops of Carlisle and Ripon, Sir E. Buxton, the Rev. T. R. Birks, the Rev. S. Thornton, and Mr. Richard Hoare, also addressed the meeting. A passage in Mr. Birks's speech admirably set forth the argument, that in addition to higher motives, the spiritual elevation of our fellow-countrymen should be prompted by concern for the honour and safety of our country, and her preservation from many forms of evil that threaten to impair her social and political vitality.

The chairman of the London City Mission meeting, Mr. Joseph Hoare, remarked, in his opening speech, that in no year of the society's existence had the efforts of the missionaries been more welcomed and their labours more abundant. Of the necessity of increased efforts on the part of the mission, however, there could not be the slightest doubt:—

Notwithstanding the recent legislation with reference to the inspection of lodging-houses and the various sanitary restrictions, it was a melancholy fact that their missionaries still found vast masses of the poor collected together in single houses in numbers perfectly horrible to think of. One missionary told them that on the third floor of a small house he found five families, each occupying but one room, the average space of which was only nine feet by six. During the past year the special missions of the society had been very prosperous. These special missions, as they were called, were offshoots of the society. The good men who, thirty years ago, commenced this society had no other idea than the plain and simple one of house-to-house visitation; but as year after year passed by, other works offered themselves, for the accomplishment of which their missionaries seemed peculiarly suitable. They had now missionaries to the number of fifty engaged in objects of special visitation. For instance, they had seven engaged in visiting public-houses—a species of visitation which, at first sight, would appear most hopeless. It had not, however, proved so. One missionary informed him that he had 460 public-houses in his district, and that, by permission of the landlords, he had access to every one of them.

The report, which was read by the Rev. J. Garwood, entered very fully into the details of the society's operations, and the following summary gives an excellent idea of the value and character of the work it accomplished in the year 1864-5:—

Missionaries, 394; hours spent in domiciliary visitation, 548,707; visits paid, 2,048,581; of which to the sick and dying, 240,467; Scriptures distributed, 6,024; religious tracts distributed, 3,385,938; books lent, 48,665; indoor meetings and Bible-classes held, 46,738; average attendance at ditto, 30; gross attendance at ditto, 1,393,893; out-door services held, 4,023; average attendance at ditto, 92; gross attendance at ditto, 370,933; readings of Scripture in visitation, 632,254; communicants, 1,313; backsliders restored to church communion, 220; families induced to commence family prayer, 365; drunkards reclaimed, 1,140; unmarried couples induced to marry, 274; fallen females admitted to asylums, restored to their homes, or otherwise rescued, 420; shops closed on the Lord's-day, 187; children sent to school, 9,354; adults visited, who died, 7,187.

The receipts had fallen short of those of the previous year by 2,400*l.*; but that year a considerable amount beyond the ordinary income had been obtained in answer to a special appeal; so that the present financial position of the society is deemed highly encouraging. The Bishop of Ripon spoke from his own experience of the blessed results of the mission. He had laboured as a parochial clergyman in one of the metropolitan parishes. He found no lay agent at work except the City missionaries, seven in number, supported by this society. He hailed the help those missionaries gave him, and he testified from experience that the labours of those and other men he joined to them were made marvellously instrumental to accomplish results at which every one who gave glory to God would rejoice. Sir M. Peto said it had been one of the pleasures of his life to have some connexion with the locality of St. Giles when the Bishop of Ripon was pastor. At that time he (Sir M. Peto) held the office of senior deacon of a Nonconformist congregation, and he could bear witness to the lovingkindness and harmony with which the Bishop worked in this good work in connexion with his own pastor. There was a great movement at present to provide new churches, but it was notorious that the working classes did not come to them. It was not sufficient to say that the mercy-seat was open; they would not have done enough until they had carried the Gospel of God into the very dwellings of the poor. The essence of Christianity was not that the mercy-seat of God was open to men, but the Gospel was God himself coming down from heaven and offering salvation to mankind. The mission of our Saviour was very much in the nature of house-to-house visitation and the communication of the truth to single individuals. The Rev. Wm. Arthur said he quite agreed with Sir M. Peto as to the efficacy of preaching sermons to a congregation of one. He mentioned that in Mysore, where he was engaged in foreign missions, he had had frequent occasion to mark the extraordinary fect produced by instilling the Gospel truths into the mind of one individual. The meeting was further addressed by Colonel Howlandson, the Rev. R. Maguire, the Rev. J. Nolan, and Mr. M'Arthur.

The Bishop of Winchester occupied the chair at the twenty-first anniversary of the Church of England Scripture Readers' Association, and, in his opening speech, recalled some of the circumstances connected with the origin of the society. He said that—

About twenty-four years ago there was a general feeling amongst the clerical members of our Church that lay members could not be very usefully associated with them in the discharge of their duties. Perhaps nothing more strikingly illustrates the difference which time creates in men's opinions than the opinions which existed at that time and those which exist at the present moment. Then it was considered an innovation to let the incumbent of a parish go hand in hand with the lay agent, his Scripture-reader, into the various alleys and lanes and streets of his parish. The archbishop, a man of great action and of great wisdom, saw the importance of the movement, and encouraged us to make the attempt—an attempt, he called it—but as a tentative measure he encouraged us to proceed with it. About a year afterwards we called upon him, and told him we were so entirely satisfied with the advantages that had arisen from instituting the society, and with the mode in which its proceedings had been carried out, that we desired him to call a meeting of the bishops, in order that we might receive their sanction on so important a matter. That meeting was accordingly held, and I am happy to say that, with scarcely a single exception, all the then members of theiscopal bench gave their concurrence to the movement; and, in concert with them, certain principles were laid down, which are in effect the very principles which have guided this society from its first commencement to the present time.

The report stated that the Scripture-readers are steadily doing a good work amongst the poor. "They are absolutely indispensable in every large parish, and form a link between the clergy and the people which no other instrumentality can supply." The society's operations have hitherto been confined to the metropolitan parishes of the dioceses of London and Winchester. It was now proposed to extend its operations to the metropolitan and suburban parishes of the diocese of Canterbury and the diocese of Winchester, in addition to those of London and Winchester. The income of the past year was 12,589*l.*, including 1,503*l.* received from the "Bishop of London's Fund;" being in excess of the receipts of the preceding year by 1,396*l.* The number of grants during the same period has advanced from 115 to 168, the increase being mainly owing to the help of the Bishop of London's Fund.

The meeting was afterwards addressed by Mr. Thomas Chambers, Mr. Benjamin Shaw, and several clergymen, the latter of whom bore strong testimony to the valuable assistance which they derived from this class of lay agents. By one of the resolutions it was determined to extend the sphere of the society's operations, as suggested above, to the dioceses of Canterbury and Rochester.

